Who Favors What?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BUFFALO EVENING NEWS

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Buffalo Evening News in its issue of August 5, 1940. It seems to me that when the war tempo is obviously being "stepped up" it is well that all arguments should be brought to our attention. This editorial presents the question, "Who favors what?" in primarily discussing the proposed peacetime conscription bill, but, above all, it aptly brings out the noncommittal and conflicting positions taken by those in high authority—those who have confidential and technical knowledge, or at least have available to them confidential and technical information.

WHO FAVORS WHAT?

"Confusion thrice confounded" is the only phrase applicable to the military conscription issue after the three latest pronouncements on that all-important phase of national defense. The first statement, long overdue, came from President Roosevelt. It was this:

"I am distinctly in favor of a selective service training bill and I consider it essential to adequate national defense."

The President amplified this remark with a discussion of World War draft experience and the lesson of the present war that trained men are necessary in advance of an attack. It was all very edifying but contributed not one whit toward answering the one question in the minds of Congress and the people, namely, "Where does the President stand on the Burke-Wadsworth bill and the specific method of compulsory registration, selection, and military training provided therein?" On the curious ground that he did not want to be labeled "Mr. Dictator," the President refused to commit himself on the issues involved in the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

The second statement came in the form of a letter from former Secretary of War Harry H. Woodring to Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, of Michigan. Mr. Woodring declared emphatically that the traditional volunteer system of Army enlistment had not broken down, as implied by Army heads and others testifying before Congress, and urged that it be given a fair trial before any conscription plan was adopted. One of the reasons for the reluctance of young men to enlist in the Army, he said, was the unfair discrepancy between the Army base pay of $21 a month and the higher pay for Navy men and C. C. C. enrollees. Mr. Woodring said he had sought to correct this matter several months ago but had been turned down by the administration.

The third utterance came from Maj. Gen. James K. Parsons, commander of the Third Corps Area, who criticized conscription of "ungainly numbers" in an address to business and professional men completing 30 days of military training. General Parsons said that only men in the 18–31 age group should be registered and that only those of 21 should be drafted immediately for 2 years of training, not 1 year, as provided in the Burke-Wadsworth bill. This would give the Nation 500,000 trainees, as many as it truly needs and can train carefully. The general went contrary to the opinions expressed or implied by some of his superiors before Congress when he said that a relatively small but well-trained force was adequate for the defense of this country. "Alarmists who think we are wide open to attack are merely the victims of their own ignorance," General Parsons asserted. "The great need," he added, "is for a completely integrated national-defense plan, directed by one man and backed by a statement of just what area we want to protect."

The situation in Washington, aggravated by noncommittal or conflicting statements by the highest responsible authorities, is rapidly becoming detrimental to the national interest. Some form of compulsory military training is likely to become necessary in the near future, but here is the President, with the prime responsibility for recommending the proper measures, straddling the issue for obvious political reasons. Here is the Army, apparently divided on the question of the method and type of training most desirable. Here is a former Secretary of War in fundamental disagreement with the present Secretary on the need for immediate conscription. Here is the Burke-Wadsworth bill, originally drafted by a private group of citizens and sponsored by two political enemies of the President, hanging in midair as a sort of political punching bag while all other plans are held in abeyance. With 600,000 trained and partly trained soldiers available for service, there is no need for hasty action on the conscription issue. But there is a vital need for the President and the Army heads to assume their proper responsibility by stating exactly what form of training the country needs.

My Report to the People of Cowlitz County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Cowlitz County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress; their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty, and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

> A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continues.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the storekeepers, laborers, and farmers in 1932 when I visited Longview, Kelso, Castle Rock, Kalama, Silver Lake, Woodland, Ryderwood, and all the communities of Cowlitz County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the Bonneville $70,000,000 project and rural electrification projects and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

An allotment of $55,000 was made available in July for construction of Cowlitz County's third rural electrification line. It will provide electric service for over 200 families in the Mount Pleasant, Carrolls, and Ostrander districts. The line will extend along 52 miles of county roads in the district to the north and south of Kelso. The R. E. A. lines constructed previously cover the Silver Lake, Toutle, and North Castle Rock areas and along the west side of the Cowlitz River into the Coal Creek region.

LONGVIEW SUBSISTENCE HOMESTEADS

I take pride in the fact that it has been my privilege to actively cooperate in the establishment of the Longview subsistence homesteads project, made possible by a P. W. A. grant of $164,304 by the Federal Government, which has been designated as No. 1 of its type in the United States. It is not only a credit to the 60 families who comprise the group of homesteaders, but it is also a great credit to the entire community of Longview and the civic leaders, public officials, and all public-spirited citizens and firms who collaborated so successfully in its establishment. Much credit properly goes to Mrs. Erma Johnson, local manager of the homesteads since their inception.

KELSO POST OFFICE

The citizens of Kelso have earnestly desired for many years the construction of a new Federal post-office building. I introduced my first bill to authorize its construction in 1933, and after several years of persistent effort succeeded in 1935 in securing the funds for the commencement of the building. The total cost for building, site, furnishings, and fixtures was $67,602, and is one of the finest post-office buildings of its size in the State of Washington.

Bills for post-office buildings for Castle Rock and other communities in Cowlitz County are in a favorable position. Their actual construction will depend upon the progress of the new public-building program. The latter is temporarily deferred owing to the emergency national-defense program.

LONGVIEW-KELSO ARMORY

I have introduced a bill for $100,000 Federal aid toward the construction of a new armory for Cowlitz County and the project has been referred to the Federal Works Agency. I have also sought to enlist the cooperation and support of the national-defense agencies.

WOODLAND WATER SYSTEM

The water system of Woodland will be reconstructed and extended as a result of a W. P. A. allotment of $25,875, the project application having received Presidential approval early in July.

FLOOD CONTROL

I secured the enactment by Congress of my bills for flood-control surveys of the Cowlitz, Columbia, Lewis, and Chehalis Rivers, following the disastrous floods of 1933. This was the first legislation to control the floods in this vicinity ever enacted by Congress. We went to work immediately to enlist the active interest and financial aid of the Federal Government. We succeeded in the difficult task to have the Federal Government bear the entire cost instead of the local communities being required to contribute and match funds as had been done in other parts of the Nation, notably along the Mississippi, Ohio, and Sacramento Rivers and in other regions in which Federal aid for flood control had been provided in the past. I personally conferred with President Roosevelt, the Chief of United States Army Engineers, Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Secretary Harold L. Ickes, and other officials of the Federal Government.

We have followed through with necessary legislation, appearances before congressional committees, Government departments and boards. As a result considerable diking and flood-control works have been constructed in all parts of Cowlitz County, at an aggregate cost of several million dollars.

I have my complete files of telegrams and correspondence with the Cowlitz County Flood Control Committee, Mr. J. M. McClelland, chairman; Mr. J. D. Tennant, who came to the Capital and whose council and assistance were invaluable; and Mr. Thomas G. Jordan; Mr. T. H. VanNoy, chairman of the Cowlitz County Planning Council; the Board of Cowlitz County Commissioners, city and county officials, labor and civic organizations, and private citizens expressing appreciation of my activity and effective cooperation throughout our campaign for flood control and the proper protection and safeguarding of the lives and property of our people. Our success has been due to the untiring efforts of numerous organizations and individuals, all of whom are entitled to great credit.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Cowlitz County the sum of $4,537,904, and loaned therein the additional sum of $1,339,386, a total of $5,877,290.

Flood control, subsistence homesteads, power transmission lines, water systems, schools, streets, sidewalks, sewers, airports, drainage, athletic fields, swimming pools, street lights, parks, recreation facilities, playgrounds, community buildings, sanitation projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have therefore supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, viz, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was paid, we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Cowlitz County thus received $695,486.99.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran—the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel-pay bill of 1940—as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows and dependents, which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget, but always to remember, and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING, HOME OWNERS' LOAN, BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt, March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Cowlitz County 355 citizens have received loans, aggregating $987,400, for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 306 citizens of Cowlitz County have received loans aggregating $566,646.89. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the five banks of Cowlitz County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress, which I heartily supported and voted for. The 1,096 depositors in two savings and loan associations likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms, which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public-works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the P. T. A. in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and national life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which, as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934, and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently, for the first time, authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect a sufficient number of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have, since 1932, doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign-export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and corserving of our fish and game resources. I have, therefore, at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various "pogy," wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my whole-hearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE in the campaign in 1932 to say the shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933 the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma, February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased, expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

all during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been "on the job" for us and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of fact, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. Smith on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. Smith has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked onto the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 left lumvoters why their party under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of ber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100-percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if any, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulfite workers' unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers' Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington Congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21 and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler log matter.

APPOINTMENT TO UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

Stanton Wayne Josephson, of Longview, was appointed to the United States Military Academy, at West Point, on my recommendation in July 1938 and is due to graduate in 1942.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State Administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college work funds. In Cowlitz County a total of 69 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $1,035. Under the college work program there are 10 students attending Lower Columbia Junior College, with a total yearly quota of $1,485. Six schools of Cowlitz county are included in the school work program, with a total of 100 student-workers and a total yearly quota of $4,182.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants.

C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER; COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138, as amended, was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign "isms" without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room only for one ism, and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe, and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

LETTER FROM DEAN E. P. PUCKETT, FAYETTE, MO

JULY 24, 1940.

Congressman WILLIAM L. NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NELSON: Doubtless you and all the other Congressmen have received more letters than you need relative to the pending defense measures. Nevertheless, I hope that you will have yet remaining enough patience to read what I have to say. I am interested, not as an individual, but as the dean of a non-State, liberal-arts college.

As you perhaps know, there is and has been for a number of years a company of the Missouri National Guards in Fayette. The members of this company are, almost without exception, students in Central College. Naturally the college administration is interested in helping the young men of college age continue as normally as possible their college work, even in the midst of the present national defense emergency. It is our hope that the military plans can be so sensibly developed that college students may be able to get ample military training and, at the same time, not have their college, preprofessional and professional, work sidetracked.

It seems to me that institutions such as Central College could, in case of required military training, work out with the Federal Government plans by which certain phases of the military training could be carried on concurrently with college courses of study and the summer college vacation period be used for follow-up, intensive training with modernized, up-to-the-minute defense equipment. Some reasonable adaptation of student army training corps or extension of R. O. T. C. might serve the purpose, or in a situation such as has been existing in Fayette, a cooperative adaptation of National Guard and college program might attain the preparedness goal sought. I am in thorough accord with the recently arrived at determination to have the United States and all the Americas alert and prepared to defend the interests of the Western Hemisphere. In this preparedness program I hope that the equipment to be produced will not be patterned merely on the 1940 German model, but will be projected on a basis of superiority over current fighting machines. I believe Central College would be found ready and willing to give cooperation to the national administration in sensible plans for national defense. I am hoping that you and your fellow Congressmen will be alert to all the other and perhaps more lasting interests of the youth of this generation so that higher education may not be set back in the rush of getting through Congress the requisite acts for developing an honest-to-goodness superior defensive and, if necessary, offensive fighting machine. All that I have said may be summarized in three points.

First, that intensive summer training in regular, Federal Army posts or training schools be used for college-age men to supplement such preliminary training as may be taken by students in the regular school year.

Second, that enrollment of college students in cooperating National Guard units located in college towns may be considered in the general plan of military training. This would call for a cooperative adaptation of such National Guard units, which would not be such a bad thing, after all.

Third, that independent, endowed colleges such as Central be given opportunity to work out a cooperative plan with the Federal Government in administering military training to men of college age. Such plan should be harmonized with college work so that military training and college courses would be carried on concurrently.

A final point I would like to mention because of our experience with the S. A. T. C. in 1918. It would be helpful to colleges like Central if plans that may involve college students be determined and published in the near future so that colleges may, with some assurance, make plans in line with probable enrollments. I confidently believe that the National Government will not purposely disrupt college organizations to the hurt of institutions such as the one I represent, but serious injury may inadvertently be worked to such institutions unless sensible Congressmen plan carefully.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes to you individually and officially, I remain,

Sincerely,

(Signed) E. P. PUCKETT,
Dean, Central College, Fayette, Mo.

The Third Term Is Something That Just Isn't Done in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE WYOMING STATE TRIBUNE-CHEYENNE STATE LEADER

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Wyoming State Tribune-Cheyenne State Leader of July 22, 1940:

[From the Wyoming State Tribune-Cheyenne State Leader of July 22, 1940]

A PATRIOTIC DEMOCRAT SPEAKS

Let a Democrat testify concerning the third term and the ambition of the man who seeks it. The following is by the Right Reverend Hugh L. McMenamin, rector of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception at Denver, who was born into the Democratic Party, has been a Democrat all his long life, is still a stalwart, uncompromising Democrat—but not a revolutionary. No comment concerning his statement is necessary; it speaks for itself. He said yesterday for publication:

"If President Roosevelt, against all precedent, answering, as he admits, a quiet voice known as conscience, submits against personal wishes to a so-called draft to become a candidate for a third term as President of the United States, then I, a humble priest, who am first an American, listening to a voice of conscience that marches like an army with drums and banners, call upon free Americans to join with me in organizing an offensive against an inevitable dictatorship for this country.

"Never, in a long life crowded with events, can I recall such an insult offered to the intelligence of American people as that included in the message by Franklin D. Roosevelt, transmitted by radio to the delegates at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago in which he states the motives for acceptance.

"Did he imagine as he sat at his desk reading that speech that the people of the United States are so dumb as not to know it had been carefully prepared?

"Does Franklin D. Roosevelt imagine that he can hide a consuming greed for power and more power under pleasant words arranged to emphasize the virtue of self-sacrifice?

"Do the people of America, the women and men who will cast the votes in November, believe for a minute that the delegates had a free choice in the selection of leaders?

"We are not dumb! And because we are not dumb and because our intelligence can resist insult, we must, as loyal Americans, holding to policies laid down by Washington and Jefferson, defeat Roosevelt at the polls.

"Otherwise America as we have known and loved it is gone.

"This is not the first time we must put service to country above party. This is not a privilege but a duty. Never more earnestly than now must we accept the duty.

"A third term, which Roosevelt has accepted, savors of dictatorship.

"Dictatorship savors of war. Roosevelt as a third-term President will continue as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Looking forward to the boring-in of the old Pendergast-Hines-Leche gang rotating in Washington, we'll find ourselves like the South American republics under that sort of arrogant dictatorship.

"When Franklin D. Roosevelt said: 'I do not wish to continue as President,' he tossed an insult to me and every thinking citizen.

"Does he imagine that millions of Americans, capable of thinking for themselves, will believe that he meant a word he said or that the acceptance speech had not been carefully prepared long in advance?

"Did Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who appeared at the Chicago convention, think we could take seriously her amazing statement that she was surprised to learn that delegates did not think themselves free to vote as they wished?

"Both were flouting the intelligence of the American people!

"The only way we can preserve the policies of Washington and Lincoln, which are the foundation stones on which this Government rests and has developed, is to defeat Roosevelt.

"An individual's lust for power and inability to gage the intelligence of the people has worked for their benefit before. It will work again for their benefit and salvation. But we must organize our forces, too. That is why I call on free men and women to join me in a walk to save America and its precious institutions from what will be inevitable dictatorship if Roosevelt wins again."

WHAT WHEN THE "ONE MAN" IS GONE?

(By John de Meyer)

Well, the Democrats had their convention. It's probably all right to say it was democratic. It was held in a democratic country, and nothing was actually said about a divine right of succession. The Democrats just said that the country is better off than under the Republicans, even if it is in bad shape. Out of a hundred and thirty million people there's only one man big enough to keep the country going. And between now and November we've got to find out how to nurse that man along to a good ripe old age, because when he retires we're all done. That's what the new dealers said. What the country will say we won't know until November. But the country may be stubborn and refuse to see the light. The country may not believe the new dealers. If it doesn't, Jim Farley wants to know what's going to happen to the Democrats when their one man big enough to be President is gone.

Sending Destroyers to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published in today's Times-Herald entitled "Fifty Destroyers to Britain?" The article is preceded by a quotation from the Farewell Address of George Washington, which I ask be included; and I also desire to include the text of the law forbidding the transfer of war vessels to foreign powers.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIFTY DESTROYERS TO BRITAIN?

General of the Armies, John J. Pershing, made a Nation-wide radio address Sunday evening, his two most important paragraphs being these:

"And I am telling you tonight, because it is my duty to warn you before it is too late, that the British Navy needs destroyers and small craft to convoy merchant ships, to escort its warships and hunt submarines, and to repel invasion.

"We have an immense reserve of destroyers left over from the other war, and in a few months the British will be completing a large number of destroyers of their own. The most critical time, therefore, is the next few weeks or months. If there is anything we can do to save the British Fleet during that time, we shall be failing in our duty to America if we do not do it."

Wherefore, General Pershing urged that Congress arrange for an early sale, to Britain or Canada, of "at least 50 of the over-age destroyers which are left from the days of the World War."

Two pieces of evidence convince us that the Pershing speech voiced the wishes of President Roosevelt in this matter.

One of these pieces of evidence is the fact that Secretary of State Hull warmly congratulated General Pershing, and posed for a picture of himself doing so.

The other is the fact that Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner echoed the speech with a must-do, now-or-never editorial dolled up as a news story, dated August 4, circulated by the North American Newspaper Alliance, and published locally yesterday by the Evening Star. Messrs. Alsop and Kintner are the authors of the widely read "American White Paper" (Simon & Schuster, New York, 1940, $1), a book which frankly states this administration's interventionist ideas from official and very highly placed Washington feedboxes.

DESTROYER FIGURES

Our allegedly huge batch of destroyers comes, by the latest figures we can obtain, to 236 on hand and 61 building. Of these, 167 are in the over-age class alluded to by General Pershing.

As of June 30, 1940, with the Battle of France over and the Battle of Britain expected to begin at any moment, Britain was estimated by competent American observers to have 100 destroyers completed and available for service around the British Isles. The British are thought to have picked up 8 or 9 French destroyers in the July 4 coup that smashed part of the French fleet and put most of the rest of it in British hands.

The Germans have been knocking off or disabling British destroyers pretty rapidly, so that quite a number of those unsunk are out of action for repairs.

THEN WILL COME THE CALL FOR ANOTHER 50 DESTROYERS

Destroyers, at least, appear exceedingly vulnerable to air attack. These 50 of ours, if considerately placed within reach of the German bombers, will also be disabled pretty rapidly.

Then will come the call for another 50, and after that for as much of our Navy as we can spare.

Well, how much can we spare? We've been told over and over again that our Navy should be doubled in size. Appropriations have passed Congress to make it so. So how much can we spare out of a Navy that's only half big enough?

Now, we should be sorry indeed to see the British Empire fall. This country will be in greater danger if it does so. But it will be in greater danger still if it sends any considerable portion of its armed forces to Europe within reach of Hitler's bombers.

If we have to fight Hitler some day, as we may, why in heaven's name should we accommodate him by sending our warships within reach of his bombers based on his land airfields, instead of compelling him to come over and fight us within reach of our bombers based on our land airfields?

It would be 10 times as difficult and as expensive for Hitler to kill an American soldier on this side of the ocean as it would be to kill him if we sent him over to Europe.

George Washington said: "Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other."—From the Farewell Address.

LAWS RESTRICTING SALE OF NAVAL VESSELS

Act of July 19, 1940 (54 Stat. —, ch. 644, sec. 7; Public, No. 757, 76th Cong.):

"No vessel, ship, or boat (except ships' boats) now in the United States Navy or being built or hereafter built therefor shall be disposed of by sale or otherwise, or be chartered or scrapped, except as now provided by law."

Act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. 599, sec. 5; U. S. Code, 34:492):

"The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to sell vessels that have been stricken from the Navy Register, after a report by a board of naval officers to the effect that such vessels are 'unfit for further service.' Such vessels are to be sold after advertising for proposals for not less than 3 months; bids must be accompanied with a 10 percent cash deposit and bond for the remaining 90 percent of the price offered."

Act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 605; U. S. Code 34:493):

"The Secretary is authorized to sell 'colliers, transports, tenders, supply ships, special types, and hospital ships, which are 18 years and over in age, which he deems unsuited to present needs of the Navy and which can be disposed of at an advantageous price, which shall not be less than 50 percent of their original cost.'"

ADMINISTRATION VIOLATES ARTICLE VI OF 1907 HAGUE CONVENTION

Mr. President, I wish to read article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907. That convention was signed by both Germany and the United States. It concerns the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval warfare. I read the provision of article VI of the 1907 Hague Convention:

The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever is forbidden.

During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States (June 15, 1917, ch. 30, title V, 3, 40 Stat. 222).

Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of sections 25, 27, and 31 to 38 of this title, shall take, or attempt to conspire to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

My Report to the People of Clark County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Clark County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress; their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty, and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am therefore thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen; then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today, holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York, with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continues.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the storekeepers, laborers, and farmers in 1932 when I visited Vancouver, Camas, Washougal, Ridgefield, LaCenter, Brush Prairie, Battle Ground, Yacolt, Amboy, Pioneer, Orchards, Hockinson, and all the communities of Clark County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation, prices were down, and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I shall always be proud of my sponsorship of the original legislation creating the great Bonneville $70,000,000 project and my active participation during the years in every step to bring its benefits to the citizens and communities of Clark County and our district. On March 4, 1938, the late John D. Ross, administrator of the Bonneville project, wrote me:

I wish to express my deep appreciation of your efforts in obtaining the Bonneville appropriation through the House. The cooperation which I received while in Washington and since I left has pleased me very much.

Bonneville will always remain a monument to the memory of this sturdy champion of public power for all the people.

On March 27, 1939, Charles E. Carey, acting administrator, wrote me:

With friends like you in Congress, we feel that the future of Bonneville is in safe hands. We will do everything we can to see that your friends in southwestern Washington are fully advised of your service and active support of the Bonneville project.

In this session of Congress I appeared twice before the Appropriations Committee and testified at length in support of increased appropriations this year, which we succeeded in obtaining so the work can continue unabated.

Under date of June 20, 1940, Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator, Bonneville Power Administration, wrote me:

I want to express my appreciation for the very able assistance which you gave this Administration in connection with our request for an appropriation sufficient to meet our construction needs to get the power from the Bonneville Dam to the market areas.

I have actively supported our rural-electrification projects, which are, of course, valuable adjuncts to Bonneville.

Vancouver has already secured two new industries and pay rolls as a direct result of Bonneville, the Aluminum Corporation of America and the Sierra Iron Co., and these mark only a beginning of the industrial development which is certain to accrue to Vancouver and Clark County.

PORT OF VANCOUVER

During the period of my service in Congress and as a member of the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, we have had more dredging and harbor improvements made at Vancouver than during the entire previous history of the port, which will be verified by the efficient port manager, T. P. MacComber, and the port commissioners. Indeed, the channel at Vancouver has been deepened 5 feet, first from a depth of 25 feet to 28 feet, and then from 28 to 30 feet. There is only one other channel in the United States during the same period which has been deepened an equal footage, and that is the channel of New York Harbor.

A $503,000 contract has been let for dredging 10 miles of the Columbia River from a point near Cape Horn to the Bonneville Dam. It is the second link in the project which we have had put through, to provide a 27-foot channel 300 feet wide from Vancouver to the dam. The first unit provided a 15-foot channel between Camas and Vancouver.

The next unit of the channel dredging will include the area between Cape Horn and Camas, in which the port of Camas-Washougal is to be included, at a cost of $45,000, for which authorization and allotment of funds is pending.

ARMY AIR BASE

I have introduced a bill to authorize and appropriate $2,500,000 for an Army air base at Vancouver to give adequate protection to the Columbia River area and the Bonneville Dam project. The bill has been referred to the War and Aeronautical Departments and will receive study and consideration as a part of the national-defense program.

VANCOUVER BARRACKS

We have had considerable money expended and improvements made at Vancouver barracks during the period since 1933, through Regular Army appropriations, totaling $167,234 including 1940 estimates. Through W. P. A. allotments we obtained the additional sum of $446,230. We also have included in the War Department housing program for future construction, in behalf of which I have twice made presentations before the Committee on Appropriations, items aggregating $362,600.

CAMAS POST OFFICE

In 1935 I introduced the first bill for a new post-office building for Camas and after 4 years of untiring effort I secured the allotment of $81,525, which resulted in the construction and dedication of the present magnificent building, commensurate with the bright future community prospects of Camas, on August 15, 1939. This result was extremely difficult to accomplish because the final choice had to be made between Camas and two other progressive communities in southwest Washington.

VANCOUVER POST OFFICE

We are pressing vigorously for action on the bill which we have been urging for a new post-office building for Vancouver and recently succeeded in having Vancouver placed on the first priority list. Following numerous conferences with officials of the Postal Department, we have secured their favorable recommendation for a building and site to cost $180,000. This important action resulted in abandoning the previous plans for adding a second story to the present structure. If a new public-building program is started this year Vancouver will be included, otherwise it will be included in next year's program. This is real progress and I hereby acknowledge the generous cooperation and kind expressions of approval of my endeavors which have come to me from numerous civic organizations and citizens' groups in Vancouver.

FLOOD CONTROL—VANCOUVER LAKE

The Vancouver Lake project has repeatedly been rejected by the Army engineers over a long period of years. However, we secured the survey in progress and have also introduced in this session a bill for a survey of additional area, extending from the downstream point of the Vancouver Lake area to the upstream point of the Bachelor Island area. Altogether this contemplates a very costly project, probably exceeding $1,000,000, but will protect, conserve, and make available for development some of the finest lands to be found in Clark County and southeast Washington.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government, in Clark County, the sum of $5,737,228, and loaned therein the additional sum of $1,570,698, a total of $7,307,926.

Vancouver Barracks, schools and grounds, athletic field, water system, city and county mapping, playfield, parks, streets, sidewalks, sewers, pipe lines, sanitation, drainage, reservoir, fish screens, fish hatchery, gymnasium, recreation, bridge improvements, jail, cemetery improvements, city and county roads projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come, and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have, therefore, supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, namely, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and Postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently, and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was paid, we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Clark County thus received $878,808.17.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish-War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel-pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows, and dependents which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING, HOME OWNERS' LOANS, BANK AND SAVINGS, AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Clark County 208 citizens have received loans aggregating $592,100 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 283 citizens of Clark County have received loans aggregating $447,545.41. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the seven banks in Clark County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. The 2,144 depositors in two savings and loan associations likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our Parent-Teacher Associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the Parent-Teacher Association in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and national life.

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which, as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934, and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently for the first time authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress, we confidently expect to reelect a sufficient number of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have, since 1932, doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me, and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem, but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have therefore at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my wholehearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously, the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE in the campaign in 1932 to say:

The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress, in 1933, the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill, which became law, for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma, February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased, expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been on the job for us and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when the candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of facts, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermens' Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the revenue act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt, and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked onto the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100-percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if made, would be interesting; probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Anti-Dumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulphite workers' unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers' Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Anti-Dumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21 and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler log matter.

APPOINTMENTS TO UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

Charles L. Jackson, of Vancouver, was appointed to the United States Military Academy at West Point on my recommendation in July 1934, was graduated in 1938, and is now second lieutenant, Twenty-ninth Infantry, Fort Benning, Ga.

Paul B. Cozine, of Vancouver, was appointed to the United States Military Academy at West Point on my recommendation in July 1935, graduated in 1939, and lost his life in an automobile accident December 9, 1939.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington, and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, the Washington State administrator of N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Clark County a total of 250 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $4,750. There have been 5 Clark County students at Clark Junior College under the college work program, receiving a total yearly quota of $675. Eight schools of Clark County are included in the school-work program, with a total of 111 student workers, and a total yearly quota of $4,482.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods, and soil erosion and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires have resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column" and un-American activities, and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138, as amended, was carefully considered, and provides effective remedies against all foreign isms without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one ism, and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

OF
HON. PETE JARMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 6, 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ALABAMA OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions of the Department of Alabama of the American Legion:

Resolution No. 8

Whereas the United States is faced with the necessity of making immediate preparation for national defense, and the only practicable and democratic method of securing the requisite number of trained men for our land and naval forces is through a system of compulsory selective military training and service: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Alabama, in its annual convention assembled, endorses the principle of compulsory selective military training and service, and calls upon the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to that end; further

Resolved, That we pledge our individual services as ex-soldiers, acquainted with the problem, do offer to serve the Government as board members, draft officers, or to do any other duty that may be assigned us; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, the two Senators from Alabama, and the Members of the House of Representatives from Alabama.

Whereas one nation after another has been overrun by the military machines of the totalitarian powers, chiefly because each hoped that it would not become involved and therefore did not cooperate until too late with the nations fighting these powers; and

Whereas we believe that the victory of the totalitarian powers in this war will be a serious threat, not only to the democratic systems throughout the world, but also to the happiness, prosperity, and the very existence of our Nation; and

Whereas we believe that the safety of our Nation will be rendered more secure by contributing all help possible short of war to the defeat of these powers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of Alabama American Legion in convention assembled, at Birmingham, Ala., That we urge the wisdom of contributing all aid possible short of war to the defeat of the totalitarian powers, not primarily to help others, but to get the help of others while they are still able to give it; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread on the minutes of this meeting and that copies be sent to the two United States Senators and to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States from Alabama.

Resolution No. 10

Whereas at this time the peace of the world has been shattered in all quarters except the Western Hemisphere and is threatened here; and

Whereas in cynical disregard of international law the totalitarian countries have invaded the territory and destroyed the freedom of weaker peoples; and

Whereas those same totalitarian countries are spreading, by espionage and other subversive methods, propaganda having for its purpose the imposition of their principle of autocracy upon the peoples of other democratic countries; and

Whereas the United States has not escaped the influence of these activities and there has been planted in this country agents of foreign powers who, by "fifth column" methods, seek to undermine our American institutions—to soften our public morale and confidence in our Government and in each other; and

Whereas the President of the United States and Congress are trying to steer a course whereby this country can remain at peace, protect our institutions, and fortify this country against the encroachments of all alien isms and at the same time check the onward rush of the forces fighting against free people and modern civilization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this convention do go on record as condemning subversive activities in this country by foreign nations through the use of so-called "fifth column" methods having for their purposes the weakening of American resistance through a destruction of our modern civilization and American institutions and our claim to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that we pledge ourselves individually and collectively in every possible way to eliminate these agents and their activities and to neutralize their efforts and do all in our power to eliminate as far as possible such agents as are engaged in these nefarious and subversive operations; that we do again hereby dedicate ourselves to perpetuate a 100-percent Americanism, opposing all foreign agents wherever and whenever they are found; that we pledge our aid and assistance actively and morally to the constituted authorities of the United States toward the elimination of these spies and their works; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes and a copy be forwarded to the President of the United States and a copy to each Member of the Alabama delegation in Congress.

Delay in Defense Is Dangerous

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. FRANK WHELCHEL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. WHELCHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am firmly convinced that the President of the United States should be granted powers, as provided in the event of war or when war is imminent, in an effort to expedite and to put into effect the national-defense program, and I am today introducing a resolution granting the same to him.

It is astounding and appalling the slowness with which we are progressing in the preparation of our defense. People are wanting to know what has happened to the billions of dollars that the Congress has appropriated for this purpose; they want to know why the plants that manufacture war planes are lying idle; they want to know why we are unable to show that some progress has not been made. This Nation must realize that it is faced with a reality and not a theory, and I voice the sentiment of the majority of our people when I say they are anxious that our defense be brought up to where we can at least defend ourselves if an invasion should come. It is too late to be alarmed when this actually happens. My answer to our people for this delay is this: There are so many formalities and technicalities necessary under the existing laws, if followed, there is no help for it. This is no time for delay, and this resolution that I am introducing provides the President with powers that will obviate these dangerous delays. I think that our factories and manufacturing plants should be placed in use immediately for the production of war planes and war materials, and if we sit by without taking steps we will have cause to regret it, because this is exactly what happened to Great Britain and the other nations now involved in war, to their sorrow. One instance that I would like to call to the attention of the House—and I have this information from a source that I believe to be authentic—and that is, prior to August 1 not a single combat plane had been contracted for out of the emergency fund provided by Congress. It is alarming how inadequate our defense is and will be even when the $10,000,000,000 has been spent for planes, tanks, and so forth. For example, inclusive, as I say, of this appropriation we will only have 6,700 pilots as compared to 30,000 for Germany; 7,000 war planes as compared to Germany's 25,000; 1,500 tanks as compared to Germany's 8,000 tanks. In other words, when the $10,000,000,000 has been spent our preparation will be only one-fifth as great as Germany's.

In view of this terrible situation with which we are confronted and the slowness of our getting prepared is why I am constrained to believe that the President should be granted powers at once to rush our defense without delay.

The Broad View of Reclamation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN C. PAGE

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by John C. Page, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, before the Seventieth Annual Convention of the American Society of Civil Engineers, at Denver, Colo., on July 24, 1940:

THE BROAD VIEW OF RECLAMATION

(By John C. Page)

Irrigation of arid lands in the United States under the Federal reclamation law is a double-barreled enterprise. It is a social program as well as a business proposition. It creates opportunities for the establishment of new homes, and it develops the Western States which have been carved from the 700,000,000 acres of arid and semiarid lands within our national boundaries.

This combination social and physical development makes good common sense. Older nations have recognized that fact. Down through all recorded history, those nations situated in dry climates have viewed irrigation as a responsibility of the state. The world's oldest civilizations grew in irrigated fields, and after thousands of years they are still flourishing in the irrigated valleys of Egypt, Syria, Persia, and India.

On this continent before the time of Columbus, the Indians were irrigating fields of corn in the Southwest. The Spanish missionaries brought with them to the southwestern deserts from the lands bordering the Mediterranean knowledge of irrigation methods and practices which they planted in American soil.

The Anglo-Saxon stock which dominated in the early settlement of the Atlantic seaboard, and which participated in the expansion westward, had no experience in arid climates. Nevertheless, when it came into the arid and semiarid lands west of the 100th meridian, it quickly adapted itself to the new conditions, as evidenced by the introduction of irrigation by the Mormons in Utah in 1847. The Mormon settlements could not have been supported on the shores of Great Salt Lake except by irrigation.

It is regrettable that there was no irrigation lore among the folk who founded the United States. The common law of England, recognizing riparian rights, hardly was appropriate in arid and semiarid climes. The founders of the new nation which declared its independence in 1776, fighting a war in the humid, verdant valleys east of the Allegheny Mountains to make that declaration stick, never foresaw that the United States would cover a vast arid domain far larger than the area of the Thirteen Original Colonies.

Because of these facts, the United States was slow in assuming its national responsibility in connection with irrigating and developing its arid lands. Initial successes and final failures of other methods of settlement and development of these arid lands had, therefore, to precede Federal action. Even today, 38 years after reclamation was adopted as a national policy, there is a general lack of understanding in the populous, humid areas, where settlements are older, of the conditions and the problems in the West which make irrigation necessary and a lack of appreciation of the objectives and the achievements of the Federal reclamation program.

It is true that the United States could have become a great nation without irrigation, for two-thirds of its territory is humid. But it never would have become so great a nation as it is today without the 20,000,000 acres of irrigated land in these Western States. The economic destinies of more than 13,000,000 people in this arid region and great cities, such as Los Angeles, Phoenix, Salt Lake City, and Denver, rest upon farming by irrigation and the industrial growth made possible by conservation of water. Our irrigation projects are the piers on which the transcontinental railroads bridge the deserts of the West.

The story of this western development parallels the evolution of irrigation in the United States. After the Mormons diverted the waters of City Creek, and before the Federal Reclamation Act was passed, simple and easy water diversions were made from hundreds of creeks and rivers in the West. By 1900, 8,000,000 acres were irrigated as the result of individual, corporate, cooperative, and State enterprise, and a population of 4,000,000 was being supported in this western third of our country.

By 1902 most of the easy diversion had been completed. Most of the remaining opportunities for developments required construction of storage dams, costly canals, and other works with which the Federal Government alone could cope. On June 17, 1902, the Federal Reclamation Act became law, culminating more than half a century of experimentation, half a century during which private financing of intricate irrigation developments was proving wholly inadequate, half a century which saw half measures tried.

The entry of the Federal Government into the field stimulated other investments as well. There was a rapid expansion of irrigation, only part of which is the direct result of Federal activities. Large areas were watered by pumping from underground sources, particularly in California. Irrigation projects already in existence were expanded. Some entirely new projects using surface waters were developed by irrigation districts. For the last 15 years, however, the Federal Government has been virtually the only agency engaged in irrigation development.

In less than four decades the Bureau of Reclamation has placed works in operation to serve nearly 4,000,000 acres of land. Of this total approximately 2,500,000 acres were once unproductive desert and 1,500,000 acres were in non-Federal irrigation districts which had inadequate water supplies. Today it has a great construction program, the largest in the Bureau's history, which will provide water to about 2,500,000 additional acres, transforming them from sagebrush wastes into productive farms that will support a million people. This will bring to 5,000,000 acres the total of new lands the Bureau has watered.

Equally as important as the irrigation of new lands is the provision of supplemental water for areas already irrigated. Water tables lowered by overdrafts on underground supplies, unanticipated droughts, and inadequate storage facilities threaten many areas with desolation or stagnation. Stabilization or succor of these communities is vital to the public welfare. Rehabilitation projects, therefore, make up about half of our present program. They will serve 3,500,000 acres, including a great area in the pumping section of central California. They will bring to almost 5,000,000 acres the lands which will have been rescued by the Federal Government.

Many of the developments which will be made in the future will require engineering works of great size and complexity, and most of them will be on interstate streams or in the main stems of the large rivers. The Bureau of Reclamation estimates that perhaps as much as 20,000,000 acres additional can be irrigated with water resources as yet undeveloped and under policies now in effect. The future growth of the West will be correlated in large measure with the conservaton of these remaining water resources and their beneficial use.

In the future, as in the past, the Bureau will build sound structures. Reclamation projects are considered permanent national assets, and so durability must be an objective of project construction.

The original basis on which irrigation was undertaken by the Federal Government was that 90 percent of the revenues from the sale of public lands should be used for irrigation in the Western States. The settlers on the irrigated projects were required to repay the cost without interest of the construction of the works serving them. The public-land revenues and the repayments by the settlers were set aside as a reclamation revolving fund.

This was considered a good business proposition on the part of the Federal Government, and, in my opinion, it has proved to be exactly that.

Reclamation projects completed and now operating as a result of this policy have repaid more than $62,000,000 of the cost of the works serving them. They support more than 1,000,000 people on some 70,000 farms and in some 258 project towns. They produce more than $100,000,000 of new wealth annually. They have produced more than two and one-half billions of dollars of new wealth since they first started operation. They have created and are protecting taxable values in excess of $4,500,000,000. They provide an annual market for produce and manufactures of the humid areas worth more than our foreign trade with many countries which are considered prime markets for American goods.

Let me repeat these facts. They are worth repetition. Homes and a chance for a good livelihood for a quarter of a million American families. A crop production valued at $100,000,000 a year. A market for American industry worth $200,000,000 a year. Taxable property carved out of lonely desert totaling more than $4,500,000,000. This is what reclamation has brought to the country.

From the first, however, the Congress has looked on the Federal reclamation program also as a social program. It directed that settlement be on family-size farms. It has written into the law from time to time provisions to prevent speculation in project lands and to protect the settlers. It directs that in selling surplus power from project plants preference shall be given to publicly owned or cooperative distributors. It declared this year "that, in the opening of entry of newly irrigated public lands, preference shall be given to families who have no other means of earning a livelihood, or who have been compelled to abandon, through no fault of their own, other farms in the United States, and with respect to whom there is a probability that such families will be able to earn a livelihood on such irrigated land."

The present practices and methods of the Bureau of Reclamation, even the present method of financing the construction and the large multiple-purpose project, are also the products of evolutionary processes.

The Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, was brief. It contained only a few hundred words. Subsequent legislation making up the body of the Federal reclamation law, however, together with interpretations, make a volume of several hundred closely printed pages. There have been no startling innovations, however, in this body of law. The original principles—economic feasibility and reimbursability—still govern. For the most part, only logical extensions have been made as changing conditions have dictated.

When the sales of public lands diminished and virtually ceased, other revenues, such as a portion of the royalties from oil and minerals taken from the public lands, were added to the reclamation fund. When it was found that reservoirs being constructed to serve Federal project lands could also be made to provide supplemental water to projects already in existence, provisions were made by which water could be supplied under adequate contracts to those areas. When it evolved, with the construction of large dams, that power could be generated, a measure of flood protection provided, and navigation served in addition to meeting irrigation storage requirements, intelligent and constructive steps were taken to authorize consideration of and the planning for these multiple and related functions.

It obviously is appropriate that the Federal Government should insure a wide distribution of the benefits of these works built in the public interest. These advances were made step by step to that end.

In recent years, beginning with the institution of the first major Public Works program, the reclamation fund has been supplemented and augmented by allotments and appropriations from other sources. Construction financed by the reclamation fund has cost $265,000,000. In addition, allotments from emergency funds totaling $190,937,000 have been made and $324,540,000 have been appropriated from the General Treasury. The allotments from the emergency funds for reclamation projects are also reimbursable and about 25 percent of the total expenditure is chargeable to power and will be returned with interest at a rate not less than 3 percent. Projects like Boulder Dam, Grand Coulee Dam, and the Central Valley project in California never could have been financed wholly from the reclamation fund. I consider each of these, however, wholly justified in the public interest and it is appropriate that general funds have been made available for their construction.

President Theodore Roosevelt told Congress in 1901, "It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid regions by engineering works of another kind."

This cannot be questioned. Historic as is the policy of river and harbor improvement for navigation, however, I do not mean to imply that the justification of Federal reclamation rests wholly on this comparison.

The work of conservation and utilization of the precious water resources of the West stands firmly on its own feet.

While other peoples make terrible wars for expansion, we have only to build great works to provide ourselves with elbowroom. This constructive endeavor which will more than pay its own way through direct returns to the common treasury and increases in taxable wealth, pays dividends in future security as well. I see in these great water projects and the developments which go with them, ramparts which will guard our civilization and which may serve it as well as have the canals served Egypt which were built more than 4,000 years ago.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT T. SECREST

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT T. SECREST, OF OHIO

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered yesterday over the radio:

No man has a greater love for his country than I. No man believes more sincerely in its proper defense.

In February I urged the Congress to stop the sale of steel, gasoline, and other war materials to Japan or any nation that later might become a potential enemy.

I have supported every defense measure that has come before the House in the determination that my country should not meet the fate of the eight nations who placed their reliance in the false promises of dictators. Those nations that slept awoke to find their freedom gone.

Our people believe in our form of democratic government and desire the adoption of all legislation that will assure the protection of their liberties. We do not want war and believe the surest way to avoid it is to possess military and moral strength that no dictator will dare challenge. It is better to be powerful and avoid attack, than to be weak and invite destruction.

As to the need for a larger Army and Navy, there is no disagreement between me and the most ardent believer in conscription. I know it is useless to have a gun without a soldier trained to use it. I know it is folly to build boats without training men to operate them. I know it is ridiculous to buy airplanes unless we train pilots to fly them. Like every citizen, I realize that modern war and modern defense are highly mechanical and specialized and that it is suicide to train men after a war begins. I believe it to be no less than treason to send untrained men to certain and unnecessary slaughter. Proper training today will save the lives of countless boys should our Nation ever be attacked.

We agree as to the need for training, but I firmly believe the youth of this country, realizing the threat to our security, will respond voluntarily to every need of our military leaders if we in Congress will give them a chance. I hold that conscription should be the last resort of a free people and not the first.

I contend that our needs will be met if we allow a boy to enlist for 1 year for emergency training and pay that boy $30 per month. Today we pay a boy in the Army $21 per month, while the same boy in the C. C. C. camps would be paid $30 per month.

Today, in the Army and Marine Corps, a boy will not be accepted as a volunteer unless he enlists for 3 years. Since July 1, 1939, the Navy has not accepted a volunteer unless he agreed to serve 6 years. The education and life plans of many young men prevent them from enlisting for such long periods.

My bill compels Army, Navy, and Marine Corps officials to accept any volunteer who wishes to enlist for 1 year of emergency training. The advocates of conscription cannot claim that 1 year is too short a time, because the conscription bill provides for the same period of training. Neither will my bill affect the Regular Army or Navy, because anyone can still enlist for the full period of 3 or 6 years if he desires.

Even at the enlistment period of 3 years now in effect in the Army, let us see how successful has been the volunteer system.

On May 20 of this year the Army decided to secure 15,000 recruits by June 30. More than sufficient men responded for the 3-year enlistment.

On July 1 the Army decided to secure 38,000 recruits by August 31. The period is only half gone yet more than 30,000 actual enlistment records have been received in Washington to date. With the records that still remain in the recruiting offices throughout the country there is no doubt but that the quota will be reached long before the date set. In June of this year we had the largest peacetime enlistment in the whole history of the Republic, and, mind you, these boys enlisted for 3 years at only $21 per month. Give the youth of America the opportunity of enlisting for 1 year at $30 per month and I am convinced that the Republic will not want for patriotic defenders. We will get them faster than we can provide adequate shelter and certainly we want no tent army this winter with its resulting epidemic of influenza and death.

Like the Army, the Navy has had all the volunteers it has called for to date even though every one of them had to enlist for 6 years.

When the volunteer system fails, then, and then only, should Congress conscript and regiment the youth of this free land. Some may say it will be too late but that is pure fallacy. The very day the first gun is made with no one to use it, conscription could be placed in operation. If many who now cry for conscription had prevailed, Congress would have adjourned 2 months ago and our threatened Nation would have had neither my bill nor the conscription bill. Those of us who demanded that Congress remain in session must be given credit for the defense steps since, as otherwise they could not have been taken.

There are some who say that conscription is necessary because otherwise patriotic toolmakers and others who are essential for national defense will volunteer for lesser service in the Army. Let them worry no further. I have incorporated into my bill the exact provision of the conscription bill designed to prevent such a result. Under my bill the Army and Navy can reject a volunteer whose time is needed elsewhere for a greater service to his country.

There are some who say conscription is the American way, the democratic way. In the future it may become necessary, but God forbid it. It is the way of every dictator in the world. The way of a democracy is a way of free choice, not of regimentation. In a democracy we worship as we please. We go to bed at 9 o'clock or we go at 12. We go to a show or we stay at home. The blessings of a democracy include the right of free choice and willing service to the Government we have built. Let us give the youth of our land a chance to defend the Nation voluntarily before we resort to conscription.

Give young men a chance to decide the day they can enlist without destroying their plans for education and employment.

That, my friends, is the real American way.

Canada has been at war for nearly 1 year, yet no conscription bill has been placed into effect. They are now registering under a conscription law that will become effective October 1, but that law is conscription for home defense alone. Canada is at war, yet today there is a waiting list of volunteers. Let us try to get volunteers in the armed service by sensible changes in the present law before we resort to regimentation of every young man in America.

In 6 years, more than two and one-half million boys enlisted in the C. C. C. camps of this country. At least that many more were turned away because of a lack of camp facilities. Congress should enact my bill at once. Give a boy a chance to volunteer for 1 year at the same pay as that of the C. C. C., and I feel certain of the same response from youth in every strata of life. Never in the peacetime history of our Nation have we had conscription. I do not contend that it will never come, but I say the volunteer system should be given a fair and reasonable chance first. It is democratic, it will not deplete industry of valuable men, it will not destroy the plans of youth for education or employment, it will not prevent a Regular Army or Navy of longer enlistments, it will not cast upon youth the stigma of being unpatriotic when facts show they have responded to every call for volunteers that has been made to date.

There is no added danger to the Nation, because always as a last resort stands the European method of conscription.

Two days after I introduced my bill in the House former Secretary of War Woodring, for whom I have the greatest regard, endorsed every principle contained in my bill in a letter to Senator Vandenberg.

The conscription bill may come up for consideration in the Senate before it does in the House. If so, I am sure that some Senator who feels as I do on the subject will offer an amendment in the Senate to provide for a shorter period of voluntary enlistment and increased pay.

I believe every man should have convictions and the courage to defend them. We must not surrender to panic or hysteria, but calmly, deliberately, and with supreme common sense we must build our defenses against every enemy within and every potential enemy without our borders. Our people must be united in their faith in democracy and in their desire and willingness to preserve the American way of life. Congress should be careful not to destroy any part of the old American tradition of free choice unless there is no other way to meet the present emergency. I, together with millions of American fathers and mothers and their sons, am convinced there is another way.

Did a Party Die?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS HERALD

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids Herald of July 30, 1940:

[From the Grand Rapids Herald of July 30, 1940]

DID A PARTY DIE?

Back in 1912 some of us saw an attempt on the part of a Roosevelt to kill the Republican Party. He dismembered it by forming a new party, the Bull Moose. In 1916 some of us saw that party actually die, never to be resurrected. Today a great many persons who attended the Chicago convention of the old Democratic Party are wondering if perhaps we did not see that party die.

It is a fact which cannot be controverted that Jeffersonianism as applied to the Democratic Party did die. Perhaps it was killed as early if not earlier than 1936. It certainly passed out of the picture in Chicago in 1940. What happened and what has been happening during the last 8 years was the absorption of certain elements, the leftwingers of both the Democratic and Republican Parties, by the New Deal. Today the New Deal consists of one man, Franklin D. Roosevelt, who dictates all its policies even to the nomination of himself for the unprecedented and dangerous third term, the nomination of his running mate, and the writing of a platform which he hastened to observe he will interpret as he sees fit. Therefore he alone becomes the platform and the party.

But that isn't all of it. In 1938 Mr. Roosevelt undertook a purge of all those Jeffersonian Democrats who had dared oppose his dictum. He failed because the voters refused to stand with him. But in Chicago he was entirely successful. He ignored all the Democrats, surrounded himself only with the left wingers, the New Deal, and drove out all Democrats who went to Chicago in the belief that they were to attend a Democratic National Convention.

Only the votes of the people in November really can kill the Democratic Party. The New Deal stuck the knife in its back in Chicago. If the people in November reelect Franklin D. Roosevelt, if they obey his dictum, then they will have killed the Democratic Party and set up in its stead the New Deal over which Mr. Roosevelt has declared himself the dictator. If those who attended the Chicago convention didn't see actually the death of the Democratic Party, they did see at least the stab in the back which may cause the death.

JUST SUPPOSING

Henry A. Wallace, who was nominated for Vice President at the recent Chicago convention of the New Deal Party, who was named at the demand of President Roosevelt and who was so bitterly opposed by perhaps a majority of the delegates that he collected boos every time his name was mentioned, was opposed not so much because he was Wallace or even because his nomination was dictated by the big boss of the convention and of the party as because of the implications which go along with the nomination and the possible election of him as Vice President of the United States. Wallace, himself, is a fine chap of a sort of mystic type, one who does a lot of dreaming, is not at all practical, who would reform the entire world along social and economic lines. But it must be remembered that the Vice President succeeds to the Presidency in case of a vacancy in the Executive Office.

It never is nice to speculate on a man's possible death. Yet we must admit that death comes to us all in due course. Supposing that Roosevelt and Wallace should be elected this fall. And supposing that, unhappily, the President, worn by the cares of his office—and he shows clearly what has happened to him in the last 7 years—should die or become incapacitated. Or supposing that in a year or two, after the European war is over, he should decide that the country no longer needs him and should resign. Be it remembered that such a suggestion was made at Chicago in the effort to calm the revolt which so many could see coming. Suppose for one or another reason a vacancy should occur in the office of the Chief Executive. Then automatically Mr. Wallace would succeed to that office. Not one man in a thousand who knows Mr. Wallace ever would vote for him for President. The Democratic Convention, even under the lash of Mr. Roosevelt, could not have forced the delegates to have nominated Wallace for the Presidency. Mr. Wallace definitely is not Presidential timber. Few, even of his friends, would claim he is. More than that, Mr. Wallace is far more New Dealish than is the President. Indeed, Mr. Wallace is a radical who perhaps is not far from "red" tendencies. With him in the White House the administration of Mr. Roosevelt would look most reactionary. We would see radicalism such as we in America never dreamed. We would see this Government entirely transformed so far as he might be able to transform it. We would find ourselves controlled, regimented, socialized far more than the President dares even propose.

It is that very fear, more perhaps than any other one thing, which caused such bitter resentment against the nomination of Wallace. It was the feeling, because of the feelers which had been sent out, that when the fall election rolls around Democrats will actually be voting for Wallace for President rather than for Roosevelt. And Wallace as President is unthinkable to all but the most radical element in the United States. Roosevelt in this campaign is only a phantom who may voluntarily or involuntarily be removed from the Presidency, if elected, long before the end of his term. It was that, more than all other considerations, which prompted the bitter opposition to Wallace.

Townsend Voters League Commends Congressmen Who Supported Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. R. T. BUCKLER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which was sent out by L. W. Jeffery, executive secretary of the Townsend National Voters League, 450 East Ohio Street, Chicago, Ill., to the Townsend clubs in the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, which I am privileged to represent in the United States House of Representatives. Dr. F. E. Townsend is chairman of this organization, and I am personally gratified to receive the mention given me in the communication. The letter referred to dated July 11, 1940, is as follows:

To all Townsend clubs and members in the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota:

Secretaries: Please read at your next meeting.

DEAR FRIENDS: On June 1, 1939, certain Members of the United States Congress voted for legislation embodying the principles of the Townsend plan. We are proud to advise you that the Honorable R. T. BUCKLER was one of the men who voted for our measure.

During this past session of Congress he not only supported our bill, but has worked for its enactment. He has done all that he could for us in Washington, and now comes the opportunity when we can demonstrate to him that we appreciate what he has done.

We believe that every member of our organization should not only vote for Mr. BUCKLER, but should work to secure as many additional votes for him as it is possible for them to do.

Campaigns are won by individual work. Contact your friends and acquaintances and ask them to work and vote for Mr. BUCKLER. Here is your opportunity to demonstrate to Mr. BUCKLER that the Townsendites are behind him and are willing to put forth their best efforts to see him nominated.

Very sincerely yours,

L. W. JEFFERY,
Executive Secretary.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. NICHOLAS ATLAS

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an address delivered by Hon. Nicholas Atlas, assistant district attorney of New York County, and member of the grand lodge law committee, Knights of Pythias, domain of New York, delivered June 28, 1940, over station WHOM, on the Independence Day program of the grand lodge of that order:

It is very good that this program of celebration of our country's one hundred and sixty-fourth birthday comes in advance of the day fixed by the choice and practice of our people for such celebration, July 4. It is good that we celebrate and commemorate the great day, as we do, now, before we lose in the din of festive cannonade and the cries of joyous huzzahing the opportunity for a moment's sincere thinking about the meaning of this birthday, the meaning of our nation-hood and ideals and independence, at a time when for so many other nations their birthdays are no longer meaningful. It is good that amid the swell of patriotic feeling engendered by the occasion there should be sober thought and expression of what this feeling, what our patriotism means. For sober thought and cautious judgment, and also an earnest search for the right and the moral, and not youthful and unconsidered revolt for the sake of revolt, fathered our independence and our nation-hood.

To me this is very significant. Our Declaration of Independence, beautiful in its language and poetically rich with the rarest, most religious, and patriotic sentiments of mankind, was not a defiance but an explanation. Before our democracy was established, it showed that our democracy already existed. It was not so much a declaration of the intentions of our ancestors—in blood or in thought, what matter, they are our ancestors—intentions already long in the hearts of those who made and fought our Revolution, as it was an honorable statement of the reasons for their conduct, made democratically to their neighbors in all the world, a statement decrying force, but acknowledging its necessity, acknowledging too that force, if used, must be justifiably used, justly used, used on the basis only of reason—a report upon their actions, to the world at large. The author of that declaration, Jefferson, who died on July 4, puts the words into the original of the great document itself: "A decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they (the Americans) should declare the causes which impel them * * *", to the separation from their then oppressors.

The great Declaration, therefore, is a demonstration of the rectitude and probity of purpose that actuated the founders. The important part of it is, the reasons advanced, full of nobility, for the declaration of the independence of the colonies. The Declaration itself might well have remained and been effective in the form in which, on June 7, 1776, it was introduced in the Continental Congress by Richard Henry Lee. But it was a desire for just dealing and fair elucidation of purpose that caused the postponement of Lee's resolution for 3 weeks so that "in the meantime a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration to the effect of the said first resolution"; and added is a note to show the stress of the moment, "lest any time should be lost in case the Congress agree to this resolution."

Thus, in the moment of stress they found time to be right—in their struggle for a desirable end they found the necessity of justifying that end in the light of universal morality, and in their battle they relinquished no bit of the honesty and the good character they had from their ancestral code of fair play and devout Biblical religion.

And, knowing this and reading the Declaration, we know, too, that they were moved not by a desire for power, nor by avarice and rapaciousness, but only by a desire to live their own life as free men under God, at their own expense, not at the expense of others; by their own toil and effort, not by the theft of the fruits of another's toil and effort or of that toil and effort itself; by a desire to live free from the oppression of another people, not by the oppression of another people.

We may proudly relate today that throughout all our history since that day the lover of power for its own sake has been absent from our deliberations as a Nation, from our work as a people.

"Of all our passions and appetites," says Gibbon, "the love of power is of the most imperious and unsociable nature, since the pride of one man requires the submission of the multitude. In the tumult of civil discord the laws of society lose their force, and their peace is seldom supplied by those of humanity. The ardour of contention, the pride of victory, the despair of success, the memory of past injuries, and the fear of future dangers, all contribute to inflame the mind, and to silence the voice of pity."

We are not filled with this love. Our minds are not inflamed and we have shunned the tumult. We have not sought the suppression of multitudes. No. On the contrary—being lovers of democracy and democracy being what it is, we have sought always to bring the one man forward; to make government for the benefit of all men, to be sure, but for the benefit of the one man, 130,000,000 replicas of whom are the Nation.

Democracy remembers the one man. The lesson of today must be, that the one man must remember democracy. He must remember it as his protection:

"Pray for the welfare of the Kingdom," said a Talmud sage "for were it not for that men would swallow each other alive."

He—this one man—must remember democracy as his heritage of life. He must remember it by supporting it and realize that all of its support must come from his individual loyalty, devotion, honesty, selflessness in its benefit, in short his good character.

Can there be patriotism in a democracy other than this, that each man's good character and good will are the bond given by him for the maintenance and continuance of the general weal? Men are not angels, but in a democracy they must approximate in their conduct an ideal which the ideal of democracy demands. Our striving must be therefore for the attainment in our characters and conduct of a state which John Adams, another patriot who died on July 4, the same day as Jefferson, has described.

He wrote:

"Oh, that I could wear out of my mind every mean and base affectation; conquer my natural pride and self-conceit; expect no more deference from my fellows than I deserve; acquire that meekness and humility which are the sure mark and characters of a great and generous soul; subdue every unworthy passion; and treat all men as I wish to be treated by all."

A democracy needs men. A dictatorship—or, to use an older and perhaps more respectable word, a tyranny—needs but a man. A democracy exists for and belongs to its men. A dictatorship only for and to its man.

Now more than ever in our history we need in our democracy, always richly endowed in men, men and more men, not mere human beings, but men of good purpose and good character and good will—truthworthy, loyal—helpful, friendly—courteous, kind—obedient to the authority they themselves have constituted and which they constitute, an authority duly, justly constituted within their own basic law—cheerful, thrifty men—brave men and clean, in body, thought, acts—comradely men—and reverent men, revering the democracy they uphold, revering God, and revering the worship of God, their own and that of others, respecting in their sublime respect for God and their democracy and the opinions of mankind, also each other, each his fellow in the great mass that makes this excellent whole. We need such men at the helm—we need such men in the ranks. In a democratic community where many are joined of their own free will all must be self-reliant, all reliable and reliably devoted to each other and to the voluntary association they have formed for the universal good.

Do we want these men for war and slaughter? Take no fright. We want and need these men for war and life. We want them for war on the home front. That is not a war of planes and tanks and gunfire and death. It is a war for an ideal—a war to be fought by living democracy and making democracy work—strongly, quickly, efficiently, the combined strength, speed, and efficiency of 130,000,- 000 souls with a single devotion, a single purpose—to persist by being strong within, and hale, by being strong and victorious against those who wish us ill.

What do we ask of each other, then, in our democracy? A devotion to its ideals and aims, to its common background and history of honesty and integrity of purpose, to its flag and symbols, and its language—above all, the devotion of every citizen to the other and a sublime sportsmanship—a recognition of the weaker man's right to life and its pursuits—the stronger man's forbearance while the weaker collects himself for the fray of living—the stronger man's provision of protection for the weaker for those times and events which, it is known, the weaker cannot survive without help—the recognition by the powerful that the feeble are a part of the community who in their feebleness may play the mouse to the lion and contribute nimbleness and wit and industry to support the strong man's freedom to act in the common good and guard the common home—a recognition by the weaker of his part and an effort by him to do what he can under nature to lighten the burden of all—a search and battle for greater fitness than only the necessary physical fitness for the creation and establishment of universal fitness—a reinterpretation of the words "survival of the fittest" to mean that all working together can be fit to survive—to exercise, not tolerance alone, but understanding—at worst, decent forbearance for differences in others, for things we may even dislike—to love one's neighbor.

In short, on the birthday of our country we call upon each other for unity—for integrity of the united purpose—for good character of the individual—the whole to constitute an armor to defend us within and, therefore, victoriously to defend us, if need be, without.

In contributing men of good character to this great scheme of our being may the Pythian order always have a large and generous hand.

Adjustment of Army Pay

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE BY MAJ. GEORGE FIELDING ELIOT

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am including in my remarks a statement of Maj. George Fielding Eliot printed in the New York Herald Tribune on the need for adjustment of Army pay to spur recruiting. Nothing is more important at this time than a review of the Army situation and its effect on recruiting.

MAJOR ELIOT URGES ADJUSTMENT OF ARMY PAY TO SPUR RECRUITING

(By Maj. George Fielding Eliot)

While recruiting for the Regular Army remains upon a voluntary basis, it is very largely influenced by what the Army has to offer the young men of America as a career. It is not generally realized that in this respect the Army is greatly inferior to the Navy, but the young man who is considering entering some branch of the armed service finds this out quickly enough when he looks into the matter before making his decision. Hence the lag in Army recruiting.

He discovers that if he goes into either service he will start at the same basic rate of pay, $21 a month. Thereafter, however, things are very different. The Navy recruit continues to receive $21 only for about 3 months, the time he spends in the training station. Presuming that he elects the seaman branch, he then goes to sea as a seaman, second class, at $36 a month. After serving in that grade for a year, and passing a qualifying examination, he can be promoted to seaman, at $54 a month, and thereafter at yearly intervals, subject to examination and to vacancies, can rise through the petty-officer grades till he reaches Grade I (chief petty officer on permanent appointment) at a base rate of $126 a month.

The Army recruit has no such cheerful prospects before him. When he is through with the recruit depot he goes to a unit, but he continues to receive $21 until vacancies make room for him in the grade of private first class, which may be a long time; then he gets $30. Later on he may be selected to become a noncommissioned officer—and as a corporal he will get $42 a month. He will not overtake the Navy seaman, at $54, until he has reached the grade of sergeant, which may be in his second enlistment or even later.

It is only fair to add that the Army recruit has two advantages which the Navy does not provide. He may qualify for "specialist pay," which may run as high as $30 a month, but there are very few of these higher-grade specialists, and almost half of the total number of men with specialist rating are in grade 6, which pays $3 a month extra. Also, the soldier gets a yearly clothing allowance, while the Navy man has to pay for his own clothing after the issue of his initial outfit. This allowance gives the soldier somewhere in the neighborhood of $2 a month, and what he does not draw in clothing he gets in cash at the end of his enlistment. The average savings are from $45 to $70 for a 3-year enlistment. These items by no means make up for the inequalities in pay.

But when we come to examine the opportunities for promotion, the dice are even more heavily weighted in favor of the Navy. Less than 1 percent of the Army's enlisted men are in grade 1 (at $126), while almost 8 percent of the Navy's are in that grade. Between 8 and 9 percent of the Army's enlisted men are in the first three grades (at $126, $84, and $72, respectively) while about 37 percent of the Navy's enlisted men are in those grades.

For promotion to the rank of warrant officer, the Navy recruit has about four times the chance of the Army recruit; and when he does get this promotion, the Army man finds himself limited to a possible maximum monthly pay and allowances of $243 after 20 years' service, and to a maximum pay and allowances on retirement of $138.75, while the Navy warrant officer after 20 years' service will be getting $356 with further raises still possible and his maximum on retirement is $281.25, more than twice that of the Army.

This whole state of affairs has arisen from the time when it was possible for the Navy to say that they required a high percentage of technicians who could be given specialist training of various sorts, and in order to retain such men in the service they had to have high rates of pay. There is, however, no longer any distinction between Army and Navy in this respect. The Army is just as highly mechanized and just as much in need of high-grade men as the Navy.

If we are to have a first-class Army raised in whole or in part by voluntary enlistment, we must see to it that the Army is made attractive as a career. In order to do this, certain immediate steps are necessary.

First, the pay of enlisted men, and opportunities for promotion (i. e., percentages in the various grades) must be placed on an equal basis with the Navy, as far as voluntary enlisted personnel is concerned. (If we come to conscription, much lower rates for conscripted personnel in either service might be envisaged.) Pay for specialist qualifications can be equalized between the two services (the Navy now has some extra-pay jobs as well as the Army). The clothing allowance might well be extended to the Navy, on an equitable basis, after study of respective average wear and tear.

Second, when this is done, the whole question of service pay can be taken up anew and studied with a view to making the services completely attractive with civil occupations. One great obstacle in the way of such revision to date has been the Army's insistence on equality with the Navy as a prerequisite, while the Navy has desired a unilateral increase.

Third, the Army must have a warrant officers' corps equal in proportionate number and in professional standing to that of the Navy. These warrant officers could perform many routine duties and could relieve commissioned officers for their main task of preparing themselves for command in war. Incidentally, an increase of Navy warrant officers would be well worth considering on the latter grounds.

What About the Monroe Doctrine Now?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM R. CASTLE

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article written by William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State and former Ambassador to Japan, entitled "What About the Monroe Doctrine Now?" and appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of July 27, 1940. Mr. Castle's article follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of July 27, 1940]

WHAT ABOUT THE MONROE DOCTRINE NOW?

(By William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State and former Ambassador to Japan)

One man says the trouble with articles on the Monroe Doctrine is that they take for granted you know all about why it started and what it is. The next man says that papers about the Monroe Doctrine are always boring, because writers stop to explain what the doctrine is, when everybody knows already. To satisfy both is impossible, but, since people dispute endlessly, and generally ignorantly, about the meaning of the Monroe Doctrine, and since many assert as indisputable a lot of things which have absolutely nothing to do with it, a few words of clarification and historical background are necessary—but only a few.

Early in the nineteenth century there was a spirit of liberty abroad in the world which came into violent opposition with the dying spirit of reaction and oppression, just as today the spirit of reaction, as typified by the dictatorships, is clashing with the still vigorous if sadly disorganized spirit of freedom. The various colonies of Spain and the one great colony of Portugal in the Western Hemisphere were forcibly breaking away from the mother countries, and Americans, who had only recently won their own freedom from Great Britain, were enthusiastic for the revolting colonies. They had a vision of a new hemisphere made up of republics of similar ideals, trading happily together, understanding one another, and together building a wonderful new world. But these new nations had to be protected until they could look after themselves. So the idea of the Monroe Doctrine was born.

President Monroe, in 1823, notified the world that the United States would tolerate no interference with the new republics of the Western Hemisphere. It was a bold thing for this young Nation, hardly out of swaddling clothes, to defy such states as Russia, Austria, and France. But, except for one or two fumbling and half-hearted attempts, the countries across the Atlantic have not even tried to find out for sure whether we meant what we said.

People say that England was the first to propose hands off the new republics. This is not true. As far back as 1811, Congress passed a resolution concerning European possessions to the south of us which said, in part, "The United States * * * cannot, without serious inquietude, see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign power." At the same time, there had been much talk of recognizing as independent nations the colonies in revolt against Spain, but England would not join with us, and as the months passed, sober American judgment decided against hasty action. There was too much danger of war as a consequence. Our ancestors of those days felt even more vigorously than we feel today that we had better keep out of Europe's quarrels. The colonies had been involved in one war after another, just because nations holding American territory were fighting in Europe. The Holy Alliance was busy meddling in matters which were none of its business, and now, in 1823, it began to look westward at the revolted Spanish colonies. So President Monroe, in his annual message to Congress, included certain sentences which he had little idea would become one of the cornerstones of American foreign policy.

What is this Monroe Doctrine which was so ably sketched by President Monroe and his irascible Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams? It was a plain statement to Europe that "the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers." And, Monroe went on to say, "In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense."

Monroe then expressed the American disapproval of European systems of government and declared that "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portions of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." We had no intention of interfering, he said, with any existing European colonies. "But, with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have * * * acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States." And a little later in the message: "It is impossible that the allied powers [Russia, Austria, Prussia, and France] should extend their political system to any portion of either [American] continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord."

That is all there is to the Monroe Doctrine. It is a warning to Europe to leave this hemisphere alone. It does not give and never has given the United States any right to interfere in the internal affairs of the other nations of the two continents; it is merely an assertion on our part that we are not going to permit them to be gobbled up or forced to change their forms of republican government. How much effect this had at the time will never be known. What was clear to Europe was that England had wanted to make this doctrine in the form of a joint declaration; that it was sympathetic with the American stand; and that the British fleet would be likely to make any expedition across the Atlantic very hazardous. People in England did not know that John Quincy Adams was thinking only of the United States when he rejected the British suggestion of a joint declaration.

He did not want Britain to be guaranteeing anything on the American continents. That would cause trouble in the future. Also, there was a mild phrase in the British suggestion which probably worried him. Referring to the revolted Spanish colonies, it said, "We aim not at the possession of any portion of them ourselves." Adams was afraid that England would not keep its word and was equally afraid we should. There was a strong popular feeling in favor of annexing Cuba, and there were rumblings in the Southwest which presaged the Mexican War and the annexation of California. Young and lusty nations do not like self-denying ordinances. In his care for his country, as against all other interests, Adams has often been called the "first isolationst."

A TWOFOLD PURPOSE

The inspiration of the Monroe Doctrine was warm sympathy for the new States; its motive was the determination to protect ourselves from alien and hostile influences. It could not give the United States any rights over the Latin American nations, was not even addressed to them. If the nations of Latin America could have realized this, and if Americans who falsely claimed that the Monroe Doctrine gave them authority to be domineering could have been suppressed, there never would have been anywhere any violent opposition to the doctrine. There would have been no excuse for prominent members of the Administration to urge that the Monroe Doctrine be replaced by the good-neighbor policy. As a matter of fact, these two policies went hand in hand for a hundred years. Neither can replace the other, because the Monroe Doctrine is simply an assertion by us of our intentions; the good-neighbor policy can give us no protection, because it has become a one-way policy, is all giving and no taking. We have turned the other cheek so often that both are inflamed.

During its long history, the Monroe Doctrine has never been seriously challenged. It is true that the French set up a monarchy in Mexico during our Civil War, when they knew we were helpless. The Mexicans themselves disposed of the new regime, but the French were prepared to retreat promptly when we suggested it. The British and the Germans at different times made a pretense of ignoring the doctrine, but when Cleveland and later Theodore Roosevelt put on a bold front, they gave up without pushing their aims further and without bad feeling. What, then, has today raised the question as to whether we shall or shall not maintain the Monroe Doctrine as formulated? It has been a tremendous success. Why change?

One reason urged for giving it up is that the Latin American republics are full grown and able to protect themselves. Many South American states say that our promise of protection should be replaced by a contract among all the nations of the hemisphere to work together to repel foreign invasion. The United States could have no objection to such a contract, but neither could it give up the Monroe Doctrine, at least so far as certain parts of the continent are concerned. It must be drummed into people again and again that the purpose of President Monroe was twofold—to protect the new states while they grew up and, above all, to protect his own country. We might today agree on common hemispherical defense, but if it were necessary for us to act alone for our own defense, we should have to do it.

For example, let us imagine, if we can, that the other states of Latin America are for some reason out of sympathy with Mexico, and consider anyhow that the doings of Mexico, at the tip of the Latin American bloc, do not much concern them. Let us imagine also that Hitler is worried over the growing popularity of Goering, wants to get him out of Germany, but at the same time to give him a job elsewhere. So he instructs the "fifth column" to do intensive preparatory work in Mexico, sends some officers to train and at the same time seduce the Mexican Army, and finally engineer a revolution which would put Goering in control of the country. This may sound fantastic, but Napoleon III did much the same thing, and anyhow Hitler's plans are unpredictable. Argentina and Brazil might not much care, but it would certainly interest the United States a great deal. We should have to move quickly, and we should move under the Monroe Doctrine. We can afford to share the responsibility of the protection of other nations; we cannot possibly sell out our responsibility to protect ourselves.

A second reason advanced for a change in the Monroe Doctrine is the revolution in Europe. European holdings in the hemisphere have not much bothered us in the past, but if they should be turned over to Germany, they would instantly become at least a potential menace. As a third reason, it is pointed out that increased speed of communications of all kinds has brought Europe to our very door. The oceans have shrunk, and this fact changes completely the whole question of defense. Last and most important reason is the existence of the Panama Canal, our canal, vital for us from a naval point of view and, moreover, a canal for which we are trustees to the world.

THE LATIN AMERICAN HERITAGE

We must think about all these things. We must also ask ourselves how much we can count on the friendly cooperation of the American republics. We might just as well be realistic and admit that they have no particular affection for us and that most of them are dictatorships in fact, although still republics in name. In cases of disagreement between the United States and Europe, Latin American sympathies have generally been with Europe. Their heritage is very different from ours. What part, then, if any, of the geographical extent of the Monroe Doctrine can we afford to give up?

It is not hard to understand why great nations like Argentina and Brazil are annoyed at the suggestion of inferiority implied in our promise to defend them. Yet, with the profound changes that modern inventions have brought, they may need our help more than at any time during the past 100 years. Nevertheless, might it not be possible and the part of wisdom to say to all these nations whose independence, because of distance, is not vital to our safety, "In face of new scientific developments which have cut the protection of the ocean, we of the Western Hemisphere must all stand together to maintain our independence. We in the United States may need your assistance as much as you may need ours. If you think such forebodings are unjustified, you are wholly at liberty to withdraw from all cooperation, but in those circumstances you will have to excuse us from any obligation to come to your assistance. If you agree, on the other hand, that we should all stand together, it must be a real working arrangement. Every one of us, in accord with capacity, must create his share of the defense forces, must build such engines of war as he can afford. The United States would expect you to give free access to your airports and your harbors for our fighting ships of air and sea, to permit the landing of American troops in your territory if this seems necessary for defense. In this, we should, of course, reciprocate.

No man can prophesy which course the different nations would choose. It can only be said that if Argentina, for example, refused such wholehearted cooperation, it would ease the armament burden of the United States to the extent that we should not have to send our fleet so far to the south. If Argentina accepted, we should welcome its cooperation with delight, because such cooperation would be more likely than anything else to curb the predatory instincts of some overambitious nation. Also, to look at the other side of the picture, we should have to admit to ourselves that any nation refusing to cooperate would bring on itself the risk of more potent and dangerous European influences. That is why we might offer to surrender the principles of the Monroe Doctrine only in the case of really distant nations, in all probability only Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, and Chile.

In our present hysterical state we forget that the danger of direct military attack by a foreign nation on any one of the American nations is highly improbable at any time, and inconceivable just now. You cannot send armies too far from their base of supplies, nor can you transport armies across an ocean when such transport is sure to involve collision with a strong navy. How comparatively impotent was the whole force of concentrated German air attack on the huddled vessels in the Channel during the evacuation of Dunkerque!

ECONOMIC PENETRATION

What is more likely than the coming of foreign armies is the imposition, sometime in the future, of European systems of government by means of influences working within the different countries, either Communist or Fascist. This cannot be an immediate danger, whatever one hears, because the "fifth column" can be dangerously effective only when its way has been prepared economically. If the most lucrative trade relations are with Germany, national sentiment will inevitably be more or less pro-German and the words of the propagandists will appear beneficent rather than poisonous. But dangerous as such influences may be in the future, we have no right under the Monroe Doctrine to interfere with an alien organization permitted to operate in a country, or with the form of government or the internal and domestic arrangements of any country in this hemisphere any more than anywhere else, unless we can prove that its government was imposed from abroad and against the popular will.

It is possible to imagine that the Germans of Brazil who, although they number only 300,000 among 45,000,000, might, especially with the aid of the dictatorial government now in power, seduce the million or more thoroughly naturalized Italians as well as a majority of the Portuguese and Indians of the country. A Nazi Government in Brazil would immediately form the closest connections with the Nazis in Germany. Yet if such a government apparently represented the will of the majority of the people of Brazil, there is not a thing in the world that we could legally do about it. Neither the Monroe Doctrine nor international law would permit interference. Equally difficult would be our problem if the more radical elements in Chile should establish there a Communist Government in close cooperation with the Soviet. We could not protest, unless we had conclusive proof that the change had been dictated by Moscow, and not even then if the people of Chile were satisfied.

Cases such as these point clearly to the value of an understanding with the great nations of South America, particularly since such an understanding would bring them closer to one another as well as to us. The Germanizing of Uruguay or the sovietizing of Chile is as important to Argentina as are similar movements in Mexico to us. If, in such crises, American property were confiscated and American lives jeopardized, we could intervene under the general principles of international law, but this would be inconsistent, to say the least, with our recent record in Mexico. We should also be hampered by the extraordinary promise made when our Government signed in Montevideo a treaty with all the American republics promising that there would never be resort to force at any time, under any circumstances, or for any reason. Whatever we do, we shall be denounced as treaty breakers.

If, then, changes in the Monroe Doctrine, as applied to these distant nations, seem advisable, the first thing to do would be to agree on a revision of recent pan-American treaties, thus opening the way for possible new agreements. Even the Secretary of State admits their obscurity. It might then be deemed wise to negotiate with such of the nations as so desire, outside the sphere which we must consider our safety zone, an agreement for full and friendly cooperation to prevent foreign penetration. We could not exercise coercion. Any nation might hold back, but in this case the United States would no longer offer the protection of the Monroe Doctrine. Probably the penguins of Patagonia would have little interest in who protected them, but it would be of immense interest to us to know whether our war vessels would have to patrol that remote and dangerous coast.

Those who have recently been made hysterical by the propaganda that Germany is on tiptoe to attack us would shout that it is folly to exclude any portion of the hemisphere from the operations of the Monroe Doctrine. They forget that good will among the nations of the continent is a greater safeguard of peace than are any regulations. They forget that Germany is far nearer to us than is Argentina. It probably has planes which could attack us now, across the ocean, but such an attack could have no conceivable value, even from the Nazi point of view. In any case, why send these planes thousands of miles out of the way? People remember, of course, those short and easy stages recited by the President in one of his recent addresses, the beautiful airfields already prepared for our potential enemies in Brazil and Venezuela and Colombia and Mexico, leading by pleasant steps—was it to Omaha?

It is one of the techniques of propaganda that people will remember, but will not think. If these same people used their wits, might it not occur to them that the Latin American nations mentioned in that Presidential catalog might well resent the assumption that they were helpless pawns, to be used by Germany at will in carrying out an attack against the United States? Even President Vargas, of Brazil, with all his enthusiasm for the totalitarians, might object. It is more probable that the Germans—by perfecting uranium 235, for example—could invent airplanes with an enormous cruising radius with far greater ease than they could persuade these countries to join them against the United States. There may shortly be marvelous scientific discoveries which will bring Buenos Aires as near as Mexico City, which will change all the problems of the Monroe Doctrine as well as everything else; but if we predicate our national defense on the marvels which science may, sometime, somewhere evolve, we shall never build up any national defense at all. You cannot prepare yourself in advance against something as yet unknown.

THE NEED FOR REALISM

It is probable that, with the horror of the war in mind and a clear picture of Nazi methods before us, most nations of the hemisphere would recognize that pride and distrust of one another must give way to the need really to stand together to resist penetration from abroad; that the time has come to translate the vaguely benevolent terms of the Declaration of Lima into binding agreements to cooperate to the fullest extent in self-defense. There is more chance to make such agreements now than there may be ever again. The destruction of Poland and Norway and Belgium and Holland and the brutal attack on Finland strike horror to the hearts and minds of our Latin American neighbors as they do to our own. But if Germany wins the war, there are many who will forget the horrors and remember the victories, and that shockingly soon. The enlarged German Empire will be the best market for Latin American products. Because memory is so short, the fear of today will give way to the grateful admiration of tomorrow. Every government will be convinced that, whatever happened to European states, any American nation can easily defend itself against Nazi penetration and control. Looking forward to that time, which may come sooner than we think, we must ourselves decide quickly whether we shall continue to enforce the Monroe Doctrine as it stands, or modify or renounce it. Unfortunately, whatever decision is reached now will be because of the German threat. This is not the best atmosphere in which to reach grave decisions, but it is the atmosphere in which we must live for some time to come.

We in the United States must immediately take stock both of our commitments and of our capacities. We must be wholly realistic. We must not hold to a commitment merely because it is traditional unless we are prepared and also fully able to back it up. It may be that today complete protection of the two continents, however great our good will, is beyond our capacity, especially if attacks from abroad come simultaneously in the form of internal revolutions. And this is undoubtedly how they would come.

Our Navy is admittedly inadequate to defend both continents if we must patrol the Pacific as well as the Atlantic. We could have had the Japanese Navy on our side, because the Japanese understand that friendship with us is more important than with any other nation. Now that Navy is a practical enemy, because we have continually goaded Japan until it is turning even toward its traditional enemy, Russia. We must therefore double our own Navy or fall down on our commitments. We must also look forward to immense increases in our air forces and in our Army—all three together, perhaps, beyond our financial capacity—if we are to protect all of both continents. If that seems impossible, we must at all costs fulfill the obligations of the Monroe Doctrine as they apply to those regions of the two continents on which our own safety depends. Unless we are prepared to do this, we are making an admission of impotence. Our own safety, of course, includes the safety of the Panama Canal. The existence of this great waterway doubles our responsibility for the safety from alien domination of large territories in South America which, were it not for the Canal, would be as unimportant for our defense as is the southern tip of the continent.

This is why it may be the part of wisdom to modify the Monroe Doctrine, frankly urging Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, and Brazil to build up their own defense and share with us in protecting the hemisphere. So far, whatever their protestations, they have depended on the protection of the despised Monroe Doctrine. The time has come for them to be realistic and honest with themselves, just as we must be with ourselves. The moment they take their full part in their own protection and that of their immediate neighbors, the United States will be proportionately more able to defend that region which is made up of smaller states, far less able to defend themselves, but on which our own safety and that of the Canal depends. This region extends roughly from the Rio Grande to a line across South America some hundreds of miles south of Panama.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN TASK

Here we should have an even more difficult diplomatic task, because our demands for cooperation would have to be so all-inclusive that we should immediately be accused of imperialism. Under that accusation it would be our difficult task to prove to them that we do not want any of their territory; that we do not want in any way to interfere with their politics or their form of government; that we have no desire to dominate them economically and have no right whatever to dictate with whom they shall trade. We promise them an absolute guaranty of independence. But this being understood, we should have to insist that, in time of war, or when attacks from abroad seem imminent, we must have the right to use their airports, even to send troops across their countries to protect them and us. We should also have to get their agreement to accept our help, if necessary, to prevent foreign political penetration which might be attempted in peacetime.

Look at one more possible example, remembering that all examples are purely hypothetical.

Imagine that Mexico falls more and more under the influence of the Soviet; that the country swarms with Communist agents; that Moscow supplies money to the "red" government which comes naturally into power. We could do nothing about it, since the form of Mexico's government is none of our business.

If, however, the Soviet Government went even further, leased sites for airplane factories and for airports near our border; organized armies with the ill-concealed purpose of attacking the United States or of annexing to Communist Mexico the Central American states, thus clearly threatening the Canal, this country could not and would not sit quietly by. We should act partly under the Monroe Doctrine, which obliges us to repel foreign invasion, but primarily under the primitive law of self-defense.

If it ever came to the point that positive action had to be taken, we should always welcome the assistance and the sympathy of the rest of Latin America, but it would be dishonest to say that we should sit by and see our own safety undermined, even if that assistance and sympathy were not forthcoming. We should always deplore the use of force, but we cannot jeopardize our own liberty or let the Canal be destroyed just because we are afraid to be criticized. It is never the time to forget courtesy, but it is the time to forget the honeyed words that we have got into the habit of using with our Latin American neighbors and instead to talk with them as equals. It is time to drop the ultrabenevolent attitude, which is condescending, subtly domineering, and never quite sincere, and to get down to brass tacks. We intend freely to use our resources for the protection of this continent as well as for our own protection. We believe also that each nation should assume its share of responsibility in whatever way is most effective. In some cases this will mean the pouring out of national treasure, material and spiritual. In other cases, it will mean hardly more than giving freely and cordially the temporary use of facilities such as airports and docks to the ships of the United States which are being used in the defense of the liberties of all of us. We cannot possibly hope to achieve in common unless we are willing to sacrifice in common.

And, finally, what of Canada and the British, French, and Dutch possessions in the hemisphere? President Monroe said in his message to Congress, "With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere." The reason for the specific exclusion of these dependencies from the operation of the Monroe Doctrine is clear enough. We wanted to keep Europe out of this hemisphere in order that we might be free of European quarrels. A situation of fact had to be met then as it has to be met in these perilous times, and circumstances may force us to a different treatment. President Roosevelt's public announcement that we should permit no foreign power to attack Canada was not only an enlargement of the Monroe Doctrine; it was a contradiction. By adopting Canada into the Monroe Doctrine the President was flouting its whole purpose. So far as he was able he was committing us to take part in any war in which Great Britain might be engaged.

What made matters worse was that the world knew the President had Germany in mind as the possible attacking power. This made the remark, which was apparently quite casual, provocative as well as uncalled for. One might expect a dictator carelessly to commit his nation to possible war, but one does not expect it from a constitutional chief of state. Obviously the United States could not stand by while some antagonistic foreign power established itself in Canada. Threatening airports there would be as dangerous as in Mexico. But the wise nation, like the wise man, does not boast about what drastic measures will be taken if this or that happens. Threats are breeders of war.

The fact remains that, whether or not States can be put under the operation of the Monroe Doctrine by a casual remark of the President, we cannot possibly permit a victorious Germany, or any other predatory power, to control either Canada or the European possessions lying within the sphere of the Panama Canal. Perhaps some formula could be found to persuade Great Britain and France voluntarily to turn over to us their possessions in the West Indies. We must respect British unwillingness to sell territories without the consent of their populations, as this is the only democratic position, but it is probable that the people of Jamaica and Bermuda and the other islands would choose American as against German citizenship. These questions are all hypothetical, since we hope that Germany will not win. They need not be acted on instantly, since, even if Germany wins, it would be too exhausted immediately to engage in a new war with the United States. Only one step we must take instantly if Germany is victorious, and that is to make it utterly clear that seizure of territory belonging to the Allies in the Western Hemisphere will be resisted by all the force we have. In this we slightly extend the Monroe Doctrine, but must act, since all such territory happens to be vital to our own defense.

Somehow or other, all European possessions in the Western Hemisphere should be brought—through agreement, of course, and whatever the outcome of the war—within our defense system. Since the purpose of so including the West Indian islands would be solely for the defense of the Canal, which is of almost as much interest to France and Great Britain as to us, negotiations need not present great difficulties. We should have, primarily, to lease airports, both for training purposes and for use in wartime. This would be a departure from the usual practices of international law, but strange and wonderful things happen almost daily to that elastic web which has been spun out of established customs.

THE CASE OF CANADA

The situation as to Canada is somewhat different because Canada, as a self-governing dominion, makes its own decisions. The Canadians know that we could never permit a European power to occupy territory adjacent to the United States, would face the facts realistically, would welcome our official assurance of support in case of attack, would probably agree also to some kind of mutual-assistance pact. This would all have to be done through treaties or agreements ratified by the Senate and the Canadian Government. In other words, the problem of European possessions in this hemisphere having no relation to the Monroe Doctrine must be settled by negotiation and, so far as we are concerned, as a part of our general defense program.

There are thus two attitudes which we may take today toward the Monroe Doctrine. We can stand by it as it is, try to make it better understood and therefore more acceptable to our neighbors to the south, do our best to carry out its provisions from the Canadian border to Cape Horn. This would mean the doubling of our Navy and an immense permanent air force. If this burden seems too heavy, we still cannot scrap the Doctrine, which is an essential part of our national defense, without substituting something as good. We cannot, for example, scrap the Monroe Doctrine for anything as nebulous as the good-neighbor policy. This would be like substituting butter for steel.

We can, on the other hand, if it seems wise, frankly revise the Monroe Doctrine by negotiating with the A B C powers a really reciprocal basis for defense, recognizing full equality by sharing the burden with them, as they have always said was their desire; at the same time, ever against the relaxation of the Doctrine in southern South America, frankly increase our obligations and responsibilities toward those nations on which depends the safety of the Canal and of continental United States. Any such change would take real statesmanship to accomplish successfully. But it would increase understanding and would make it far less likely that the United States would ever again assume a patronizing attitude. It would give our Latin American friends the self-respect and the self-confidence that come from dealing on an absolutely equal basis. It would not mean that the United States could let up on its preparations for defense.

With the building of the Panama Canal we added to our defense needs a heavy and inescapable burden. In these dangerous days of 1940, however, no self-respecting nation seeks to escape its rightful burdens. Nor must we think for a moment that when the war is over our burden will be less. When that time comes, after providing for our own defense, we must still have strength to go to the aid of a famished and disillusioned world. The long and successful operation of the Monroe Doctrine has helped to make the nations of this Western Hemisphere stronger to bear their responsibilities. It has done much to make and keep them free, little as they like to admit it; much to enable them to develop their own systems and institutions to a point where, for some at least, our support is no longer necessary. We must not lightly discard anything that has been so tremendously worth while, nor must we be afraid to revise something fine which has served its purpose.

Address of President Wilson to the Congress, April 2, 1917

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the President of the United States, delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress, April 2, 1917:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the 1st day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meager and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavor to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs. It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the Nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the Navy in all respects but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training. It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation, because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people, so far as we may, against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we should keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty—for it will be a very practical duty—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. They are in the field, and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the Nation will most directly fall.

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last 2 months, and I do not believe that the thought of the Nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3d of February, and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power, and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbor states with spies or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their naive majesty and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a league of honor.

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of government with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries and our commerce. Indeed it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began; and it is unhappily not a matter of conjecture but a fact proved in our courts of justice that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States. Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to put the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people toward us (who were, no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that government entertains no real friendship for us and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us at our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included: for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancour and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

I have said nothing of the governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honor. The Austro-Hungarian Government has indeed avowed its unqualified endorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the Ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship—exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions toward the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live amongst us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it toward all who are in fact loyal to their neighbors and to the Government in the hour of test. They are, most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

Daniel Webster's Speech Against Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following speech of Daniel Webster. Many of the arguments he used against conscription are just as cogent and compelling today as they were on December 9, 1814, when Webster made his stirring address which was instrumental in defeating the compulsory draft bill of that day.

SPEECH ON THE CONSCRIPTION BILL IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 9, 1814 [1]

Mr. Chairman, after the best reflection which I have been able to bestow on the subject of the bill before you, I am of opinion that its principles are not warranted by any provision of the Constitution. It appears to me to partake of the nature of those other propositions for military measures which this session, so fertile in inventions, has produced. It is of the same class with the plan of the Secretary of War; with the bill reported to this House by its own committee for filling the ranks of the Regular Army, by classifying the free male population of the United States; and with the resolution recently introduced by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ingersoll], and which now lies on your table,

[1] A bill for a classification of the militia, and for drafting individuals, including minors, had passed the Senate. It was a modification of a measure proposed by Mr. Monroe, for a compulsory draft of the free male population between the ages of 18 and 45. Mr. Webster's speech was on a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill. Public sentiment was opposed to the measure and it failed. Referring to it in 1831, Mr. Webster said: "I had a hand, with Mr. Eppes and others, in overthrowing Mr. Monroe's Conscription in 1814." Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in the Life of Daniel Webster, said the speech was written out by Mr. Webster afterward, but never published, and that the manuscript was not to be found. It was, however, preserved, is now in the New Hampshire Historical Society, and is here printed from the manuscript in Mr. Webster's handwriting.

carrying the principle of compulsory service in the Regular Army to its utmost extent.

This bill indeed is less undisguised in its object and less direct in its means than some of the measures proposed. It is an attempt to exercise the power of forcing the free men of this country into the ranks of an army for the general purposes of war under color of a military service. To this end it commences with a classification which is no way connected with the general organization of the militia nor, to my apprehension, included within any of the powers which Congress possesses over them. All the authority which this Government has over the militia, until actually called into its service, is to enact laws for their organization and discipline. This power it has exercised. It now possesses the further power of calling into its service any portion of the militia of the States in the particular exigencies for which the Constitution provides and of governing them during the continuance of such service. Here its authority ceases. The classification of the whole body of the militia, according to the provisions of this bill, is not a measure which respects either their general organization or their discipline. It is a distinct system introduced for new purposes and not connected with any power which the Constitution has conferred on Congress.

But, sir, there is another consideration. The services of the men to be raised under this act are not limited to those cases in which alone this Government is entitled to the aid of the militia of the States. These cases are particularly stated in the Constitution—"to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or execute the laws." But this bill has no limitation in this respect. The usual mode of legislating on the subject is abandoned. The only section which would have confined the service of the militia proposed to be raised within the United States has been stricken out, and if the President should not march them into the provinces of England at the north or of Spain at the south it will not be because he is prohibited by any provision in this act.

This, sir, is a bill for calling out the militia, not according to its existing organization but by draft from new created classes; not merely for the purpose of "repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, or executing the laws," but for the general objects of war—for defending ourselves, or invading others, as may be thought expedient; not for a sudden emergency, or for a short time, but for long-stated periods; for 2 years, if the proposition of the Senate should finally prevail; for 1 year if the amendment of the House should be adopted. What is this, sir, but raising a standing army out of the militia by draft and to be recruited by draft, in like manner, as often as occasion may require?

This bill, then, is not different in principle from the other bills, plans, and resolutions which I have mentioned. The present discussion is properly and necessarily common to them all. It is a discussion, sir, of the last importance. That measures of this nature should be debated at all in the councils of a free government is cause of dismay. The question is nothing less than whether the most essential rights of personal liberty shall be surrendered and despotism embraced in its worst form.

I have risen, on this occasion, with anxious and painful emotions, to add my admonition to what has been said by others. Admonition and remonstrance, I am aware, are not acceptable strains. They are duties of unpleasant performance. But they are, in my judgment, the duties which the condition of a falling State imposes. They are duties which sink deep in his conscience, who believes it probable that they may be the last services which he may be able to render to the government of his country. On the issue of this discussion, I believe the fate of this Government may rest. Its duration is incompatible, in my opinion, with the existence of the measures in contemplation. A crisis has at last arrived, to which the course of things has long tended, and which may be decisive upon the happiness of present and of future generations. If there be anything important in the concerns of men, the considerations which fill the present hour are important. I am anxious, above all things, to stand acquitted before God and my own conscience, and in the public judgment, of all participations in the counsels which have brought us to our present condition and which now threaten the dissolution of the Government. When the present generation of men shall be swept away, and that this Government ever existed shall be matter of history only, I desire that it may be known that you have not proceeded in your course unadmonished and unforewarned. Let it then be known, that there were those who would have stopped you, in the career of your measures, and held you back, as by the skirts of your garments, from the precipice over which you are plunging and drawing after you the Government of your country.

I had hoped, sir, at an early period of the session, to find gentlemen in another temper. I trusted that the existing state of things would have impressed on the minds of those who decide national measures the necessity of some reform in the administration of affairs. If it was not to have been expected that gentlemen would be convinced by argument, it was still not unreasonable to hope that they would listen to the solemn preaching of events. If no previous reasoning could satisfy them, that the favorite plans of Government would fail, they might yet be expected to regard the fact, when it happened, and to yield to the lesson which it taught. Although they had, last year, given no credit to those who predicted the failure of the campaign against Canada, yet they had seen that failure. Although they then treated as idle all doubts of the success of the loan, they had seen the failure of that loan. Although they then held in derision all fears for the public credit, and the national faith, they had yet seen the public credit destroyed and the national faith violated and disgraced. They had seen much more than was predicted; for no man had foretold that our means of defense would be so far exhausted in foreign invasion as to leave the place of our own deliberations insecure and that we should this day be legislating in view of the crumbling monuments of our national disgrace. No one had anticipated that this city would have fallen before a handful of troops, and that British generals and British admirals would have taken their airings along the Pennsylvania Avenue, while the Government was in full flight, just awaked perhaps from one of its profound meditations on the plan of a conscription for the conquest of Canada. These events, sir, with the present state of things and the threatening aspect of what is future, should have brought us to a pause. They might have reasonably been expected to induce Congress to review its own measures and to exercise its great duty of inquiry relative to the conduct of others. If this was too high a pitch of virtue for the multitude of party men, it was at least to have been expected from gentlemen of influence and character, who ought to be supposed to value something higher than mere party attachment and to act from motives somewhat nobler than a mere regard to party consistency. All that we have yet suffered will be found light and trifling in comparison with what is before us if the Government shall learn nothing from experience but to despise it and shall grow more and more desperate in its measures as it grows more and more desperate in its affairs.

Or shall we look to the acquisition of the professed objects of the war and there find grounds for approbation and confidence? The professed objects of the war are abandoned in all due form. The contest for sailors' rights is turned into a negotiation about boundaries and military roads, and the highest hope entertained by any man of the issue is that we may be able to get out of the war without a cession of territory.

Look, sir, to the finances of the country. What a picture do they exhibit of the wisdom and prudence and foresight of Government. "The revenue of a State," says a profound writer, "is the State." If we are to judge of the condition of the country by the condition of its revenues, what is the result? A wise government sinks deep the fountain of its revenues—not only till it can touch the first springs, and slake the present thirst of the treasury, but till lasting sources are opened, too abundant to be exhausted by demand, too deep to be affected by heats and droughts. What, sir, is our present supply, and what our provision for the future resource? I forbear to speak of the present condition of the Treasury; and as to public credit, the last reliance of government, I use the language of government itself only, when I say it does not exist. This is a state of things calling for the soberest counsels, and yet it seems to meet only the wildest speculations. Nothing is talked of but banks, and a circulating paper medium, and Exchequer notes, and the thousand other contrivances which ingenuity, vexed and goaded by the direst necessity, can devise, with the vain hope of giving value to mere paper. All these things are not revenue, nor do they produce it. They are the effect of a productive commerce, and a well-ordered system of finance, and in their operation may be favorable to both, but are not the cause of either. In other times these facilities existed. Bank paper and Government paper circulated because both rested on substantial capital or solid credit. Without these they will not circulate, nor is there a device more shallow or more mischievous, than to pour forth new floods of paper without credit as a remedy for the evils which paper without credit has already created. As was intimated the other day by my honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. Gaston] this is an attempt to act over again the farce of the Assignats of France. Indeed, sir, our politicians appear to have but one school. They learn everything of modern France; with this variety only, that for examples of revenue they go to the Revolution, when her revenue was in the worst state possible, while their model for military force is sought after in her imperial era, when her military was organized on principles the most arbitrary and abominable.

Let us examine the nature and extent of the power which is assumed by the various military measures before us. In the present want of men and money, the Secretary of War has proposed to Congress a military conscription. For the conquest of Canada, the people will not enlist; and if they would, the treasury is exhausted, and they could not be paid. Conscription is chosen as the most promising instrument, both of overcoming reluctance to the service and of subduing the difficulties which arise from the deficiencies of the Exchequer. The administration asserts the right to fill the ranks of the Regular Army by compulsion. It contends that it may now take 1 out of every 25 men, and any part, or the whole of the rest, whenever its occasions require. Persons thus taken by force, and put into an army, may be compelled to serve there during the war or for life. They may be put on any service, at home or abroad, for defense or for invasion, according to the will and pleasure of the Government. This power does not grow out of any invasion of the country or even out of a state of war. It belongs to government at all times, in peace as well as in war, and it is to be exercised under all circumstances, according to its mere discretion. This, sir, is the amount of the principle contended for by the Secretary of War.

Is this, sir, consistent with the character of a free government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, sir; indeed it is not. The Constitution is libeled, foully libeled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasure and their own blood a magna carta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained, that you may take children from their parents, and parents from their children, and compel them to fight the battles of any war in which the folly or the wickedness of government may engage it? Under what concealment has this power lain hidden which now for the first time comes forth, with a tremendous and baleful aspect, to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty? Who will show me any constitutional injunction which makes it the duty of the American people to surrender everything valuable in life, and even life itself, not when the safety of their country and its liberties may demand the sacrifice, but whenever the purposes of an ambitious and mischievous government may require it? Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free government, and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free government. It is an attempt to show, by proof and argument, that we ourselves are subjects of despotism, and that we have a right to chains and bondage, firmly secured to us and our children by the provisions of our Government. It has been the labor of other men, at other times, to mitigate and reform the powers of government by construction; to support the rights of personal security by every species of favorable and benign interpretation, and thus to infuse a free spirit into governments not friendly in their general structure and formation to public liberty.

The supporters of the measures before us act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers, by construction, out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion, which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free, and limited Government, and to demonstrate, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions, that Government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort and degree of misery than has been exercised by any civilized government, with a single exception, in modern times.

The Secretary of War has favored us with an argument on the constitutionality of this power. Those who lament that such doctrines should be supported by the opinion of a high officer of government, may a little abate their regret, when they remember that the same officer, in his last letter of instructions to our ministers abroad, maintained the contrary. In that letter he declares that even the impressment of seamen, for which many more plausible reasons may be given than for the impressment of soldiers, is repugnant to our Constitution. It might, therefore, be a sufficient answer to his argument, in the present case, to quote against it the sentiments of its own author, and to place the two opinions before the House, in a state of irreconcilable conflict. Further comment on either might then be properly forborne until he should be pleased to inform us which he retracted, and to which he adhered. But the importance of the subject may justify a further consideration of the arguments.

Congress having, by the Constitution, a power to raise armies, the Secretary contends that no restraint is to be imposed on the exercise of this power, except such as is expressly stated in the written letter of the instrument. In other words, that Congress may execute its powers, by any means it chooses, unless such means are particularly prohibited. But the general nature and object of the Constitution impose as rigid a restriction on the means of exercising power as could be done by the most explicit injunctions. It is the first principle applicable to such a case, that no construction shall be admitted which impairs the general nature and character of the instrument. A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles, and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication which would strike us absurdly if expressed. And what would have been more absurd than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit under the commentary of the Secretary of War.

But it is said that it might happen that an army could not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise armies would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove anything, it would equally show that, whenever the legitimate power of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them, such new powers may be assumed or usurped, as any existing administration may deem expedient. This is the result of his own reasoning, to which the Secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed, that all powers were granted, which might by possibility become necessary, and that government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of government are precisely what it chooses they should be. Apply the same reasoning to any other power granted to Congress, and test its accuracy by the result. Congress has power to borrow money. How is it to exercise this power? Is it confined to voluntary loans? There is no express limitation to that effect, and, in the language of the Secretary, it might happen, indeed it has happened, that persons could not be found willing to lend. Money might be borrowed then in any other mode. In other words, Congress might resort to a forced loan. It might take the money of any man by force, and give him in exchange exchequer notes or certificates of stock. Would this be quite constitutional, sir? It is entirely within the reasoning of the Secretary, and it is a result of his argument, outraging the rights of individuals in a far less degree than the practical consequences which he himself draws from it. A compulsory loan is not to be compared, in point of enormity, with a compulsory military service.

If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the Regular Army, he will at any time be able to prove, quite as clearly, that Congress has power to create a dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case will equally aid him in the other, the same reason of a supposed or possible state necessity, which is urged now, may be repeated then, with equal pertinency and effect.

Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies, the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual, and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority, is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotism. The tyranny of arbitrary governments consists as much in its means as in its ends; and it would be a ridiculous and absurd Constitution which would be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government, with an uncontrolled power of military conscription, is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Sir, I invite the supporters of the measures before you to look to their actual operation. Let the men who have so often pledged their own fortunes and their own lives to the support of this war look to the wanton sacrifice which they are about to make of their lives and fortunes. They may talk as they will about substitutes and compensations and exemptions. It must come to the draft at last. If the Government cannot hire men voluntarily to fight its battles, neither can individuals. If the war should continue, there will be no escape, and every man's fate and every man's life will come to depend on the issue of the military draft. Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the distress and anguish which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor, and to rest in security and happiness. Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft, and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the stroke of death were to fall from heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in a majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death. Under present prospects of the continuance of the war, not one-half of them on whom your conscription shall fall will ever return to tell the tale of their sufferings. They will perish of disease and pestilence, or they will leave their bones to whiten in fields beyond the frontier. Does the lot fall on the father of a family? His children, already orphans, shall see his face no more. When they behold him for the last time, they shall see him lashed and fettered, and dragged away from his own threshold, like a felon and an outlaw. Does it fall on a son, the hope and the staff of aged parents? That hope shall fail them. On that staff they shall lean no longer. They shall not enjoy the happiness of dying before their children. They shall totter to their grave, bereft of their offspring and unwept by any who inherit their blood. Does it fall on a husband? The eyes which watch his parting steps may swim in tears forever. She is a wife no longer. There is no relation so tender or so sacred that by these accursed measures you do not propose to violate it. There is no happiness so perfect that you do not propose to destroy it. Into the paradise of domestic life you enter, not indeed by temptations and sorceries, but by open force and violence.

But this father, or this son, or this husband goes to the camp. With whom do you associate him? With those only who are sober and virtuous and respectable like himself? No, sir. But you propose to find his companions in the worst men of the worst sort. Another bill lies on your table offering a bounty to deserters from your enemy. Whatever is most infamous in his ranks you propose to make your own. You address yourselves to those who will hear you advise them to perjury and treason. All who are ready to set heaven and earth at defiance at the same time, to violate their oaths and run the hazard of capital punishment, and none others, will yield to your solicitations. And these are they whom you are allowing to join your ranks, by holding out to them inducements and bounties with one hand while, with the other, you are driving thither the honest and worthy members of your own community, under the lash and scourge of conscription. In the line of your Army, with the true leveling of despotism, you propose a promiscuous mixture of the worthy and the worthless, the virtuous and the profligate; the husbandman, the merchant, the mechanic of your own country, with the beings whom war selects from the excess of European population, who possess neither interest, feeling, nor character in common with your own people, and who have no other recommendation to your notice than their propensity to crimes.

Nor is it, sir, for the defense of his own house and home that he who is the subject of military draft is to perform the task allotted to him. You will put him upon a service equally foreign to his interests and abhorrent to his feelings. With his aid you are to push your purposes of conquest. The battles which he is to fight are the battles of invasion, battles which he detests perhaps and abhors, less from the danger and the death that gather over them, and the blood with which they drench the plain, than from the principles in which they have their origin. Fresh from the peaceful pursuits of life, and yet a soldier but in name, he is to be opposed to veteran troops, hardened under every scene, inured to every privation, and disciplined in every service. If, sir, in this strife he fall; if, while ready to obey every rightful command of government, he is forced from his home against right, not to contend for the defense of his country but to prosecute a miserable and detestable project of invasion, and in that strife he fall, 'tis murder. It may stalk above the cognizance of human law, but in the sight of Heaven it is murder; and though millions of years may roll away, while his ashes and yours lie mingled together in the earth, the day will yet come when his spirit and the spirits of his children must be met at the bar of omnipotent justice. May God, in His compassion, shield me from any participation in the enormity of this guilt.

I would ask, sir, whether the supporters of these measures have well weighed the difficulties of their undertaking. Have they considered whether it will be found easy to execute laws which bear such marks of despotism on their front, and which will be so productive of every sort and degree of misery in their execution? For one, sir, I hesitate not to say that they cannot be executed. No law professedly passed for the purpose of compelling a service in the Regular Army, nor any law which, under color of military draft, shall compel men to serve in the Army, nor for the emergencies mentioned in the Constitution, but for long periods, and for the general objects of war, can be carried into effect. In my opinion it ought not to be carried into effect. The operation of measures thus unconstitutional and illegal ought to be prevented by a resort to other measures which are both constitutional and legal. It will be the solemn duty of the State governments to protect their own authority over their own militia, and to interpose between their citizens and arbitrary power. These are among the objects for which the State governments exist; and their highest obligations bind them to the preservation of their own rights and the liberties of their people. I express these sentiments here, sir, because I shall express them to my constituents. Both they and myself live under a constitution which teaches us that "the doctrine of nonresistance against arbitrary power and oppression is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind."[2] With the same earnestness with which I now exhort you to forbear from these measures, I shall exhort them to exercise their unquestionable right of providing for the security of their own liberties.

In my opinion, sir, the sentiments of the free population of this country are greatly mistaken here. The Nation is not yet in a temper to submit to conscription. The people have too fresh and strong a feeling of the blessings of civil liberty to be willing thus to surrender it. You may talk to them as much as you please of the victory and glory to be obtained in the enemy's provinces; they will hold those objects in light estimation if the means be a forced military service. You may sing to them the song of Canada Conquest in all its variety, but they will not be charmed out of the remembrance of their substantial interests and true happiness. Similar pretenses, they know, are the grave in which the liberties of other nations have been buried, and they will take warning.

Laws, sir, of this nature, can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad, like the fabled serpents' teeth, they will spring up into armed men. A military force cannot be raised in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If administration has found that it cannot form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it cannot enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty, and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail; and having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our Government.

Allusions have been made, sir, to the state of things in New England, and, as usual, she has been charged with an intention to dissolve the Union. The charge is unfounded. She is much too wise to entertain such purposes. She has had too much experience and has too strong a recollection of the blessings which the Union is capable of producing under a just administration of government. It is her greatest fear that the course at present pursued will destroy it by destroying every principle, every interest, every sentiment, and every feeling which have hitherto contributed to uphold it. Those who cry out that the Union is in danger are themselves the authors of that danger. They put its existence to hazard by measures of violence, which it is not capable of enduring. They talk of dangerous designs against government, when they are overthrowing the fabric from its foundations. They alone, sir, are friends to the union of the States who endeavor to maintain the principles of civil liberty in the country and to preserve the spirit in which the Union was framed.

Radio Address of Hon. Samuel Dickstein, December 15, 1933

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me December 15, 1933:

Ladies and gentlemen, during the past 15 years, and particularly during these last 4 years of dark depression, the world has been groping for light. We have been striving to restore a lost social order and to apply the marvels of a recently mechanized universe to the welfare of humanity; to supplant the suffering and utter chaos of that great convulsion of civilization, the World War, with new schemes for the coordination of our resources to our needs.

To do this the various peoples of the earth have experimented with sundry types of government, all of which, it must be said, have been designed with the honest intention of benefiting their own particular groups of subjects to be affected. Russia has chosen communism, Italy fascism; and no government in the world has been left unaffected by the tempest for change which has swept across the entire face of the earth.

One phase of this world revolution in particular has been worthy of our attention—that is, the overthrow of democratic principles and personal liberties; the freedom of the press, liberty of speech; rights of franchise without discrimination as to race, creed, or color; in short, the personal authorities endowed upon us by our Creator have been destroyed or distorted under the iron fists of new rulers in various countries.

Over the tombs of the decadent and almost forgotten Romanoffs, Stalin, the dictator of all the Russian states, has assumed power. His word is law, religion, creed, and absolute fiat to the millions of citizens who constitute the largest state in Europe.

Italy, now a monarchy in name only, genuflects before the sacred image of Benito Mussolini—a man who can create heroes and relegate them immediately to the limbo of forgotten men despite popular sentiment; a man who can control all phases of governmental operations without inviting the opinions of his subjects, or, indeed, the approval of his king; a man who can dissipate his cabinet and assume almighty powers over all the Italians and Italy's foreign relations without consulting a single soul.

Pilsudski, the grizzled soldier of Poland, has little less control over that country. Turkey, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and even Austria with its diminutive Dictator Dollfus—who is small in stature only—have turned into the hands of their rulers power such as even only the sultans of past centuries enjoyed.

Liberal governments, such as the Republic of France and the monarchy of Great Britain, are confronted with the necessity of concentrating their functions in the hands of a few all-powerful leaders. The liberal governments of these two countries find it difficult to defend their democratic principles against the wave for dictatorial power that has swept from the East to dash the foundations of liberty to bits. These strongholds of popular government, the lone survivors of Europe's upheaval, are being severely tried. Who knows but that in time England and France, hemmed in by neighboring dictatorships, may be forced to resort to some similar form of centralized control of all personal and public functions of their peoples.

The time has come when the United States of America, too, must think seriously of protecting its democracy. Thank God for the 3,000 miles which separate our people from the political problems of bickering European states. But is our geographical position alone enough to keep us from being dragged into the cauldron of European upheavals?

Fully appreciative of the importance of support from this great Nation, appreciative of the strength of our young men, appreciative of our financial and industrial resources, and, above all, appreciative of the tremendous sympathy and gullibility of the American heart, European powers at this moment are using every device known to parliamentarians to inveigle us in their difficulties. Fortunately, bounded by two friendly countries, Canada and Mexico, we know little of the tension that exists in Europe, where a score of nations, penned up in an inadequate continent, are glaring at each other and awaiting the first international incident that may provide tinder for a new conflagration of armed conflicts.

Aliens who come into the United States, men who have had military experience in their own countries, men who have directed armies and navies are particularly dangerous to the welfare of our country. It is these aliens who have been taking advantage of every loophole of our immigration laws to enter these shores and to engage in pernicious propaganda destructive of the fundamentals of our Government and the principles of our Constitution.

Foremost among those who are at present seeking to influence American opinions are the agents of Adolf Hitler, the dictator of Germany. For the last 8 weeks the House of Representatives Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I am chairman, has been investigating the operations of certain German organizations and German individuals in the United States. Although considerably hampered in our investigation by the lack of funds necessary to expose the intricate and deftly covered machinations of the Nazi government, we have succeeded in unearthing evidence to define the Nazi government here as the most dangerous threat to our democracy that has ever existed. Through the good offices of friends of the committee, who have worked with us for none other than patriotic reasons, we are at last getting to the bottom of a foreign political machine whose activities will prove of startling interest to all Americans when the time comes for exposure.

We hope to present sufficient evidence before Congress, when that body reconvenes in January, to make feasible the creation of a special committee, properly financed by the Government, for the uncloaking of all subversive elements connected with the Nazi movement in the United States.

At present our findings indicate beyond a doubt in the minds of those most closely connected with the investigation that Nazi activities are not confined to the mere distribution of literature which might clarify our understanding of the situation in Germany. The German propaganda that has come into our hands is of a pernicious sort, ostensibly designed to gain the sympathy of Americans for Hitler's domestic policies and to influence Americans toward Hitler's claims against foreign nations. German propaganda contains such elements as to bring to a head in this country hatred for one's fellow citizens.

Hitler has enlisted the aid of certain institutions in the United States whose help could be secured by monthly payments. He has transformed into mediums of his propaganda German-American institutions, many of which have earned the respect of our citizens through years of splendid service to our needs. Germany's industrial representatives in this country have been coordinated with the diabolical plans of the Hitler government, and I can point to a number of them as direct executors of Hitler's base aims against civilization.

At this moment in New York City, wherein we have the largest concentration of Germans in the country, the social ranks of German-Americans have been divided in two distinct groups. On the one side are the liberal Germans and Jews, who cannot conscientiously subscribe to Herr Hitler's policies of prostituting ideals to the requirements of an ambitious and unscrupulous state. On the other side are thousands of Germans who have been intimidated into bowing to Hitler's dictation. Should they refuse to bend their knees to their fanatical Chancelor, the safety of their friends and relatives residing in Germany would be jeopardized, and they themselves would never dare set foot on the fatherland again. Others of this latter category are influenced by the personal profit offered them for their support of the Hitler government.

From the meager budgets of the third Reich a surprising amount of money is being spent on propaganda in the United States, and at the same time these funds are being swelled by thousands of dollars extorted from German citizens in New York. We know the sources that finance this Nazi movement. We have evidence of the amounts being expended by the Berlin Government and we know the measures being employed to coerce Germans to contribute to this fund for the propagation of hate and unrest. Poor Germans in this country are literally being blackmailed into lending their moral and financial support to the issues of their Chancelor.

One of the most surprising features of my fan mail is the support my investigation is receiving from Germans in this country. I have on file scores of letters commending the inquiry and wishing it Godspeed. In every case, however, there is the caution, "Please do not allow this letter to leave your hands; my congratulations here might cost me my livelihood or my health."

Secret agents and spies, a secret police, a smuggling of arms for military drill—in short, activities which were unknown in this country at any time and not indulged in even by enemies of our people have become the order of the day. I know of instances where a secret Nazi police did threaten Americans who happened to have relatives on the other side with dire reprisals if they would not join the movement. I know of instances where, because of the resistance of American citizens to dictation by foreign spies, their relatives in Germany were secretly removed to places unknown. I know of instances where men and women thoroughly American in spirit were obliged to yield to persuasion of foreign spies because of their fear as to what would happen to their relatives in Germany if they did not become active members of the Hitler band in the United States.

Perhaps most important of all is the connection of German agents with a number of revolutionary movements that are expanding in the United States with astounding rapidity. Through the United States mails today, thousands of newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and letters are being circulated by leaders of various rebellious cliques of this country. They appeal to the jobless and disgruntled elements for support that will put them into power at Washington; they appeal to the bigoted for their help in persecutions of various races and religious sects, and they appeal to the righteous for support in a campaign against imaginary abuses of a thousand and one descriptions.

Our investigation has revealed this much: That a definite connection exists between these organizations and Nazi bodies, who appear to be financing and organizing them; that the leaders of the new movement are cranks of various sorts, whose mentalities, when exposed to investigation, are undoubtedly pathological; that a movement is under way to having these various movements into a united front; and that, in consideration of the response they have received from hundreds of thousands of uninformed Americans and other persons with an unhealthy twist, they present a formidable threat to our democracy.

We are not prepared to join the chorus of "Heil Hitler!" led by a group of militant Hitlerite agents who have succeeded in finding supporters among certain perverted Americans. We shall not barter our democracy for the dictation of groups of fanatics clad in white, silver, khaki, or other colored shirts. We shall not scrap our Constitution and Declaration of Independence and accept as gospel the mysterious dispatches from on high received by one American Fascist leader. Our legislature will never be abandoned for the ouija board.

We do not propose to make the United States a battlefield upon which European nations can settle their disputes. We have purposely moved away from Europe. If we cannot agree on friendly intercourse between America and Europe, entered into with a view toward reciprocal benefit in all dealings, we shall have nothing to do with Europe. We do not attempt to meddle in European affairs; we do not try to disseminate ideas of liberalism and freedom among their fettered subjects; we won't have Europe obstructing our progress.

May I at this time reassert that our investigation is not directed against any groups of Americans who in this country seek to foster the ideals of their ancestors. Such organizations perform a useful function in our social and political life, but I am opposed to aliens with a philosophy of their own dictating to our citizens the form of government which we are to adopt for ourselves.

I am calling upon all Americans whom this message will reach to respect our traditions of democracy, to be on the alert for those dark forces who are operating against us, and to lend us your support in overcoming the most flagrant attack on our civilization that has ever been perpetrated. I refer specifically to German Nazi organizations operating secretly but effectively among us, and to the groups being fostered by the Nazis.

If we do not awaken to the menace of undemocratic enemies, if we do not act at once and in a body, we shall have the utmost difficulty in wiping out our foreign assailants and their secret, disloyal American allies when the time comes for a show-down.

Safeguarding Democracy with Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WRIGHT PATMAN, OF TEXAS

(Printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 6, 1940)

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I insert herewith a radio program given over Columbia Broadcasting System August 2, 1940, from 9 to 9:15 p. m., in which I discussed the subject Safeguarding Democracy With Roosevelt:

ANNOUNCER. Last Wednesday evening the Honorable Homer D. Angell, Republican Member of the House of Representatives, from Oregon, broadcast an address over the Columbia network entitled "The Ramparts We Watch—America, What of the Morrow?" in which was included a discussion on the third-term question.

Tonight, in accordance with its usual policy, C. B. S. presents a Democratic view on this subject as the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, Democratic Member of the House of Representatives, from Texas, discusses Safeguarding Democracy With Roosevelt, under the auspices of the Democratic National Committee.

Representative PATMAN. Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, the American people today are witnessing a political campaign which has no precedence in the Nation's history. The Democratic Party enters the campaign with the knowledge that, like any other administration in power, it must be judged on its record—and proudly it offers that record and the laws that have been placed on the statute books in the last eight significant years. But, unlike any opposition party that has ever gone before the American people, the Republican Party accepts the Democratic record in principle—not daring to call for the repeal of a single basic law passed during the last 8 years—and is forced to appeal to the voters of the country solely on the ground that it is better qualified to administer the New Deal that the Democratic Party has given to the Nation.

Disregarding all the accusations and insinuations and talk of tradition which have been flung about in the early days of this campaign and which will reach more fantastic proportions before it is through, this is the basic truth:

The Republican Party in 1932 left this country in the throes of economic disaster, its national life demoralized, its people disillusioned with Government itself. In 8 years the Democratic Party, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, guided that Nation through the crisis that had been brought upon it under Republican rule, restored it to economic sanity, and passed laws which give hope that never again will its people be despoiled and impoverished, and laid the foundation for a new order. In 1940 the Republican Party returns to demand that again it be entrusted with the powers of government to better administer—note the irony—the laws that ended the chaos its own leaders brought upon us.

Unable to make any attack on the laws the Roosevelt administration has sponsored, forced to accept the basic controls on predatory interests the Roosevelt administration has introduced, the Republican Party has been forced to confine its attacks to Roosevelt the man and, of all things, to cry out against the shattering of "an American precedent" in electing him for a third term.

The Democratic Party, with an almost united voice, pleads guilty to its desire to shatter this precedent. It points to the fact that polls showed that 92 percent of Democratic voters of this country favored the President's renomination over all other party leaders before the Chicago convention—in spite of a press which said that convention was itself controlled—and that all of the so-called Democrats who have bolted the Democratic Party were repudiated by that party before they bolted. But the Democratic Party goes further in the matter of precedents. It defends, and proudly, a number of other precedents that it has shattered in these last 8 years, and still further, places upon its leader the principal responsibility for shattering them.

He shattered a precedent by giving assistance to the aged and the blind. He shattered a precedent by all the social-security laws he sponsored. He shattered a precedent of 150 years by reducing the interest rates on farms and homes and saving the public a billion dollars a year in interest alone; by establishing a yardstick for electric power rates which saved consumers another half billion dollars a year; by policies that permit farmers to receive over a billion dollars a year in benefits to offset disadvantages caused by protective tariffs and to enable them to conserve their soil; by laws which prevent the sale of worthless stocks and bonds to innocent investors; by electrifying American farms and homes.

He shattered precedents by guaranteeing your savings in banks and thrift institutions. He shattered precedents by Government aid to the unemployed. He shattered precedents by Government aid to the disillusioned youth of the Nation as well as the aged. He shattered precedents by establishing the "alphabetical agencies," which Republican opponents found so easy to ridicule in off-election years but against which they will keep strangely silent as they go before the people in this campaign—the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Electric Farm and Home Authority, the Social Security Administration, and a score of others which have come to mean too much to the people of this country to suffer any political attack.

Precedents? The Democratic Party will continue to shatter them as long as precedents protect only men of wealth and gigantic combinations of capital and a theory of government, sponsored by Mr. Hoover, which said that it was all right to pour billions of money into banks and insurance companies and railroads and "let them trickle down to the masses"—but that Government aid to the small people of this Nation must first pass through the greedy hands of those who controlled their economic destiny.

However, in accepting the challenge as to precedents, we at the same time resent and deny the insinuations and plain falsehoods which accompany the outcries against a third term. Too many times we have heard the names of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson brought into this argument, because rarely have they been quoted in truth.

No one reveres Thomas Jefferson more than I. That does not mean I accept every theory he had 150 years ago—and I advise my friends in Congress to be wary of their declarations of adherence in certain respects, too. For Thomas Jefferson not only did not believe a President should have a third term, but he didn't believe in third terms for Congressmen and Senators, either. In fact, at one time he did not believe they should even stand for reelection—something that some congressional opponents of Mr. Roosevelt, now serving their fifth or tenth terms, might ponder before they use Mr. Jefferson's name again.

They also might ponder a remark of Mr. Jefferson anent a third term that there is a "circumstance which could engage my acquiescence in another election; to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist," and ponder whether today's menacing threat from the dictators might not be conceived by Mr. Jefferson much more critically dangerous than a monarchy.

As for George Washington, let us refer to his own serious and thoughtful words, written in a letter to Lafayette on April 28, 1788:

"As for instance on the ineligibility of the same person for President, after he should have served a certain course of years, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the necessity or expedience of rotation in that appointment. There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will, by any intrigue, ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it. Under an extended view of part of this subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who, in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

This was the final judgment of the Father of his Country. This was the judgment that prevailed among the fathers when they established our Constitution. Purposely they did not place in that Constitution any restriction on the number of times a man might serve his country in the office of President. It is as if they foresaw just such an emergency that the Nation faces today—a crisis that calls for the man who has guided us through one great era of peril and now, with calm wisdom and a knowledge of international affairs not matched by any other leader in the world, is safely guiding us through another.

Perhaps some of those who have been so violent on the subject of a third term should have a little more of the faith of Washington that this democracy will live, that no man by intrigue could perpetuate himself in office. Perhaps we should get on a commoner ground and use a little sense to remind ourselves that we now are in the midst of a campaign in which the people themselves will vote as to whether or not they want Mr. Roosevelt to serve a third term.

The very fact that the vote of our people still determines the Presidency makes it unnecessary to give much attention to the wild talk which links a third term to a dictatorship in this country. At no time since his election has the President ruled Congress. He has been defeated in both Houses time and again—usually to the detriment of the people themselves—and never has he dominated that branch of the Government, except by intelligence and statesmanship. He never will be able to dominate it by arbitrary powers and neither will any of his successors. In the words of Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, who, by the way, joined Mr Hoover in supporting a third term for Mr. Coolidge, "You (the Congress) not we, have the purse and the sword." Congress, made up of duly elected representatives of the people, always holds the vital power against illegal dominance by the Executive—if it ever were needed. Certainly it will never be needed against a Roosevelt, whose very enemies were made because he has been a President of the people; we might well quiet our fears until we get a President who represents their foes.

However, I am only too aware of why the Republican Party raises this smoke screen. The reason lies in what I have pointed out before—that the Republican Party and its leaders cannot, dare not, challenge the things Mr. Roosevelt really stands for. They must raise a false issue or they are doomed to overwhelming defeat, for the American people demand the fundamentals of government which Mr. Roosevelt has sponsored throughout his 8 courageous years in office.

It is the old, old battle of the people against privilege, which Franklin D. Roosevelt waged once in 1932 and again in 1936. The same people who were opposed to him for a third term were opposed to him for a first and a second. Their only hope is to rally to their cause American citizens who are blinded by their new smoke screen and deluded by their false charges.

I repeat that the only argument that issues from the whole babble about the third term and dictatorship is the Republican promise that Republicans will better administer New Deal laws. This promise certainly can't be based on past performance, because not even Republicans like to talk a great deal these days about the scandals of the Harding administration, or the Coolidge policies which paved the way to the great debacle of 1929, or the Hoover administration which went down with that crash. It can't very well be based on logic either, for we well may question whether laws can be best administered by men entirely out of sympathy with them and unalterably opposed to the fundamentals of social justice they represent.

The American people 8 years ago chose the Democratic Party as the surgeon to operate and remove the tumors and gangrene in American Government and restore its vitality. I well might remind my listeners that the surgeon who wields the knife is the most anxious that his patient should live. The operation now has been performed. There will be little consolation to the American people in the future for Republicans to tell them, after making a miserable failure of the New Deal laws, that "the operation was successful but the patient died."

If the New Deal dies, and with it the movement for better government "of the people, by the people, and for the people"—the Republican Party long since has forgotten except by name—it will be a sad day for those with a faith in democracy and the greatest Nation ever conceived on its principles.

But it will not die. The American people do not retreat. They will continue their steady march toward their democratic goals. They realize that in this war-torn world theirs is the job of making democracy work—of proving that men and women can preserve their ideals and their liberties and their sense of social justice in the face of even such menaces as now terrify the rest of the world.

They have a symbol in the name of the New Deal. They have a leader—a daring and resourceful leader, whose kindliness and humanity do not hide the high courage which inspired a nation once before and which is needed to inspire us again in the dark days that lie ahead. The country has called on Franklin D. Roosevelt to again "carry on."

ANNOUNCER. The Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, Democratic Member of the House of Representatives from Texas, has discussed "Safeguarding Democracy with Roosevelt." He spoke under the auspices of the Democratic National Committee.

Columbia Broadcasting System presented this Democratic view, in conformance with its usual policy, to balance an address made last Wednesday by the Honorable HOMER D. ANGELL, Republican Member of the House of Representatives from Oregon.

Representative PATMAN spoke from the studios of WJSV, Columbia's station for the Nation's Capital.

Physical Geography of the Monroe Doctrine

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE BY LAWRENCE MARTIN

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, the physical geography of the Monroe Doctrine and the limits of the Western Hemisphere are matters that are uppermost in the minds of every student of map making.

Col. Lawrence Martin, of the Congressional Library, is one of the outstanding authorities on the subject of maps and its pertinent present aspect, the Western Hemisphere.

He has written a current article in the Geographical Review which I think is of inestimable aid to the entire subject. It is unfortunate that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD provides no place for maps, but rightly, the understood limitations of the RECORD in this respect are too well known to need further comment.

[Reprinted from the Geographical Review, vol. XXX, No. 3, July 1940]

THE GEOGRAPHY OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND THE LIMITS OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

(By Lawrence Martin)

(The definition of the Western Hemisphere is a matter of engrossing interest at the present time. For the casually used phrase a precise meaning must be found. For instance, President Roosevelt's Executive order dated June 5, 1940, has to do in part with documents required of aliens entering the United States of America who are domiciled in "a country, island, or territory of the Western Hemisphere." Most important of all, House Joint Resolution 556, introduced June 3, 1940, as amended in committee 2 days later, specifies that "the United States would not recognize any transfer and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power." Hence it seemed desirable for the American Geographical Society to present a geographer's view of the problem. Colonel Martin, who is versed in political geography, was asked to help by defining the Western Hemisphere on a map and by outlining the geography of the Monroe Doctrine and its genesis. It is emphasized that Colonel Martin has done this in his private capacity as geographer and as contributing editor of the Geographical Review and not as a Federal employee.—EDITORIAL NOTE).

"I told him specially that we should contest the right of Russia to any territorial establishment on this continent," observed John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, in his diary for July 17, 1823. He was Secretary of State at the time and was alluding to an interview with Baron Tuyll, the Russian Minister at Washington. "We should assume distinctly the principle," Adams continued, "that the American continents are no longer subjects for any new European colonial establishments."

Our Secretary of State was no stranger to Russia and the Russians. President Madison had sent him to St. Petersburg in 1809 as American Minister. The next year, by direction from Washington, he had refused to cooperate with the Russians in regulating the trade in firearms with the aborigines of the northwest coast of North America. Thus we refrained from recognizing the sovereignty of the Czar in America, as we did again when the Russian trading post at Fort Ross in California, was set up in 1816.

"There can, perhaps, be no better time," Adams wrote to the American Minister at the court of the Muscovite monarch, on July 22, 1823, "for saying frankly and explicity to the Russian Government that the future peace of the world, and the interest of Russia itself, cannot be promoted by Russian settlements upon any part of the American continent."

Accordingly, it seems that the doctrine subsequently enunciated by President Monroe may have been a child of John Quincy Adams. It is unquestionable that he, as Monroe's Secretary of State, was initially looking westward at California, the Oregon Country, Alaska, and Russia, and not southward at Central America, the West Indies, and South America and eastward at the Great Powers of Western Europe.

The political geography of the two Americas in 1823 is shown on one of the maps (fig. 1.). The small United States of America, the large empire of Brazil, and the Spanish territories in and near Bolivia as well as Cuba and Puerto Rico all look strange to our eyes. Spanish America, Russian America, and the Danish Virgin Islands are things of the past. The independent Icelanders, the Greenland Danes, the Dutch, the French, and the British are still with us in America.

Presumably it was the European possessions south of Florida and Mexico, as well as Russian America, that Monroe and his cabinet were unwilling to allow to expand or to fall into the hands of non-American powers.

"We owe it therefore to candor," President Monroe asserted on December 2, 1823, in the message to Congress of which the Monroe Doctrine is a part, "and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety" (see p. 528).

One geographer's individual view of the extent of the Western Hemisphere is indicated on the map, figure 2, which is bisected horizontally by the equator. The eastern limit of the hemisphere is the meridian of 20° west of Greenwich; the western limit is the International Date Line—the geographer's Western Hemisphere is admittedly a shade smaller than the Eastern Hemisphere. The limits are adjusted slightly to include Greenland and Iceland in the Western Hemisphere but to exclude from the Western Hemisphere the Azores, the Cape Verde Islands, and Western Samoa. Greenland, as all geographers agree, is a part of the Western, or American Hemisphere; its northeast cape (12° W.) is farther east than easternmost Iceland (13° 25′ W.). As Stefansson has shown convincingly,[1] Iceland is a part of the Western Hemisphere—few geographers have said they think so, but no geographer has denied it. Who can say that this ancient state may not eventually become a member of that family of good neighbors—the Pan American Union.

A part of the great continent of Antarctica is likewise within the Western Hemisphere. An American from Connecticut, Nathaniel B. Palmer, discovered Antarctica.[2]

"Fellow citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives, many important subjects will claim your attention during the present session.

"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration, and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

"JAMES MONROE.

"WASHINGTON, December 2, 1823."

Another American from Massachusetts, John Quincy Adams, conceived and planned the first official American exploring expedition to the portions of Antarctica and the South Seas within the Western Hemisphere.

Report by Committee on Economic Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a report by the Committee on Economic Defense, recently published by the American Council on Public Affairs. This report entitled "Total Defense," presents matters of such importance to all of us that I consider they should receive the widest possible attention.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This report represents the considered views of the Committee on Economic Defense, an affiliate of the American Council on Public Affairs. The members of the committee are:

Clark Foreman, chairman, author The New Internationalism.
Will W. Alexander, Administrator, Farm Security Administration.
David Cushman Coyle, author and engineer.
Oscar A. de Lima, president, Roger Smith Corporation.
Paul Douglas, professor of economics, University of Chicago.
Mark Ethridge, general manager, Louisville Courier-Journal.
Edwin R. Embree, president, Julius Rosenwald Foundation.
Mrs. May Thompson Evans, assistant director, Women's Division of National Democratic Committee.
W. Jett Lauck, economist and acting chairman of American Association for Economic Freedom.
Ernest Lindley, author and columnist.
Mrs. Joan Raushenbush, political scientist and co-author of War Madness and The Final Choice.
Michael Ross, economist, Pennsylvania School of Social Work.
Phil D. Swing, lawyer and former Republican Congressman from California.

The committee will be glad to hear from persons interested in its proposals. Communication should be sent to 1721 I Street, Washington, D. C.

TOTAL DEFENSE

"I should like to be able to offer the hope that the shadow over the world might swiftly pass. I cannot. The facts compel my stating, with candor, that darker periods may lie ahead. The disaster is not of our making; no act of ours engendered the forces which assault the foundations of civilization. Yet we find ourselves affected to the core; our currents of commerce are changing, our minds are filled with new problems, our position in world affairs has already been altered.

"In such circumstances our policy must be to appreciate in the deepest sense the true American interest."—President Franklin D. Roosevelt. (Message to Congress, September 21, 1939.)

We in America cherish above all values our heritage of personal and political freedom. We have watched with heavy heart the people of other countries discard the very concept of individual liberty as a decadent weakness in the body politic. We have watched with even heavier heart the extinction of freedom by force of superior might for people who still clung to a way of life they were no longer able successfully to defend. The tragic conflict in Europe has brought very close the danger to our own cherished institutions of a world dominated by a philosophy which despises that which we hold dear and glorifies that which we ourselves reject.

In this situation there are some who sincerely feel that our only hope for survival as a democracy lies in the defeat of those countries whose philosophy is different from our own. But the course of events moves so swiftly today that we must necessarily look beyond the present possibility of ultimate victory for those whose philoscphy is similar to our own, and consider the defense of our institutions in a world where that philosophy has been effectively suppressed for other nations. It is the very essence of courage to believe that our democracy can survive in such a world. But courage alone is not enough. It must be supported by foresight, by intelligence, and, above all, by willingness to subordinate private economic interests to the common interests of the people as a whole. For it is surely self-evident that our economy could not continue to operate successfully on the old laissez-faire basis in a world dominated by highly controlled economic systems. And it is equally clear that our survival as a Nation and the protection of the personal liberties which form the very essence of our national life will depend on our ability to make the necessary economic adjustments.

This pamphlet undertakes to pose some of the problems involved in this adjustment. It seems essential that we consider these problems, for it could only mean further tragedy if we permitted our sympathy for the other liberty-loving peoples of the world to deter us from the kind of far-sighted planning which alone will permit us to keep the flames of freedom burning in our own land if it should be extinguished elsewhere.

America is not yet prepared for war; she is even less prepared for the settlement that will follow it. In the effort that is now being made to turn the vast powers of American industry toward preparedness for military defense, thought must be given to the fundamental changes in world economics that will follow when military operations cease. It would be comfortable for both business and government to assume that after the crisis in Europe is over, American business, foreign and domestic, will go on as usual. The purpose of this pamphlet is to question that assumption and to analyze the situations for which this country needs to be prepared, whether those situations are labeled war or peace.

The United States cannot afford to sit and wait for knowledge of the outcome before starting to plan what it is to do after the decision in Europe is reached. It is high time to think of alternate possibilities, in preparation for realistic protection of this country, whatever the outcome in Europe.

Those who feel that should Hitler be defeated the world economic system will settle down into a form not far different from that of the past 20 years are assuming that the Allies will have learned nothing from the disasters that followed Versailles. Actually it should be clear that the Allies will not repeat the same old mistakes, whatever new ones they may fall into when and if they defeat Germany. Moreover, there are many who hold that in the case of either an Allied or a German victory, in the long run the economic structure of Europe will be changed in essentially the same way.

Those whose thoughts have dwelt upon the danger of a Hitler-dictated peace and the large and terrifying possibilities of life in a world under the domination of Hitler, find no hope for a return to the old norms of international relations.

Obviously Germany cannot dictate the peace unless she has first defeated the French and the English Governments to the point where they either surrender or desert their countries. Just as obviously, if that occurs, no force in all Europe can prevent Germany from dictating completely the conditions of life for the European peoples. There is every reason to suppose that in the case of a German victory, the system of independent nations in Europe will be abolished in fact if not in form.

Even if, by a miracle, Germany should be defeated, or if England should for a time maintain a precarious hold on the edge of a Nazi-dominated continent, it would be necessary for the United States to have power to determine its future course independent of European events. At best there will be problems in Asia, revolutions in various parts of the world, and numerous dangers that America must meet. The Anglo-American struggles for oil throughout the world and their trade rivalries in Latin America during the 20's indicate that a common cultural heritage and a similar political regime do not preclude economic warfare.

In the post-war world, under any conceivable circumstances, international trade will be a matter of national security, with little legitimate place for private relationships between individuals of different countries. International trade will become, even more than now, a matter of intergovernmental trade and those governments that are not prepared for it will likely lose out in the coming competition.

Alsop and Kintner, in their American White Paper, say that President Roosevelt and Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle both agreed in September 1939 "that the war's main danger to this country lay in the alternative prospects of post-war economic chaos or world economy dominated by dictatorships." It is essential to recognize that while these dangers exist now and must be faced, there is no reason why they should paralyze us. So large and powerful a nation as ours need not lie helpless in the path of events. If we prepare our minds for the economic changes involved, and act with intelligence and speed, we can muster the physical and human power to keep our country from being overwhelmed by chaos or dictatorship in Europe.

We Americans must develop a political and economic policy, as a basis for the military preparedness which we are undertaking. Whether we are at peace or at war, we must be prepared on the economic as well as on the military front. Stated in its barest simplicity, we must, as a Nation, have within our control sufficient economic strength to be prosperous in peace and impregnable in war. An outer shell of military preparedness can be crushed unless it is bulwarked within by an economic structure that is sound.

The defense of America is not the defense of a geographic entity alone—it is the defense of a people, their way of life, their institutions and their aspirations. Any proposal for defense that would throw overboard the American form of government denies the very purpose of national defense. We must therefore demonstrate to the world that democracy is a success not only politically, but economically as well. In other words, we must be a living example to other nations that Americans are not only politically free, but under the democratic process, American industry is providing satisfactory employment for all those able and willing to work.

To secure America, the choice need not lie between an American dictatorship or domination by a foreign power. Whatever changes in economic relationships America must make to prepare herself against either threat must be made by democratic means, and must not halt the progressive extension of the principles of democracy. In America, Government controls must, in the last analysis, be subject to the democratically expressed will of the people.

The sooner we take steps to protect our independence, the more of it we will be able to save. If we are to save our liberties, and avoid the barbaric persecution of minority groups, we must act before acute national danger makes reasonable action impossible.

What changes in our economic system must be made to give us sufficient strength to stand the shocks that the future will bring? Can those changes be made in our economic system without destroying the political system for the defense of which those changes are made? This pamphlet is not intended to be a detailed answer to these questions. It is simply an attempt to sketch the outline of the job that must be done and to suggest some of the methods that might be used.

Twenty years ago the well-known English economist, J. M. Keynes, portrayed vividly to a believing world the thesis that the Versailles Treaty had so crippled Germany that she was no longer a threat to Europe. In his famous book, Economic Consequences of the Peace, Keynes held that in crippling Germany the Allies had also mortally injured international capitalism. In this latter belief he was followed by few.

Later events were to show that Keynes was more nearly correct about capitalism than about Germany. In fact, the phenomenal recovery of Germany indicates that one result of the peace treaty was to destroy in Germany the inhibitions of conventional finance, and thus to open the way for Hitler to utilize for purposes of economic and military power the entire material and human resources of the Reich. Under these conditions Germany became larger and more formidable than even before the war of 1914. Moreover, her economic methods are such as to create new and difficult problems for any democratic state that attempts to resist her domination.

It is easy for us now to look back and say that if the post-war democracy in Germany had been aided rather than blocked in its effort to establish reforms, Germany would not have resorted to the cruelties which have become a part of her form of government. But while refused aid to liberal reform, Germany was permitted to arm herself to the extent that she could defy the rest of Europe and threaten the rest of the world. The German Government was clever enough, even in its distress, to play upon the cupidity of foreign businessmen and through them to bring about the weakening of her enemies and the superior force of Germany, which Germany could have achieved in no other way.

By strict control of foreign exchange and domestic currency, the German Government not only obtained full utilization of all internal resources but also was able to coordinate its foreign trade. In spite of serious deficiencies in real wealth, Germany was thus enabled to obtain results with an efficiency unmatched by other, richer nations. She was able to use her foreign trade as a powerful instrument of political policy. This instrument was peculiarly successful in dealing with countries that still permitted private citizens to trade abroad at will. The German Government was able to play one foreign trader against another, and even to influence the foreign policy of other states, by using centralized-purchasing power to induce the traders of a country to bring pressure upon their governments.

Similar methods were used by Russia in the period when she was seeking diplomatic recognition from countries whose nationals were beginning to trade with her. Thus, as far back as 1933 this practice was familiar not only to the dictator countries, but to their future victims, as was noted by the London Times in an editorial on July 3, 1933. The Times, after quoting the Soviet Encyclopedia's boast of this power, commented: "The need for special safeguards in trading with a gigantic state monopoly run on these principles is now recognized by all except the few who still hold that the only economic wisdom is to buy always in the cheapest market, no matter how temporary that cheapness is likely to be or how ruinous it may prove in the long run."

That the well-organized economic strength of Germany was used for undermining other nations has been repeatedly demonstrated by the events of the war. The great attention now being paid to "fifth columnists" of the mere propagandist variety overlooks the fact that the most effective weakening of Allied resistance was accomplished through legtimate business relations, before the military war began. Moreover, this weakening was effected by working on the rich and influential industrial leaders.

If Germany wins the war in Europe, there can be no doubt that she will continue her policy of bringing under her economic control all the conquered lands, and will include any remaining helpless countries in her sphere of influence. The foreign trade of 400,000,000 people will be controlled, directed, and centralized in one government, and can be brought to bear with deadly accuracy upon any foreign nation that might venture to oppose Germany's policies. If we are to defend ourselves against this new weapon we must not only recognize the danger as the London Times did in 1933, we must act promptly and effectively to shield ourselves against it.

With a unified Europe, the post-war world may contain four major economic empires: Europe with 400,000,000 inhabitants, China-Japan with about 400,000,000, U. S. S. R. with about 200,000,000, and the United States of America and Canada with about 150,000,000. The economic alinement of South America, Africa, the Pacific islands, and parts of Asia would be determined by the gigantic struggle for control that would unquestionably follow soon. In this struggle the United States cannot avoid taking some part, even if we were to content ourselves with an attempt to hold only the independence of North America and the Caribbean Sea.

It is obvious that if no measures of protection, other than military preparedness, are taken in the United States, this country would be almost immediately rendered helpless by the disruptive effects of Europe's centrally controlled foreign trade. It is obviously necessary to build an economic union, guaranteeing complete protection not only to our own territory but to all the free nations with which we may be associated for defense against the dictatorships. Across this wall of protection, it is clear, no private trade nor opportunity for bribery nor economic pressure can be permitted to pass. It appears certain that the establishment and maintenance of an effective barrier against the economic weapons of Germany will involve certain drastic changes.

In order to defend our security in war, and our prosperity in peace, our Government must have power to assure to this country a supply of all necessary materials, and also to protect our interests against economic pressure from any hostile power. This necessity requires a recognition, in acts as well as in words, that the system of international free trade cannot function as long as any important part of the world is controlled by powers which can take advantage of that system to threaten our security.

The United States should act promptly to expand its present sources of supply of strategic raw materials in the Western Hemisphere and to establish the production in Latin America of the many essential materials which can be produced there but which we now import from remote areas in Asia and Africa. We know now, from our experience of the past 20 years, that international politics, so long as dictatorships exist, are merely a form of war. Under these conditions we cannot afford to neglect our own defense under the illusion that we are at peace.

Of the materials which we now import, the latest report of the Army and Navy Munitions Board (March 1940) lists some 29 materials which it considers essential to national defense. Of these, 14 are called strategic because in a war we should depend largely on sources outside the United States for them. Fifteen other essential materials are called critical, because while essential, they would in time of war present less of a problem owing to the fact that they are obtainable in larger measure in this country.[1]

In working out such a list, the Munitions Board has made a most valuable contribution, but it is merely the first step in the solution of our problem. The Board itself, however, outlines four possible ways for meeting the present denciencies:

1. By development of domestic production of these materials on a scale equal or partially equal to requirements.

2. By development of substitutes.

3. By maintaining friendly relations with the nations who control the sources and distribution of these materials and by keeping trade routes open to the principal sources.

4. By acquiring adequate stock piles of these materials in time of peace as a war reserve, particularly those which offer the most difficulty of solution by the foregoing methods.

In planning our future economy we must consider all these possibilities and in addition a fifth—that of developing new sources of strategic materials in areas which we are prepared to defend. The method chosen in the long run must be the one that contributes most to our national safety, but that does not mean that it is necessarily better to develop a substitute in the United States than to assist in the production of the original in some other American country.

All of the strategic materials or substitutes for them are either obtainable or can be developed in the Western Hemisphere. Many also exist in Asia. The availability of these materials is a question of great importance in making out both an economic plan and a plan for military defense. The two are interdependent and should be considered together. Where the strategic material exists, therefore, both in South America and Asia, it is obviously to our advantage to rely on the South American source rather than the more distant and much more vulnerable Asiatic source.

Inasmuch as we can with proper planning get all of our essential needs from this hemisphere, the question of military defense impels us so to direct our plan. This means that the United States must strengthen its relationship with those countries and organize them on a basis of mutual advantage. The necessity of reliance on South America for certain materials merely serves to reenforce the military necessity of protecting South America from Nazi control, in order to avoid an impossible situation in the defense of the Panama Canal. All considerations of our own safety require us to obtain the willing and enthusiastic cooperation of South America in hemisphere defense, at whatever cost.

Any program which envisages the large scale of development of inter-American trade coupled with the mutual extension of our cultural, social, and political relations, must be the joint product of the American nations. We cannot effect the wholehearted cooperation of our southern neighbors unless they are active participants from the start in the establishment of a program designed to increase both their security and their prosperity, as well as our own. It would be folly for us to think that we could gain the economic cooperation of other countries and the exclusion of hostile political influence merely by increasing our Army and Navy, however necessary such increases may be. Military defense is not enough defense. It is essential that all nations that we propose to defend shall prefer our friendship to any other. Even though there are some countries in this hemisphere on which we are not dependent for imports, nevertheless the difficulties of military defense of any part of South America are vastly increased if a hostile power has a foothold in any part of it. Obviously we must think of the economic as well as the military development of the whole hemisphere.

There must be no revival of the dollar diplomacy which allowed private corporations to exploit South American resources with no regard to our national interest nor to that of the country exploited. Although our long-run national interest was not considered, the exploitation proceeded with the help of our nationally supported fleet. That system brought profits to some, along with worthless bonds to many, and a "Yankee imperialism" which aroused hatred against this country and created a fertile ground for "fifth column" activity. Under the good-neighbor policy, much has, of course, been done to overcome the ills of dollar diplomacy. The unanimous declaration of Lima was a real forward step in inter-American relations. Our dependence on bilateral trade agreements has, however, provide woefully inadequate in meeting the trade technique of the totalitarian powers.

In order to build up a prosperous pan-American economy, it will be necessary to plan for the exchange within this hemisphere of goods which will increase the standard of living of the Latin-American countries as well as those of Canada and the United States. In this way the markets for all of the American countries will be increased and among themselves they will be largely self-sufficient. In 1938, according to the Department of Commerce, the United States took $553,600,000 or 31.5 percent of the exports of 20 Latin American republics, and supplied to the same countries $497,195,000, or 35.8 percent of their imports. For 11 of the 20 the trade with the United States represented more than a third of their imports as well as their exports.[2] The United States does not dominate in the trade of the more southern countries of South America where so many of the products—wheat, cotton, beef, etc.—are competitive with our own products. The problem of these South American surpluses which we do not now absorb is a difficult one, and in the solution of it we must start with the assumption that South American countries will not be satisfied unless their surpluses are sold.

Canada and the United States at present enjoy a large trade which could be greatly extended by a customs union. That would not in itself solve the problem that faces both countries in the form of a wheat surplus. This problem must be attacked in combination with those countries in South America that also have a wheat surplus. There may be several possible solutions; included among them will be increased consumption in this hemisphere, eventual substitution of some other crop on land which can only be used profitably for wheat when the farmers receive a subsidy, and trade abroad. The most important thing for us to think of at once is the development of our bargaining power as a pan-American system. We shall need all the time possible, and there is none to spare. At the end of the present war in Europe the bargaining position of the American countries will, if effectively combined, unquestionably be the greatest in the world. Regardless of cost and existing commercial customs, we must keep that advantage.

We must arrange for collective bargaining by the countries of the Western Hemisphere in dealing with the totalitarian systems as no individual American country, dealing alone, would be a match for the totalitarian powers in the field of international trade. If the United States attempted to outbid Europe in a barter arrangement with a single South American country it would mean we would have to be prepared to reduce the living standards of American labor to that of Europe. By bargaining collectively within the pan-American economy we will be able to maintain and raise our standard of living and that of all the American countries, at the same time dealing with Europe to our advantage.

We should start negotiations at once to use our great financial strength for the purchase of exports of Latin America. These commodities could then be turned over to a pan-American trading corporation, which, in turn, would use them to meet the needs of the people of this hemisphere through a circular exchange among the American countries, by direct distribution, or by trading them for desired products in other parts of the world. In fact, it is difficult to see how we can escape a rapid collapse of our influence south of Panama by any less drastic move. For the moment, we have no power but money, and we have most of the money in the world. If we hesitate to use that power we may find its value evaporating.

This action would, of course, be merely a temporary stopgap and should be accompanied as rapidly as possible by the formation of a permanent pan-American trading corporation. This public corporation should aim to develop a circular trade within the hemisphere, providing a higher standard of living, and full employment. The program could be greatly assisted by making loans at nominal rates of interest to develop the industrial programs called for by the pan-American economic plan. Our Government could supply the Inter-American Bank, which is just about to be created by the governments of the Western Hemisphere with the necessary reserves to finance these investment developments.[3]

Along with the maximum of profitable exchange between the various countries of this hemisphere, their surpluses could be offered to the other countries of the world by the Pan American trading council for the products which were still demanded here. Bargaining through the trading council would, however, be essential, as otherwise Europe, in dealing with isolated American countries, could use local price cutting to divide and rule in this hemisphere.

Every effort should be made by the pan-American trading council through normal channels and through some such device as the stamp plan which has worked so effectively in the United States to stimulate the rise in the standard of living in all American countries. This is not only highly desirable but quite practical as a measure of internal defense to prevent the formation of disaffected groups of people.

While we need important products which can be grown in South American countries, those countries also need some of our products that they are not now getting. For example, in 1937, one South American country was paying $1.50 a bushel for corn grown on its domestically protected farms, at a time when United States grown corn was being sold under subsidy to Europe at 25 cents a bushel. Similarly, a South American country was paying $2 a bushel for wheat when we were selling it for less than $1 a bushel.

The use of the movies and radio to prepare and interest Latin American peoples in a program of more intense economic cooperation is essential. Also important is the extension of cultural relations, social contacts, and a much greater inter-American travel. It has been estimated that if American tourists spent annually in Latin America half of their expenditures in Europe in 1938, they would pay interest on a loan of $5,000,000,000. This merely gives an idea of how important travel can be in the economic relations of countries; tourist expenditures have been an important factor in the balance of trade of many a European country.

Our present trade with the Latin American countries could be increased greatly by the further development in those countries of such minerals as chromium, manganese, tungsten, antimony, and tin, all of which are vitally needed by the United States. Also the United States would be much stronger defensively if the Latin American countries grew more agricultural products, noncompetitive with our own, such as rubber, abaca (manila fiber) and quinine.

The Department of Agriculture has been for many years studying the possible development of new complementary products in Latin American countries which would serve as a substantial means of increasing our trade with Latin America. Rubber is one of the most important of these products. We now import our enormous supply of it from the Far East. With cooperation between the United States and countries in Latin America, which can produce rubber, it would be possible to supply our needs from those sources. Recommendations for the development of agriculture in tropical America were made by the Department of Agriculture more than 2 years ago. There is now pending before Congress a request by the Department of Agriculture for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the development of rubber production in Latin America.

Abacá (manila fiber), necessary for naval cordage, which we now get from the Philippines, could also be produced in Latin America. A planting experiment of 2,000 acres in Panama indicates that abacá can be produced in the American tropics. The cinchona plant, from which quinine comes, is native to South America. The United States now depends on the East Indies for its source of quinine. The American tropics are rich in various kinds of hardwoods which the United States could use. These resources which can be developed to great advantage for us and for the Latin American countries will not, however, be developed without the active assistance and cooperation of the countries involved.

[2] The 11 countries in which trade with the United States was this dominant are: Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, and El Salvador.

[3] This bank is the outcome of the recommendations of the Inter-American Economic and Financial Advisory Conference established at the Panama meeting in 1939 of the foreign ministers of the American republics. It is provided that all of the stock of the Inter-American Bank will be owned by the governments of the republics of this hemisphere. The treaty establishing the bank was opened for signature on May 10, 1940, and has already been signed by several republics, including the United States. Our signature, however, has not yet been ratified by our Senate.

"If Germany wins, there will be a lot of big orders coming over," said an important businessman visiting Washington recently. And he was right. When the war is over, whether Germany wins or not, Europe will need badly many things that the United States can export. So great is the force of our sales organizations and the tradition of individual action regardless of social considerations, that unless our Government is prepared to take strong action the orders will probably be filled without regard to their effect on American security as a whole.

Unquestionably, we will be assured that Europe intends to carry on business as usual, just as the British businessmen were lulled into inaction by the repeated statements that Germany was a bulwark against Communism. In fact, on June 14, 1940, there was published in the American press an interview with Hitler to the effect that he saw no reason to make war in America. This effort to lull our businessmen with a poisoned olive branch reveals one of Hitler's most dangerous techniques. It happened that on the same day a German consul general in New Orleans unwittingly exposed his master. In an interview which he later said he intended to be "off the record" he was quoted by the press as saying "For the past 20 years we have been preparing, while France and England have been sleeping, expecting that they were safe * * * my country will not forget that when she was fighting bitterly for her very life, the United States gave every material aid to her enemies."

If the orders are placed immediately, the financial interests involved will be dependent to that extent upon the European economy. It will be only a short step from that to the time when firms employing individuals, who for any reason are unacceptable to the government of Europe, will not receive orders, or firms supporting a pro-American political policy will be boycotted. Such is the standard practice of Germany already in many countries. Latin America has many Nazi-controlled companies built first on favors and later on pressure and blackmail. Also, newspapers which print any unflattering news about Hitler or his Government will have to be boycotted by those firms expecting trade from Europe, and no advertising may be placed with them.

The multiplication of such subtle pressures may well undermine resistance in the powerful group at the top of our social and political systems, and leave the military forces uncalled, no matter how well armed. The United States would then gradually decline to colonial status. In order that the national interest be protected against any such conscious or unconscious move to sell the country down the ocean, a rigid system of Government control over foreign trade would have to be instituted at once, and exports swapped for imports only when the net result is gainful to the country as a whole. Only in this way can discrimination be prevented, and the loyalties of all kept unselfishly American.

It may be expected that such a course of action would immediately bring domestic repercussions, particularly in those businesses and sections which now look to foreign trade for a part of their profits. Problems of adjustment would be presented which would need solution in accordance with our democratic institutions. One of our first duties would be to find other ways of using the people, lands, and industries now engaged in supplying that part of the export trade which might be found to be superfluous.

Our Government, in providing for the employment and general welfare of our people, would have to work in close cooperation with the plans of the pan-American trading council. As an example, the health of millions of people in this country, as well as others in this hemisphere, demands a greater consumption of dairy products. The production and distribution of those products could be achieved by a Government-guaranteed price which would lead to the use of much more land for the production of dairy products, land which is now used for producing wheat, cotton, and other agricultural surpluses, the need for which is not so urgent.

Similarly, the production and processing of strategic materials must be protected. During the last war there were factories in this country for the refinement of tin. After the war, those factories were closed and Bolivian tin was shipped to England for refinement before coming here. Along the same line, our Government must not let the good work of one department be canceled out by another. Our dependence on German potash before the first World War was remedied by exploration subsidized by the Department of the Interior. The potash was found on Government land, but of the three companies formed to mine this potash, two (The United States Potash Co. and the American Potash & Chemical Corporation [4]) are now completely controlled by British interests. Presumably that control will pass to Germany if she wins the war, unless the United States has a strong policy and adequate powers for commandeering foreign-owned properties.

A different but dangerous foreign threat to our strategic necessities is through patents. As an example of a condition which exists in many fields, we may cite the production of range finders, an instrument indispensable in modern warfare. In this country they are produced by the firm of Bausch & Lomb, which in turn uses a patent of the Germany company of Carl Zeiss. Although the sale of these instruments in this country is limited to the Government, the American company signed a contract with the German company to furnish the latter with information as to the number of instruments supplied to the United States Government. Moreover, the German company reserves the right, though it has never exercised it, to name the head of the department of Bausch & Lomb which manufactures these instruments.[5]

Readjustments in our foreign trade inevitably affect the domestic economy. To meet the new needs new factories will have to be started, and some forms of production now in being will have to be changed for production more in harmony with the national welfare. In the years before the present war the German Government allowed the importation only of those products vitally needed for the national interest. At the same time it allowed the export of only those products which were not of vital importance. The uncontrolled trade of the United States in dealing with the German system led to interesting results. For cotton and copper we were receiving such items as cameras, Christmas-tree ornaments, and harmonicas. As desirable as the importations may be, it is obvious that if such a trade exchange is kept up between us and Europe after this war it will not be long before we shall be traded into a colonial status, with the power in Europe and the toys in America.

Readjustments in production will require new skills on the part of our people, and no accident of economics should be permitted to prevent the necessary training. At the same time it is necessary to prevent overcrowding of particular trades.

We are fortunately in a good position to profit now from the British experience. The methods they have adopted to meet the situation, now that the fate of the nation is in doubt, may serve to guide us while we are still able to take the precautions without worrying about parachutists. The New York Times of June 6, 1940, discussed editorially the difficult situation in which England finds herself now as a result of the failure of the Government to provide necessary training to overcome the lack of skilled labor in essential industries. After quoting an article in the London Economist on this subject, the New York Times remarked:

"There is a confessed shortage in England of skilled and experienced workers in many essential industries. Definite courses of instruction and learning periods cannot be dispensed with. In Germany, the Economist points out, 4 weeks' training is given to all unskilled recruits to the metal trades—almost wholly in the actual works and on the machines being used in production. The local 'labor front' aids in the drafting of training schemes, and defaulting employers are denied additional skilled labor until semi-skilled workers (in this lesser sense of mere machine operators) are being adequately turned out. The German slogan is: 'We must abolish the unskilled worker.'

"It should not be hard for British industry, the Economist declares, to follow suit on a massive scale. It needs only Government leadership and command. This covers not simply the Government's readiness, already announced, to pay the fares of unemployed men going to employers for training, but its decision to pay for the maintenance and cost of training as well as for the transfer of hundreds of thousands of workers not now in war work, whether idle or not, and its determination to enforce quite ruthlessly the maximum training of machine operators in the Nation's factories.

We have millions unemployed and every effort to get private industry to employ them has failed to meet the situation. It is therefore particularly revealing that two such well-known conservative organs could print a sentence to the effect "that it needs only Government leadership and command." The general lack of realism in this respect is well illustrated by the speeches of one of the conservative candidates for President. He asks the people of the country to help the democracies of Europe and to achieve national unity at home. In the same breath he says that the Government must let private enterprise solve the unemployment situation "by turning industry loose." He deplored the idea that "Government increasingly must regulate economy" and begs his listeners not to call on the Government to save us.

We hope that this is not a call for that type of national unity, under the leadership of private corporations, which permitted a private company to delay for 3 months the construction of a Government powder plant, after we entered the World War, until it got the terms it demanded, because, in the words of one of the largest holders of munitions stock at the time, "* * * we cannot consent to allowing our own patriotism to interfere with our duties as trustees." [4] Report on the Potash Industry by U. S. Department of Commerce, May 1940.

[5] When these and other provisions of this particular contract were challenged by the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice, the attitude of the American company was haughty. In fact, when the U. S. Navy ordered a supply of the range finders, the company demurred. Pointing to the action of the Department of Justice, the company said that no deliveries could be made for 6 months. This action was brought to the attention of the Justice Department just after the German invasion of the Netherlands with the consequent arousing of American public opinion. The officers of the company were called in and told that unless they agreed to deliver the instruments at once the whole matter would be brought to the attention of the public. It was also implied that the present state of public opinion might cause a sentence of imprisonment as well as fine for violating the antitrust law in such a flagrant way. The company signed, but there are many other similar instances that need to be brought to light and prosecuted.

National economic defense, like national military defense, must be undertaken by the Government. The two must be closely coordinated through the various Government agencies. Based on such a combined defense, we may build up a prosperous New World and say to the old that we are ready and willing to cooperate in peace, but also ready to turn back all attempts to undermine our security, whether the attempts are political or military, financial or commercial. If the necessity of economic preparedness is beyond our power of understanding and action, there is little point in wasting effort on a military establishment that can so easily be outflanked.

Some of the political scientists in the past have regarded foreign policy as something beyond the understanding of the common man—something removed from the democratic process. In fact, our political scientists have often implied, as did Lord Bryce in his classic work on democracy in America, that democracies were incapable of developing foreign policies. The principles of secrecy, continuity, and diplomatic usage, they felt, made democratic procedures inapplicable in this field. This led directly to the abuse of diplomatic agencies by powerful corporations ready to convert the prestige of the country to their own profiteering.

Now we realize that if we are to be safe at home we must have a foreign policy that is in the national interest, and one that will not be guided either by ideologies abroad or special interests at home. If we are to have the time to develop a democratic way of life in this hemisphere, our dealings with the rest of the world should be directed toward securing the necessary time and peace for such work. We believe our way of life is superior but it cannot be imposed at the cannon's point. Other people's doubts as to this superiority will be lessened to the extent that we succeed in insuring peace and prosperity in this continent.

Should the present world struggle eventuate, as we have suggested it well might in the rest of the world being divided in the main among three great totalitarian powers it is not the path of wisdom to have all three of those powers in common enmity to us. Such a course would require armed might far beyond our present capacity. In fact the counsel of wisdom would be to avail ourselves of such differences of interest as exist already among the other powers and use those differences to our own best advantage. In order to maintain the independence of the Americas it is clearly to our common advantage to concentrate our trading power into a single instrument, to be used first of all for our common welfare and security.

SUMMARY

1. Military defense is not enough defense; the well-being of our people and our pan-American neighbors must be secured.
2. We are faced with the possibility of an integrated and centrally controlled economy in Europe representing approximately 400,000,000 people. Should such an economy be established, the noncontrolled economies will lose out in the competition with it in the two fields in which powers compete—foreign trade and armaments.
3. We must be in a position to protect not only ourselves but also those areas from which we import the goods which are vital for our impregnability in war and our prosperity in peace. All strategic needs of the United States, or substitutes for them, are either obtainable or can be developed in the Western Hemisphere.
4. Foreign trade must be conducted as a matter of national interest. The balance between imports and exports should not be calculated in currency but in terms of the value to national welfare of the products involved
5. Without awaiting the outcome of the war, we should immediately purchase all the exports of the republics in this hemisphere.
6. A cooperative program with all the countries in the Western Hemisphere should be developed, including: An inter-American trading corporation to exchange surpluses for imports needed by the countries of this hemisphere; distribution of goods to needy people in all American countries, using some device such as the stamp plan; development of tropical agriculture in Latin America; development of necessary mineral and other resources; training and re-training of workers for necessary industrial readjustments; improvement of transportation and communication facilities; improvement of cultural relations through movies, radio, schools, and travel.
7. Ample military and naval protection for the New World.

"Fifth Columnists" and Trojan Horses

OF

HON. JAMES M. SLATTERY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM CHICAGO DAILY CALUMET

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Daily Calumet of June 8, 1940, under the heading "Mr. DIES in South Shore."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Calumet of June 8, 1940]

MR. DIES IN SOUTH SHORE

It was reassuring the other night at South Shore Country Club to hear 2,000 citizens applaud to the echo, exposés on "fifth columnists" and Trojan horses—reassuring because it makes one feel with all the enemies who bore from within, there still remains a stalwart citizenry loyal to the God of our fathers and the Constitution of the United States.

The occasion was the appearance of Hon. MARTIN W. DIES, chairman of the House Committee Investigating Un-American Activities. The fiery Congressman from Texas was at his best, and in direct language revealed the work of those who would destroy America.

But we were disappointed. We listened to 90 minutes of polished oratory; we were chilled many times by his revelations. We waited patiently for one thing: the remedy that will cure this cancer in America; but DR. DIES did not prescribe beyond the warning that we must have national unity.

We fear education for national unity has run its course and still the Trojan horses graze in our fertile fields and "fifth columnists" pitch their tents on our lawns.

It would appear that war has its compensations, however paradoxical the statement appears. With threat of invasion, war provides a swift vehicle for national unity in America. Now is the time to stamp out the rats and the snakes that have multiplied while we slept.

How are we going to accomplish this? We said before in this column that the Bill of Rights guaranteeing free speech and free press was all right to criticize the Government and the leaders in it until our hearts are content—but the Bill of Rights never was intended as an instrument to protect traitors or those bent on overthrow of the Government. Mr. DIES, we are happy to say, also said the same thing in South Shore.

The F. B. I. and the United States Army would clean up this country in a hurry. Declaration of martial law, abrogating all civil and criminal law would brush aside any claims of invasion of constitutional rights by those caught in the dragnet. It is a statement based on radicalism, we forthright admit, when we say that perhaps a purge is in order. But, mark us, radicalism will have to be fought with radicalism. Blood will be spilled anyway before we put down our enemies of free government in America.

It is time to strike while we still hold the upper hand—or do we?

Proposed Sale of 50 Destroyers to England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "One Man's Opinion," written by Hugh S. Johnson, and published in the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, August 6, 1940, dealing with the proposal to sell 50 destroyers to England.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Washington Daily News of August 6, 1940]

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

NEW YORK.—General Pershing says that we ought to sell 50 obsolete destroyers to England to save our country from Germany. On the same subject George Fielding Eliot says:

"The question which we have to ask ourselves is a plain one. It ought not to be befuddled by such nonessentials as whether the transfer of destroyers to Great Britain would or would not be an act of war. It would be, of course, but that is only an academic question. * * * The legal definitions of international conduct * * * are now obsolete."

It seems that everything is now obsolete as far as it suits the purpose of those who are hell-bent on getting this country into a war for which it is completely unprepared.

The destroyers are obsolete. Our own engagements in treaties and conventions and the things we have always stood and sometimes fought for are, in international law, obsolete. As to destroyers being obsolete, if they are, how does it happen, as men of this opinion intimate or argue, that the Battle of Britain, the fate of the world's freedom and the safety of our own country depend upon sending them to Britain? As an American officer said when it was being argued that we ought also to send over a million obsolete Springfield rifles, "no rifle is obsolete that will kill a man with an aimed shot at 1,500 yards—especially when you have nothing with which to replace it."

A ship doesn't necessarily become obsolete or surplus simply because it is 16 years old. We are furiously overhauling these World War destroyers and using them every day. They can't be surplus because we have nowhere near enough destroyers for our present fleet, let alone our proposed new one.

Nobody has shown this more clearly and honestly than Major Eliot. I don't know his qualifications as a naval expert, but applying well-known published naval standards and opinions as to the proper ratio of destroyers to battleships, Major Eliot showed that practically none of these destroyers is surplus or can be taken without stripping our own Navy. They are, therefore, no more surplus than obsolete.

Just as a sidelight, most of them are armed with 4-inch guns and 3-inch guns, as well as with antiaircraft guns. Except for World War 75 mm. artillery (about 3-inch), cannon of higher caliber and antiaircraft guns are what we do not have, what we most need, and what we have the least prospect of getting quickly.

In Mr. Knudsen's last progress report as published, bottleneck items of procurement were discussed as well as those in which there were no bottlenecks. But he didn't mention cannon. He probably didn't mention them because the trouble there isn't just a bottleneck; it's a needle's eye and a flock of camels.

Major Eliot is very frank and very accurate in calling the shipment of destroyers an "act of war." It is war itself. But it is vicarious war—undercover war. The kind of war we have always condemned and pledged ourselves not to wage. The weakness of this position seems to me to be this: Our policy always has been not to be aggressors in any war. We fight only when we are attacked or threatened.

These war-minded men are put in the position of having to say, and they do say, that we are so threatened now—to the death. If that is not true then we ought not to go to war, even to this blind-pig, bootleg war. If it is true then we ought to go to war tomorrow, with everything we have. In a fight to a knockout you can't "hit soft."

The fact is that it is not true. If it were true these gentlemen and Mr. Roosevelt's administration, which has given every evidence of sympathizing with them, would have no trouble at all in getting their wish and plunging us into war to the hilt tomorrow. They should not be permitted to get us in by any blind-pig entrance.

Defend Our Shores—Keep Our Men Out of Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY JEANNETTE RANKIN

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the able radio address of the Honorable Jeannette Rankin, delivered at Helena, Mont., on July 8, 1940. Miss Rankin's record in the World War Congress will live in American history. Jeannette Rankin had the vision and the courage to vote "No" on our involvement in the quarrels of Europe and the boundary disputes of the Old World.

Jeannette Rankin was born on a ranch near Missoula, Mont., one of a family of six children, all of whom were graduated from the University of Montana. Anna Howard Shaw, great leader in women's suffrage in her autobiography, The Story of a Pioneer, said of Jeannette Rankin that "to her energy and service the winning of women's suffrage in Montana was largely due."

Active in the cause of women's suffrage, she was a member of the congressional committee that worked for the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which became effective in 1920, extending suffrage to women in all States, thus being the only woman able to vote for women's suffrage.

After her graduation at the University of Montana, she went to New Zealand, where she worked as a dressmaker to study labor conditions. Later she attended the New York School of Philanthropy and devoted herself to child-placing and social work. In 1919 she accompanied the late Jane Addams, internationally known social worker, to a conference of the Women's International League founded by Miss Addams at Zurich, Switzerland, and later worked with Miss Addams for several years at Hull House in Chicago and in legislatures in the Middle West for remedial legislation for women and children, particularly for 8-hour-day laws, minimum-wage laws, and child-labor legislation.

For the past 11 years Miss Rankin has been lobbying in Congress for progressive legislation as legislative secretary of the national council. For the past 5 years she has worked for a proposed measure to unify the Military Establishment so that the United States would have a more complete and modernized defense. She has become personally acquainted with the Senators in Congress and with practically all of the Congressmen, and the Senators and Representatives know and respect her, or she could not have continued with this work for so many years.

Following I include statements from the Pathfinder, World Outlook, and Kansas City Star on the ability and accomplishments of Jeannette Rankin:

[From World Outlook of November 1938]

Miss Rankin is today one of the Nation's best known women. She is acknowledged in Washington as a leading authority on peace-war issues. Her charm of manner and friendliness of attitude, coupled with a comprehensive grasp of her subject matter, make her an exceptionally able public speaker.

[John Weaver, in Kansas City Star of June 10, 1940]

CAPABLE

Thirty years of fighting for women's suffrage, minimum wages for women, and peace have not made her a zealot. She is vivacious with a quick, nervous speech, adjusting and readjusting her horned-rimmed spectacles, she can cram her conversation with statistics without sacrificing any of her feminine charm.

[From Pathfinder of June 15, 1940]

In 1916 Jeannette Rankin, of Montana, was elected to serve in the House of Representatives, and thus became the first Congresswoman in the Nation's history. No longer in Congress, she takes a prominent part today in peace-promoting activities.

We need Miss Rankin in Washington. The Congress needs her experience and advice in domestic as well as foreign affairs. America is proud of her, and I am sure Montana will promote and advance Jeannette Rankin, which she richly deserves.

The name of Jeannette Rankin is not new to you. Miss Rankin first became known in Montana as the woman who led the campaign that gave Montana women the right to vote. Two years later she was sent to Washington by the voters of Montana, the first woman elected to Congress. While a Member of Congress Miss Rankin introduced much of the progressive social legislation that is now taken for granted in our country, including the first bill to provide Federal instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy.

Since then Miss Rankin has continuously engaged in legislative work with national leaders at Hull House in Chicago and in Washington for social legislation and for the prevention of war. She has counseled with all the important Members of the present Congress. She knows them personally and has their friendship and respect. She is thoroughly familiar with the complicated machinery of getting laws passed in Washington. And these things are profoundly important in times like these, when Congress must work with intelligence and dispatch in order to prepare this Nation to face the coming months.

Jeannette Rankin is a candidate for Congress on the Republican ticket. When you vote for her you will be voting for a native Montanan, born on a ranch near Missoula, a graduate of the University of Montana, and a woman who has devoted her life to a study of labor and social conditions here, in New Zealand, and in Europe.

After her legislative experience in Congress, it was her privilege to be associated with the late Jane Addams for many years, working at Hull House in Chicago, and in legislatures in the Middle West for 8-hour-day laws, minimum-wage laws, and child-labor legislation.

For the last 11 years, in behalf of the national council, Miss Rankin has worked continuously with the Congressmen in Washington for progressive legislation. And it should be a privilege for every thinking voter in this district to go to the polls and cast a vote for a woman who has devotedly served Montana in the past and whose qualifications promise the highest service in the future.

Miss Rankin has just won the nomination for Congress on the Republican ticket. We confidently expect her to win in November.

We are now in a great world crisis and men and women must vote to express our opinions. The issues have never been more vital and more real than in this election. Prepare to the limit for defense. Keep our men out of Europe.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I know that you want me to talk about the war situation. It is too horrible and depressing, but it must be faced.

For the last 20 years there have been individual officers in the Army and Navy and Members of Congress who have tried to impress military authorities with the new situations resulting from the experiences of the last war and from modern inventions.

General Mitchell was discharged from the Army because he insisted that the possibilities of the airplane be considered.

Gen. Johnson Hagood found it necessary to resign because he contended that the overlapping and duplications and obsolescence of the Military Establishments would be a serious handicap under new fighting conditions.

Congressmen have pleaded over and over again for armored tanks to protect our men and have deplored the sending of men into battle with nothing but woolen suits as protection against the bullets from modern machine guns.

WHERE THERE IS NO VISION THE PEOPLE PERISH

Our industrialists and inventors have built the tanks and new equipment and pleaded with authorities to equip our Military Establishments, and yet we have continued under the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended in 1920, with an organization which provides for an expeditionary force of millions of men rather than modernization of equipment to protect our own country.

We have been told that surprising things have been happening in Europe. Nevertheless there is yet to be pointed out one thing that has not been anticipated and discussed many times in the committees of Congress so that our militarists were aware of changed conditions. One discouraged Congressman remarked, "Tanks and planes have no votes."

Norway had the guns to defend her coast, but they were silenced. Everyone should know that the first necessity in national defense is to have loyal citizens, and to have loyal citizens, education, health, and economic security must be available.

Facilities for communication and transportation and modern industries to develop our resources are needed to defend our Nation against all enemies, including such enemies as ignorance, disease, and poverty, which are always with us.

PREPARE TO THE LIMIT TO DEFEND OUR SHORES

We also need a highly modernized, mechanized military defense provided in peacetime, and so perfected that every man, woman, and child can go to sleep, knowing that no enemy can reach us. When an enemy or aggressor nation, which is in fact an enemy is aware that our shores are impregnable, that troops cannot be landed on our shore, or the shores of our neighbors, they will not waste time crossing the ocean.

Being familiar with this condition, and knowing that the people of this country were opposed to sending men to Europe, but willing to spend any amount of money to protect our rights and our shores from invasion, I pled with the Committee on Investigations of Munitions to state our military policy to be a determination to prepare to the limit to defend our rights and shores, and let the world know that we are unwilling to send our men to Europe to fight in foreign wars.

For 5 long years I have urged the people in the United States and the leaders on the military and naval committees to decide on a policy which conforms with the wishes of the American people, and to build the military equipment to make our entire coast as impregnable as Corregidor.

The problems of the world can be seen in the United States on a miniature scale—miniature only in comparison—but very real and overwhelming in fact. The problems of the nations must be approached by an understanding of Montana and her needs.

The economic conditions in Montana require the concentrated attention of all the people, men and women—especially women; for it has been their traditional responsibility from time immemorial, to care for the children, to nurse the sick, to feed the hungry, and to protect the old.

THE MOST TRAGIC PROBLEM IS UNEMPLOYMENT

The most tragic problem is unemployment. There are millions of youths between the ages of 18 and 24 who are being callously told, "Society doesn't need you. There is no work for you in advancing the common good. We have to feed you but there is no real place for you."

We have children, hungry for food, love, and security, in the midst of plenty.

The fact that we have such an increasing number of old people fearful of their future makes a new problem for the United States. If there were only a few with their futures unprovided for, it might be the fault of the individual, but when millions find themselves in despair, obviously the fault is beyond the control of the individual and is the concern of the Nation.

No adjustment of our economic institutions will be satisfactory unless based on the astonishing fact that an abundance can be made available. Our facilities for production have been developed but the possibilities of consumption neglected.

Neither the farms nor the factories are producing at full capacity. There is a bottle neck in the consumption of the products. We know there are people in the United States who, year in and year out, never taste wheat flour products, children everywhere who would be happier with better woolen clothes, and yet Montana farmers are not producing to their full capacity. As long as we discourage ingenuity and individualism from expression in greater production, we are retarding progress. Consumption must be geared to capacity production.

From the abundance in America there is enough to spend for what we need. Wasting is the crime, not spending. Out of the waste we could provide many necessities.

NEW FRONTIERS IN AMERICA

America is the greatest market in the world, for the standard of living will continue to increase progressively. This market should be saturated with American goods before we send our military establishments to foreign soil to hold or increase foreign markets. The new frontiers in America are greater today than ever before. The possibilities of modern science and enterprise being applied to their development make them promising and dramatic.

All the good in our social legislation must be preserved, but it must not be held sacred when it can be improved. Being cognizant of these problems I will be driven to give my best efforts to their solution.

These are hard problems. They cannot be solved by a few people. They require the help of all. Women must make their contribution, whether it be big or little. No one can offer a perfect solution, but we must express our willingness to cooperate.

Coming again to the war situation we must bear in mind that governments make war. The people can prevent war.

By voting for me, Jeannette Rankin, you can express your opposition to sending your son to foreign lands to fight in a foreign war, and by voting for me you will also express your determination to prepare to the absolute limit to defend this country.

KEEP OUR MEN OUT OF FOREIGN WARS

And to defend this country means to defend the men, women, and children of the United States. If this Nation were attacked your boy would be the first to go and you, his father, his mother, and his sister, would be ready to go with him. There is no sacrifice that Americans will not and should not make to defend America.

When you vote for Congressman, vote with a determination to protect your sons from having to go to a foreign land to face armored tanks and all of the vicious, destructive implements of war, against which they have little if any chance.

Let your vote express your love and loyalty to those who mean most to you by casting that vote to keep them at home.

The issue has never been more vital and more real. So in closing let me say that if you do not want your boys to go to Europe to fight, if you want them kept at home and supplied with the most modern military equipment that science and ingenuity can produce to defend the greatest, most liberty-loving country on the face of the earth, then I ask you to vote for me and you can depend upon it that in my efforts I will not fail you. Thank you.

Attitude of Governor Hoey of North Carolina Toward the Communist Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

SPEECH BY GOVERNOR HOEY

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article dealing with Governor Hoey's attitude toward the Communist Party in America.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOEY WOULD HAVE COMMUNIST PARTY OUTLAWED IN AMERICA—GOVERNOR TELLS FOOD DEALERS COLLEGES SHOULD DISCHARGE COMMUNISTS

RALEIGH, August 5.—Governor Hoey asserted tonight that Congress should outlaw the Communist Party in the United States, and declared that communism should not be tolerated in educational institutions. Speaking at a banquet of the North Carolina Food Dealers Association, the Governor said that communism, "no matter where, should be kicked out."

He made no direct reference to the University of North Carolina, which was charged by some of its trustees recently with encouraging communism and "wildcat freedom," but he spoke out plainly about subversive elements in educational institutions in general.

"If we find there's a Communist in an educational institution, he ought to be given the rap," said the Governor. "If we find that there's a Communist in an office of public trust, he ought to be kicked out."

MERCHANTS CHEER

Hoey was cheered loudly as he blasted at the Communist, and told the merchants that he believed Congress also should outlaw all German bunds in America and "every secret organization that seeks to overthrow our Government."

Governor Hoey said that North Carolinians were "going to see to it that sabotage, espionage, and 'fifth columnists' do not gain headway here." He added that he believed it would be difficult to find in all North Carolina "a single disloyal person who wished to stab his country in the back."

The Habana Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statement by Secretary Hull regarding the Habana conference.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRAGIC LESSON

The strong belief of the representatives of the 21 American nations at the recent Habana meeting was that the military and other sinister activities on the part of some nations in other large areas of the world present real possibilities of danger to the American republics.

It was universally recognized that a threat to any important part of the Americas means a threat to each and all of the American nations. It was, therefore, agreed that full and adequate preparations for continental defense could not be taken too soon if the threatened danger from abroad was to be checked and terminated. It was also the unanimous view at Habana that the prompt strengthening of unity and solidarity for the purpose of continental defense and for its implementation by concrete programs supported by the 21 nations was indispensable to the safety, security, peace, and welfare of this hemisphere.

There was general agreement that if the peaceful nations of Europe had thus promptly organized themselves for self-defense on the most effective cooperative basis, the chances are that their situation and that of Europe would be vastly different today. Instead, many of those countries complacently relied upon utterances of peaceful purpose and upon their own neutrality to safeguard them against the mighty forces of invasion, conquest, and destruction. Some of them have been overrun and destroyed by the ruthless invader. Their fate should be a tragic lesson to us.

The vast forces of lawlessness, conquest, and destruction are still moving across the earth like a savage and dangerous animal at large. By their very nature, those forces will not stop unless and until they recognize that there exists unbreakable resistance.

At Habana we forged new instrumentalities of continental defense. These will be of vast importance to our Nation and to every American nation. But there are other and immense tasks still before us.

I would greatly prefer to say that we are safe in this country and in this hemisphere from outside danger. But I am firmly convinced that what is taking place today in many areas of the earth is a relentless attempt to transform the civilized world as we have known it into a world in which lawlessness, violence, and force will reign supreme, as they did a thousand years ago. The people of this country cannot recognize too soon this fact and its overwhelming significance for our national safety and for the maintenance of our national institutions.

The one and only sure way for our Nation to avoid being drawn into serious trouble or actual war by the wild and destructive forces now abroad elsewhere in the world and to command respect for its rights and interests abroad is for our people to become thoroughly conscious of the possibilities of danger, to make up their minds that we must continue to arm, and to arm to such an extent that the forces of conquest and ruin will not dare make an attack on us or on any part of this hemisphere. To this end, each citizen must be ready and willing for real sacrifice of time and of substance and for hard personal service. In the face of terrific problems and conditions, and until the present serious threats and dangers have disappeared, we cannot pursue complacently the course of our customary normal life.

I feel constrained thus to offer my views in the light of what is already a dangerously widespread movement for world conquest and for the destruction of most of the worth-while things which civilization has given the human race.

Why France Fell

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CARROLL COUNTY INDEPENDENT, CENTER OSSIPEE, N. H.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most interesting editorial on a most important subject, entitled "Why France Fell," published in the Carroll County Independent, of Center Ossipee, N. H., July 12, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Carroll County Independent, Center Ossipee, N. H., of July 12, 1940]

WHY FRANCE FELL

As feature articles by competent observers continue to be published regarding the defeat of the French Nation, one is able to slowly secure a fairly complete picture of what happened. The French high command was hide-bound by tradition and failed to develop a modern defense for the ultramodern German offense. They most certainly knew the techniques being used by the Germans but simply sat back in smug complacency and did nothing. In the French Cabinet and among civilian administrative officials, love of self, love of pocketbook, cynicism, and easy living made complete surrender the logical way out. Among the great French middle class, corrupt newspapers, corrupt politics, and soft living had sapped the vitality of the nation. Socialist governments and Socialist propaganda had crippled the airplane industry so that French production of military machines was more or less of a joke.

Gone was the spirit of Verdun of the first World War. The grim cry of "On ne passe pas"—"They shall not pass"—was neither heard nor much of any attempt made to live up to it. The Germans went through Verdun like a hot knife through butter.

It is unfair and impossible to indict a whole nation on the strength of a few newspaper articles, no matter how accurate those articles may be, but at the same time it is possible to say with considerable assurance that corrupt politics, corrupt newspapers, too much soft living, and too much love of self and too little love of country brought about the downfall of France.

If the United States ever goes the way France has just gone, it will go down to defeat not because of the power of the invader, but because cynicism and selfishness have sapped the vitality of the Nation and rotted the strong moral fiber that was once ours.

Shortly after the close of the first World War, an attitude of cynicism came over the country. It became unfashionable to credit anyone with any honest motive. The scandals of prohibition enforcement, the corruption of the bench and bar and law enforcement bodies in our great cities, the scandals that were connected with the Long administration in Louisiana, the lack of impartial application of Federal aid and assistance, all have fostered and enforced this attitude.

Forgotten are the great mass of unselfish, hard-working teachers, doctors, nurses, ministers, police officers, public servants, and officials that are America as it is and not as the cynics think that it is. Forgotten is the fact that the great majority of employers want to give a fair day's wage and that the great majority of employees want to give a fair day's work in return for that wage—a small minority of professional reformers, union officials, and heartless employers to the contrary.

In every national crisis we have had selfish, corrupt men in public and private life who have profited for themselves while other men were dying for their country. In every national crisis we have had politicians who played politics while the very safety of the Government was threatened. In every national crisis we have had ultraconservative bungling men in high command in the Army who thought more of their salary and professional standing than of the men who were dying in the mud because of their mistakes.

This was true in the Revolution. It was true in the War of 1812 and in the Mexican War. It was true in the Civil War and in the Spanish War. It was all too true in the first World War.

But in spite of all this, the great body of the American people have risen above the example set by a minority of their so-called leaders. Confident in the destiny of their Nation, they have poured out their blood and their money to keep the Nation whole and free and safe.

It is high time that we stopped thinking about the selfish, soulless men who have always sold out their fellow men in time of danger. It is time that we stopped thinking of them as being typical of our leadership and as typical of our Nation.

It is time that we remembered the men who gave their all in money and property in Revolutionary times that the armies might be fed. It is time for us to remember the sailors of 1812 who blew the enemy vessels out of the water. It is time to remember the history of one of the New Hampshire regiments in the Civil War, whose veterans said quietly but proudly after Lee surrendered, "We marched farther, and were in more engagements and lost more men in proportion to our numbers, than any other regiment in the whole Union Army," and it is well to remember the aching cold and the wracking sickness and the tearing wounds and the never-ending roads and the long dead that the statement really meant. It is time that we remembered the men who walked into machine-gun fire in the last war and who came home and did not tell about it, because it was too terrible to talk about.

It is high time that we stopped thinking about the selfish minority. It is time that we began to think about the men who have made this country great and free simply because they were willing to die for it, and while dying, take two or three of the enemy with them.

If we do not do this, we will be untrue to ourselves and we will have broken faith with our dead.

Defense Plans of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by William Philip Simms, entitled "Defense Plans of United States Questioned by Latins," published in the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, August 6, 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Washington Daily News of August 6, 1940]

DEFENSE PLANS OF UNITED STATES QUESTIONED BY LATINS

(By William Philip Simms)

Can Uncle Sam defend himself here at home and at the same time protect Alaska, Canada, Greenland, Bermuda, the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, likewise the Philippines and the open-door policy in the Far East?

Many South Americans are asking this question. Also many businessmen and others down there who were born in the States. They are beginning to wonder if perhaps Uncle Sam isn't including a lot of territory in his defense plans. And some of them, at least, are convinced that it might be wise to reconsider the problem raised by the Monroe Doctrine.

These point out that the whole international set-up is a vastly different thing from what it was in 1823 when Canning and Monroe brought forth the Monroe Doctrine. Then a powerful and going Britain was interested in maintaining the status quo of the western world. Then, too, the Latin American states were young and helpless

HAVE GROWN UP

Today several of these states have grown up. They resent any suggestion of protection at the hands of the United States.

I pointed out to an Argentine friend that this protection is tendered without any quid pro quo.

"Heck," he said, or words to that effect, "we never asked you for protection, free or otherwise. Moreover, it is seriously doubted that the United States ever could have protected us from any real threat of aggression or that it could do so now."

Observing my look of injured pride, he laughed and added:

"Don't take offense. I am just trying to be objective. Most North Americans usually take it for granted that South Americans ought to be, and hence are, unmitigatedly grateful for the Monroe Doctrine. And I'm afraid they aren't."

ARMY OFFICER SPEAKS

I put this up to a former American Army officer, now in South America, one who knows our southern neighbors as well as he does his own countrymen. Said he:

"I suspect your Argentine friend was correct on all counts. If England is invaded and her fleet taken over, even in part, by the Nazis, we will not be in a position to defend our own coasts, the Caribbean, and Panama areas, and successfully police the Straits of Magellan, the Bering Sea, and the western Pacific in the bargain.

"I think the time has come for us to reexamine the Monroe Doctrine in the light of our new problems of national defense. Mind you, that is what the Monroe Doctrine has been all along—a matter of what was best for us from the point of view of national defense. So, once it becomes a liability instead of an asset, the doctrine in no wise binds us, morally or otherwise, to defend Cape Horn or Patagonia against this or that aggressor.

SHOULD DRAW LINE

"We should draw a line somewhere across South America—a line which would take in whatever may be necessary to the defense of the Caribbean, Panama, and their approaches—and let the world know that we would defend that area with everything we have against any and all comers and at whatever cost.

"The way things are now, we are called on to defend too much territory. We should bunch our shots. From Alaska to Chile by way of Hawaii is 10,000 miles. From Greenland to Tierra del Fuego is another 8,000 miles. From Panama to Manila it is 9,500 miles. Yet from French and British West Africa—which the Nazis will surely take over if they lick England—it is barely 1,600 miles to one of the richest and most exposed parts of Brazil. As for the Philippines, they are in Japan's back yard."

Not everybody is in agreement with the American Army officer. An Englishman in business in Buenos Aires declared:

"The suggested deadline across South America would be just another something for the United States to defend. To limit the Monroe Doctrine in that manner would amount to an open invitation to Germany, Japan, and other aggressor powers to come and take whatever was south of the line. And once established, they would advance northward at the first opportunity toward Panama and the United States.

MUST NOT GET FOOTHOLD

"Once you let the aggressor powers gain a foothold in this hemisphere, your only salvation would be to outarm them, year after year. You would transplant in the Americas precisely the same situation as existed in Europe prior to September of last year—an armed truce which the aggressor powers would break the moment they believed themselves sufficiently strong.

"The only way to avoid such a situation is never to allow the aggressor powers to land anywhere in the New World."

Throughout the countries below the Caribbean I listened to this significant debate. Before long we are more than likely to be hearing it in the United States. For we've got to make up our minds. It is vitally important to our future as a free country.

ARTICLE BY HON. HENRY A. WALLACE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Hon. Henry A.

Wallace entitled "Judaism and Americanism," which appeared in the Menorah Journal for July–September 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDAISM AND AMERICANISM

(By Henry A. Wallace)

The Christians of this land share with the Jews the tradition of the prophets. This tradition, it seems to me, is fundamental to American democracy, both political and economic. The prophets were either talking on behalf of people suffering injustice or they were warning of trouble ahead. They felt so passionately the trend of events that they discerned the outline of events that would be, should be, or could be brought to pass. Therefore they said, "Thus saith the Lord."

As distinguished from the kings and the priests, most of the prophets were progressive in religious, political, and economic matters. They looked to the future rather than the past. One of the magnificent things about the Bible is that it preserves so faithfully the insurgent spirit of the prophets. It is the spirit of a new world—a growing world. All religions in their steadfast worship of the past tend to be overconservative. The Jewish and Christian religions, therefore, in carefully preserving the message of the prophets, have preserved the growth spirit which is vital to the health of all religion.

The job of the prophets was to pour new wine into the priests' old bottles; and if the old bottles broke, to make new bottles. The clash of priest and prophet is most vividly emphasized in the seventh chapter of Amos, which, translated into sidewalk English, says: "Amaziah the priest got sore at Amos and told him to shut up and go home. Amaziah didn't want any Bolsheviks like Amos around his set-up. Swiftly Amos replied—I hesitate to put his reply into modern English; it is fairly plain as it stands:

"Therefore thus saith the Lord: Thy wife shall be a harlot in the city, and thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword and thy land shall be divided by line; and thou shalt die in a polluted land; and Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land."

Amos preached economic justice, and the people in the court and temple could not take it.

They did not like it when he said:

"Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying: When will the new moon be gone that we may sell corn, and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit? That we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes; yea and sell the refuse of the wheat. * * * Shall not the land tremble for this?"

No wonder the priest Amaziah, the guardian of the status quo, complained to King Jeroboam concerning Amos, saying, "The land is not able to bear all his words."

Amaziah thought Amos was a kept prophet and suggested that he go home to Judah to eat his bread. This hint that he was on the pay roll of the priestly hierarchy of Judah angered Amos and he blasted forth a terrific malediction beginning, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdman * * * and the Lord took me as I followed the flocks and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel."

I speak of the battle of Amos because it typifies the struggle which went on for centuries between the Jewish shepherd people who lived in the hills and the Canaanites who lived in the cities. As the Jews over the centuries gradually migrated to the cities, they took on city habits. But at first they were profoundly shocked at the commercial morality of the cities. Neither the customs of the bank nor the market place pleased them. They though such customs were the devices of Baal, the god of the Amorites.

Probably the first instance in all recorded history of debt-ridden farmers rising in revolt is given in the twenty-second chapter of First Samuel. David, the young shepherd fleeing from Saul, was hiding in the cave of Adullam when, according to the Bible, "Everyone that was in distress, and everyone that was in debt, and everyone that was discontented, gathered themselves under him; and he became a captain over them; and there were with him about 400 men." David, the mighty King of Judah, was not merely the slayer of Goliath but, perhaps even more important, the leader of a social revolution.

Living for several generations under kings, the Jews became familiar with the problems of city civilization and especially with taxes and interest. The heavy taxes necessitated by King Solomon's extensive public-works program resulted in his son Rehoboam losing half his kingdom because he did not know how to handle the tax-burdened people diplomatically. When the time of the captivity approached, the prophet Ezekiel in the name of the Lord took a much harsher attitude toward usury than those who had gone before him, proclaiming that those who took usury should surely die. Ezekiel saw such an unbalanced economic, social, political, and international situation that he could predict nothing but destruction. His prophecy was fulfilled.

From the Jews in captivity in Persia came Nehemiah, a wealthy man, who was given the job of rebuilding Jerusalem and settling the country round about. Nehemiah tells the story of the mortgaged Jews in the recently resettled city of Jerusalem crying out against their brethren, the more well-to-do Jews.

"And there was a great cry of the people and of their wives against their brethren the Jews. * * * We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses that we might buy corn because of the dearth. There were also that said: We have borrowed money for the king's tribute and that upon our lands and vineyards, yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children; and lo, we bring into bondage our sons and daughters to be servants and some of our daughters are brought under bondage already: neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards. * * * I said: It is not good that ye do; ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies? I likewise, and my brethren and my servants, might exact of them money and corn: I pray you, let us leave off this usury. Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their land, their vineyards, their olive yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them. Then said they: We will restore them and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them that they should do according to this promise."

Throughout the Old Testament it is apparent that the justice of Jehovah, as distinguished from the justice of the Baals of the Canaanites, was justice of a kind easily understood by poor and debt-ridden farmers. No doubt in ancient Palestine—even as in the Philippines, in China, and in India today—the money lender exacted interest rates running up to 20, 30, and even 40 percent annually. Bad weather might cost a man his children or even his own liberty. The slightest misfortune caused debt to pyramid at an impossibly rapid rate. Productive capacity could not possibly keep pace with the growth of the usury load. Therefore, there was arranged the Sabbatical year and the year of jubilee. The proposed cure was not scientific, but the analysis of the trouble was profound.

There is an everlasting economic battle between those who manipulate money to put it out for hire and those who produce goods and have to borrow.

Probably the most bitter of all fates among the ancient Jews was to be sold for debt into slavery. Therefore, we find it provided in the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus that a relative might redeem such a man and that the manner of redemption was as follows: "And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubilee. And the price of his sale shall be according to the number of years, according to the time of a hired servant shall it be with him * * *. And if there remain but few years until the year of jubilee, then he shall count with him and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption * * *. And if he be not redeemed in these years, then shall he go out in the year of jubilee, both he and his children with him."

The Jews were in captivity in Egypt and were rescued. The Jews were in captivity in Babylon and were rescued. Again and again Jews have been redeemed from slavery by relatives. Throughout the history of the Jews is the story of redemption.

Originally the idea of the justice of Jehovah Lord God was a very narrow one. The ancient Hebrews undoubtedly looked on Jehovah as their own particular tribal God. Many of them undoubtedly believed that there were other tribal gods which were almost as strong as their God. They hoped and believed their God was superior, although at times their faith wavered. Struggling with more and more complicated problems of life, the Jews finally came to look on Jehovah as God of all the world, the Redeemer of all mankind.

II

These are times of great trouble for Jew and Christian alike. Both Christians and Jews in times of such trouble gird up their spiritual loins, and in so doing many of them find their greatest strength in the Bible. When it seems as though all the forces of hell have been unchained we reach out toward the God of our fathers and find in the Old Testament the following:

"And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I have commanded thee this day shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thine house, and on thy gates."

On the foundation of this commandment, emphasized again and again, was placed the equally emphasized commandment, "Thou shalt love they neighbor as thyself," which Jesus preached afresh.

The God of the Jews and of the Christians is a just God. A God of battles, yes. But not a God of violence, fraud, deceit, and hideous injustice. Such gods stalking out of the forests of an ancient paganism have been turned loose in these later days. They will perish as such gods have always perished. The struggle will be titanic, and before we triumph it will be necessary to summon every possible source of spiritual strength to give the necessary driving power to our material strength.

There is very little in common between the Prussian militarist spirit and the traditions of the Jews and Christians. Very few of us, I am sure, have anything against the Germans in the United States. The ancestors of most of them came to the United States to flee the imperial Prussian militarist spirit. This spirit, which is a veritable antichrist, exalts that which America abhors. Whether we be Jews or Christians, we in the United States hate the thought of the state marching in as an overmastering overlord. Most devotedly do we believe in the sacredness of the individual. We believe the state lives for the individual and not the individual for the state. Therefore, we believe in freedom of religion and freedom of expression. We believe the State has no powers except those which have been granted by the people. The imperialist Prussians, on the other hand, believe that individuals have no power except insofar as it has been granted by the state.

The spirit of democracy is in complete accord with the spirit of the Jewish and Christian faiths. Democracy, as I see it, has in it the following seven elements:

1. Action based on the will of the majority after the people have had opportunity to inform themselves as to the real facts.
2. Freedom of speech, press, art, science, and religion.
3. Stability, order, and the avoidance of violence, bloodshed, and anarchy.
4. Promotion of a stable but ascending general welfare by increasing the productivity of the people and distributing the income as evenly as possible without destroying incentives.
5. Belief in the sacredness of the individual and in the unlimited possibilities of both man and nature, which can be made manifest if those who are gifted in science, art, and religion approach the unknown reverentially and not under the compulsion of producing immediate results for the glorification of one man, one group, one race, or one nation.
6. Joyous faith in a progressive future based on the intelligent and constructive efforts of all the people to serve the general welfare.
7. Tolerance and humor in recognizing the right of all men to be different.

When democracy is threatened from time to time by a huge psychic entity like that of the imperial Prussian militarist spirit, it may be necessary to employ many of the weapons which we so heartily detest. Many individual rights may have to be sacrificed for a time to the democratic state in order to avoid the worse fate of being sacrificed to the imperialist state. Just because we love peace and democracy we must be realistic—realistic not merely in the sense of being hard-boiled believers in military preparedness, but realistic in the sense of understanding the ultimate forces which make for peace, justice, and democracy.

In the long run the real peril to democracy is within our own Nation, within our own group, within our own hearts. It is quite possible that 10 or 20 years hence the totalitarian states as we know them today will be completely demolished. It is equally possible that genuine democracy will be even more threatened then than it is today. Though we in the United States have attained a fair measure of political democracy, we have done very little in perfecting a genuine economic democracy. In this effort the Scandinavian countries, by their skillful blending of cooperatives, government ownership, corporate business, government spending, and government budgeting, had outstripped us. Partly this was because they were small. Partly it was because of the uniformly high standard of education and the similarity of training of all the people.

An economic democracy must develop a powerful concept of the general welfare. Even as the ancient Hebrews day after day, morning, noon, and night, taught their children to love God with heart and soul and might, so must we continually teach our children not only to love God in that manner but to realize that the manifestation of our love for God here on earth is the service of the general welfare. This is quite a different thing from the Prussian concept of the service of the State, because it is something imposed from the heart within rather than by command from above. Democracy is not anarchy. Democracy involves education and the devotion to similar ideals. Genuine economic democracy cannot be a hollow thing, a mere lip service. It must work continually at the problem of the increased production of wealth and a more equitable distribution of that increased production.

III

In recent years many efforts have been made to give bodily form to the spiritual message of the prophets. The cooperative movement which flowered so marvelously in Scandinavia, Switzerland, and Holland is such an effort. So also is the Zionist resettlement in Palestine. And so, I believe, are many of our own New Deal efforts, such as farm security, self-subsistence homesteads, and so on. Everywhere people are longing to lead the simple, cooperative life of neighborly fair dealing. In China, in Latin America, in fact, in nearly all areas not afflicted by totalitarian blight, experiments are being tried which would gladden the hearts of the prophets of old.

The democracy of the future will have its roots not only in the best of the sacred literature of the past but also in science. The science of genetics, for example, will, I am sure, overthrow Germanic racism and serve as one base for an enduring democracy. The geneticist of the future will, in my opinion, join the Lord in appreciating the possibilities of all the peoples of the earth. On the average, the children of the poor have just about the same potentialities as the children of the rich. In the same degree of latitude the people of one race have just about the same inborn ability as the people of another race. The differences in tradition, in religion, in education, and in food are tremendous. The group differences in inborn characteristics are far less.

It is true that all men are not born equal, but if a thousand children of one economic group are given the same training and care as a thousand children of another economic group the results will not be greatly different. There will be feeble-minded in both groups and geniuses in both groups. And so I say that the ancient Jewish institution of the jubilee, which every 50 years freed the oppressed and enslaved, was soundly conceived from both the genetic and democratic point of view.

In examining history we find that it is dangerous not to bring about economic democracy, and it is almost as dangerous to do so. Since revolutionaries almost always claim too much, the results are disappointing. Sometimes they are disastrous. For example, according to Josephus, the Jewish nation in the year 70 C. E. came to an end because the poorer Jews felt they could right their economic wrongs by storming the archives and burning their mortgages. Anarchy resulted, and the Romans dispersed the Jewish nation. We have seen that discontented debtors had much to do with creating the kingdom of David, as well as with ending the Jewish nation. In one case a constructive result was obtained, but in the other anarchy and destruction.

Neither in the Palestine of the judges, nor of the kings, nor of the exile, nor of the post exile were conditions like those of today. The Jews of Jesus' time had no responsibility for governing their own nation. It is not surprising, therefore, that we should find so little in the Gospels on the subject of permeating the economic and political order with a sense of responsibility on behalf of the whole people. Ground under the heel of an alien race, the Jews of the time of Caesar Augustus could care for the ill-clad, ill-housed, and ill-nourished only on a very simple local basis. It would have been completely impractical to have thought about the problem except on a local basis. In brief, the problem of the general welfare was a local problem in Jesus' day. Today it is much more than a local problem. The national and world problem cannot possibly be overlooked. Most of the readily quotable verses of the New Testament, if we follow sound exegesis, apply most forcibly to local problems. Those religious people who steep themselves completely in New Testament texts without regard to their inner meaning would be much happier, therefore, if all national and international problems could be returned to their local form.

In the time of the prophets the Jews had a much greater responsibility in international affairs than in the time of Jesus. We therefore find in the prophets much more attention given to international problems. Jeremiah, as he looked into the heart of nations, was moved to prophesy:

"Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground."

Fundamentally, and in the long run, our fight is not against nazism or communism or any of the other dread social psychoses. These are merely manifestations of something evil which to an extent we have also among ourselves in the United States. As St. Paul puts it, "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

It has always seemed to me that the final triumph of peace, democracy, and justice was never more beautifully portrayed than by the prophet Micah in the following words:

"But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and the people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come and say: Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many people and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid, for the mouth of the Lord of Hosts hath spoken it. For all people will walk everyone in the name of his god and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever and ever. In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out and her that I have afflicted."

Both the Old and the New Testaments are completely interwoven with our democracy. The passage from Micah which I have just quoted envisions a land populated by small men operating their own farms, men free to worship God in their own way. Compassion is had upon the poor and the afflicted. Perhaps Micah was overcome by his vision. Perhaps he did not see accurately. Possibly he was impractical. And yet that vision will be an inspiration to a hundred generations yet unborn. If the fire of that vision is kept alight, the day will come when the economists and state builders will give it bodily form. Then we shall have a practical economic democracy fitted to serve the Lord, because every individual citizen will have written in his heart the joy and understanding of the general welfare.

The Jewish tradition, the Christian tradition, the democratic tradition, and the American tradition are all one. It is right, of course, that both Jews and Christians should take pride in their respective heritages. But they should not allow this pride to shut themselves off one from another. The general welfare of American democracy calls us to big things. On us may depend the fulfillment of many a Biblical prophecy in the trying years ahead.

To preserve our democracy we must realize that the dictators have definite designs on this hemisphere. Pan-America must stand on guard against both the desperate and the ruthless. We must stand for peace in this hemisphere, but to make sure of that peace we must be fully prepared. The traditions of the past can be made into the fruitful realities of the future in terms of a broad and alert Americanism. Our motto must be: "Peace Through Preparedness."

Report of the Committee on Interstate Trade Barriers and Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

COMPILED BY HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS, OF WISCONSIN, HON. SAM C. MASSINGALE, OF OKLAHOMA, AND HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS, OF ARKANSAS

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in inserting in the record the report and recommendations of the Committee on Interstate Trade Barriers and Unemployment, which has the unanimous approval of the entire unemployment committee and which was compiled by a subcommittee composed of Hon. Joshua L. Johns, Member of Congress from Wisconsin, Hon. Sam C. Massingale, Member of Congress from Oklahoma, and myself:

Once the largest free-trade area in the world—thanks to the experience of the Colonies during the federation—the United States has today disintegrated into a "Balkanized" mesh of trade barriers.

"Perhaps the greatest menace to the internal economy of the United States today," says State Government in its editorial for March 1939, "is the growth of * * * trade barriers among the States. * * * Without exception they are the symptoms of an economic disease, which if not checked will result in the paralysis of internal trade in the United States. Already, it is evident that this new complication is sapping the strength of our domestic economy at a time when all its energies are necessary if its convalescence is to result in complete recovery."

For the most part our man-made interstate barriers take the following form:

1. Those affirmatively created by State laws and regulations.
2. Those affirmatively created by Federal laws and regulations.
3. Those created by monopolistic control in commerce and industry.

Their results are reflected immediately in lower wages for labor, lower prices for agricultural commodities and raw materials, reduced profits; decreased purchasing power and in decreased employment. And for it all, says State Government (Ib), "the general consuming public pays the bill."

The period between 1782 and 1787 is classed by most historians as the most critical period in American history, and many of the most serious problems grew out of trade barriers at that time between the Colonies. This caused much hard feeling between the Colonies, and as a result when the Constitution was written clause 2 of section 10 of article I was placed in the Constitution so as to prevent a reoccurrence of trouble experienced by the Colonies. The provision is as follows:

"No State without the consent of Congress, may lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress."

This clause of the Constitution was passed upon in an early case in 1827, Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat. U. S. 419, 436, 442, 444). In that case a State license fee was imposed upon an importer selling imported goods in the original bales or packages. The Court held it repugnant to the import and commerce clauses of the Constitution of the United States.

Chief Justice Marshall in delivering the opinion of the Court at page 444, said:

"All must perceive that a tax on the sale of an article, imported only for sale is a tax on the article itself; * * * the tax on the occupation of an importer is * * * tax on importation. It must add to the price of the article, and be paid by the consumer, or by the importer himself, in like manner as a direct duty on the article itself would be made. This the State has not a right to do, because it is prohibited by the Constitution."

In the case of Anglo-Chilean Corp. v. Alabama, decided in October 1932, and cited in United States Reports, volume 288, at page 226, the Court, citing the case of Millents v. Buren (282 U. S. 216 at p. 228), said: "When the Constitution prohibits States from laying duties on imports, the prohibition not only extends to a tax upon the act of importing, but also to one upon the occupation of the importer or upon the articles imported. A tax on the sale of an article, imported only for sale, is a tax on the article itself," citing Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat. 419, 444), Almy v. California (24 How. 169), Fairbank v. United States (181 U. S. 283), Lilliger v. Kentucky (213 U. S. 200), United States v. Braslef (237 U. S. 1), Thomas & Nersey Ins. Co. v. United States (237 U. S. 19), Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania (245 U. S. 292, 295), Sonneborn Bros. v. Curetare (262 U. S. 506, 509).

The constitutional protection extends to corporations as well as to individuals. Crutcher v. Kentucky (141 U. S. 47, 57), International Text Book Co. v. Pigg (217 U. S. 91, 108). See also Leaux Reundy Co. v. Cope (235 U. S. 197), Looney v. Crane Co. (245 U. S. 178, 188), Alpha Cement Co. v. Massachusetts (268 U. S. 203), Sprout v. South Bend (277 U. S. 163, 170–171), East Ohio Gusto v. Tax Commission (283 U. S. 465, 470).

(See also Hale, Chairman, et al. v. Brinko Trading Co., Inc., et al., decided at October 1939 term of Supreme Court of the United States and reported in volume 306 U. S. 2, 188 to 397. Also cited in official reports of the Supreme Court, August 3, 1939.)

Just one example of trade barriers of the Colonies in 1787 will illustrate in a very simple manner what the States are doing today and what the framers of the Constitution thought they were going to prevent when the Constitution was written.

The city of New York, with a population of 30,000 people, had been supplied with firewood from Connecticut, and butter, cheese, and chickens from New Jersey. New York City, then as now, wanted all this money at home but the question was how to get it. A trade barrier was finally decided upon and entrance fees were charged for every sloop that came down through Hell Gate from Connecticut, and for every boat rowed from across Paulus Hook to Cortlandt Street.

Of course, Connecticut and New Jersey Yankee farmers did not take kindly to this. The New Jersey Legislature made up its mind, just as legislatures do these days, to retaliate. But where and how? They finally discovered that New York had bought a small patch of ground on Sandy Hook for a lighthouse. The legislature promptly laid a tax on it of $1,800 a year. Connecticut agreed to not do any business with New York, and businessmen agreed unanimously upon a penalty of $250 for the first offense, and this ban was to continue for a period of 12 months. Historians say if it had not been for the good work done by the Federal Convention, it would not have been 5 years until there would have been civil war among the Colonies themselves. To these commercial disputes were added territory disputes. Today we are only trying to repeat history.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION

Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution provides that: "The Congress shall have power: To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States * * *." This power is specifically limited by the tenth amendment which provides that: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Chief Justice Marshall said of this provision in 1824, in his celebrated opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, "If there was any one object riding over every other in the adoption of the Constitution, it was to keep commercial intercourse among the States free from all individuous and partial restraints." And why not? Had not the "several States" tried individual control of trade and commerce under the federation—and with disastrous results?

However, as we shall point out later, the evasions of the constitutional provisions by the States, by the Federal Government itself, and by American business and industry without interference from either the State or National Government—and all with the approval of the Supreme Court of the United States—have become so numerous, so effective, and so far-reaching that free trade, so vital to the American standard of life, bids fair to perish.

SPECIFIC BARRIERS, THEIR CAUSES AND EFFECTS

Of what are these monstrous and unscalable walls around States and sections of our country composed?

I

Here are some of these created by State laws and regulations:

1. The use tax now levied by many States on goods imported—and with the approval of the Supreme Court. "The tax," said Justice Cardozo, "is not upon the operations of interstate commerce but upon the privilege of use after commerce is at an end." Typical of these is the statute of the State of Washington levying a tax on the "machinery, materials, and supplies, such as locomotives, cars, conveyors, pumps, and trestle steel * * * bought at retail in other States." The motives behind the use tax are chiefly (1) to raise revenue in these depression years, (2) to encourage home industries, and (3) to retaliate for some barrier raised by the importing State. The result is, inevitably, higher living costs, stifled production, and increased unemployment.

Take Wisconsin's experience with the oleomargarine tax. In 1935 Wisconsin was at peace with the South, and for that matter with the rest of the world. It is a great dairy State, and considerable oleomargarine was being shipped into the State, which for some purposes took the place of butter produced in the State. As a result a bill was introduced to tax oleomargarine sold in the State 6 cents per pound. The South did not object seriously to this and business proceeded as usual and the tax was paid. There is no question but what the members of the legislature meant well, but the results do not seem to justify the harsh action taken.

It was, however, a good political issue and in 1937 the tax was raised to 15 cents per pound. Well, it is needless to state what happened, but for the purpose of the record here, briefly this is what did happen: But few retailers paid the tax. It would be just like putting a tax on gasoline of 10 or 15 cents a gallon. People would think of some scheme to get rid of paying the tax, and you would not collect more in taxes than if it was 5 cents a gallon. This has been the history of the gasoline tax. This was the history of the oleomargarine tax in Wisconsin. But very few paid it. As a result in a very short time small merchants all over the State were owing the State thousands of dollars in taxes. Was it legal to collect it? That question has never been determined by the highest court of the land. Was it wise to sue to get it? No. First, it would cost as much to collect in small amounts as the amount you would get in the end. Secondly, politically to sue your constituents would not make them feel very kindly toward you. So the only thing left to do was to coax these small amounts out of the local merchants.

The actual loss to the South was not great. People bought oleomargarine just the same if they wanted it and the tax was not collected. The thought of the tax was much greater for the South to stand than the actual loss of business. As a result, however, the South began dairying in their own States and quit buying cheese and butter from Wisconsin. This was not as general as people have been led to believe, but it did follow to some extent. Industrialists have reported that contracts for goods were canceled by the South and jobbers refused to buy more goods because of this tax.

So that the committee may have excerpts from some of the decisions of the court of local resort we quote here from a few outstanding cases.

In an early case decided in 1860, the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Almy v. People of California (24 Howard, U. S. 169), decided that a stamp duty imposed upon bills of lading for gold or silver, transported from the State of California to any part or place outside the State, was a tax on exports and was unconstitutional. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the Court and cited the law laid down in the case of Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., U. S. 419), an early case covering a similar state of facts, to sustain the positions of the Court. In that case the State of Maryland, in order to raise revenue for State purposes, required all importers of certain foreign articles and commodities enumerated in the law, or other persons selling the same by wholesale, before they were authorized to sell, to take out a license, for which they were compelled to pay $50, and in case of refusal or neglect to do so, they forfeited the amount of the license tax, and were compelled to pay a fine of $100 upon conviction. The law in the case of Brown v. Maryland, heretofore referred to, was applied by the Court, and the statute held unconstitutional.

Coming down to a case decided 40 years later, Fairbank v. United States (181 U. S. 283), a similar situation to the Almy case, decided 40 years earlier, was presented to the Court. In this latter case a stamp tax was imposed the same as in the Almy case. The contention of the defendant was that the law was in conflict with article I, section 7, of the Constitution of the United States, providing: "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles imported from any State." Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the Court.

The language of the Court on page 291 is impressive. The Court said:

"The power to tax is the power to destroy. And that power can be exercised not only by a tax directly on articles exported but also and equally by a stamp duty on bills of lading evidencing the export. * * * The question of power is not to be determined by the amount of the burden attempted to be cast. The constitutional language is 'No tax or duty.'"

In the case of Alpha Cement Co. v. Mass. (268 U. S. 219), the Court said:

"It is settled that where by way of duties laid on transportation of subjects of interstate commerce, or the receipts derived therefrom, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on, a tax is levied by a State on interstate commerce, such taxation amounts to a regulation of such commerce and cannot be sustained."

2. Highway barriers, and these are many—

The truck war between the States broke into the open in 1934 when Kansas created her ports of entry, posted guards, checked all trucks in and out under stringent regulations. Oklahoma and Nebraska retaliated and the war was on. Huge signs at the Kansas ports read, "All trucks entering Kansas must register at port of entry, penalty $100 fine." Oklahoma went a step further, making her signs read, "All trucks and busses entering Oklahoma must register at port of entry, penalty $100 fine." Then Nebraska posted her signs which read, "Nebraska State law—all trucks, towed cars, cars for resale, must stop at port of entry for inspection and permit." Nineteen States have followed suit.

California and Arizona for years have stopped both trucks and private automobiles at their ports of entry and have pilfered through even the personal effects of their occupants, under the guise of searching for fruit or plant disease.

Fees and other taxes on incoming trucks are often designed to prohibit rather than to grant privileges. On a 5-ton truck they range from $30 to $400.

These are only a few of the many highway barriers. At no place in the Union can a truck cross from one side of a State line to the other without encountering many new and often harassing laws and regulations.

On this subject Attorney General Robert H. Jackson, addressing the National Conference on Interstate Trade Barriers, said:

"These discriminating regulations have caused what are described as border wars between States, some of which have smoldered for years with occasional violent outbreaks and some of which have flared up for a few days and then died out completely. Some of them have involved harassment, by State officials, of foreign motor carriers. The Secretary of Agriculture has reported 13 of these border wars in which the powers of the States were used either to discriminate against foreign motor carriers or in retaliation for such discrimination, with serious economic loss. Under the so-called port of entry legislation, some States have set up checking stations where incoming, and in some cases outgoing, traffic is halted in order to check up as to equipment, inspections, and taxes. Such a system is more than faintly reminiscent of the intolerable halting and examination which one encounters at every border of a State or municipality in Europe, and which has done so much to disintegrate European economy and bedevil European good will."

Twenty-six of the States have provided a license fee or some penalty at the border or port of entry of the State for trucks entering the State.

3. Other tax and regulation barriers:

The "use" tax is now levied by many States on goods imported; 16 of the 48 States have such a general "use" tax. These States are Alabama Arkansas, California, Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

The oleomargarine tax is imposed by 30 of the 48 States: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, and Wyoming have a tax of 10 cents per pound; Washington and Wisconsin, 15 cents per pound; Louisiana, 12 cents per pound; Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, and West Virginia have no tax on oleomargarine. A few States tax only the manufacture of this article.

Forty-one of the States have enacted general preference laws, giving to residents of the States some preference over others that might come in from some other States to do the same kind of work. Thirty of the States give a preference to State products. Twenty-four of the States give a preference to the State on all public printing.

Ten States have passed retaliatory liquor laws. These States are Alabama, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island.

Thirty-one States provide for differential fees (restrictions on imports and nonresidents).

Thirty of the States have certain restrictions upon the shipment of livestock from other States into their own, some reasonable, while others are not so reasonable.

Every State in the Union except North Carolina requires licensing and inspection of nursery stock.

All of the States have laws giving them power to quarantine and destroy nursery stock.

Registration of salesmen of nursery stock and dealers of such is required in 26 States.

State-enacted trade barriers have been created under four types of powers:

1. The power of taxation.
2. The State's police power in the protection of health, which includes the power to quarantine and to impose embargoes.
3. The general regulatory powers in the interest of public safety and morals.
4. The sovereign proprietary powers in regard to conservation of natural resources and ownership of public works and property.

II

Below we list some of the interstate trade barriers created by Federal laws and regulations:

1. First, there is the almost prohibitive Federal oleomargarine tax, favoring other sections but detrimental to the cotton-producing States.

2. The monumental trade barrier, however, in all the Nation, and one for which the Federal Government must accept full responsibility, is the one created by our freight-rate structure.

House Document 264, Seventy-fifth Congress, first session, compiled by J. Halden Alldredge, now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and its supplement, House Document 271, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, present a graphic story of freight-rate discriminations in America that has neither been denied nor justified. More by accident than design the country has become divided into five rate zones:

1. Zone 1, otherwise known as the eastern or official zone, comprises roughly that territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio.

2. Zone 2, the southern zone, is the territory east of the Mississippi and south of the Ohio.

3. Zone 3, the western trunk-line zone, embraces roughly the territory west of the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains and north of Oklahoma and Arkansas.

4. Zone 4, the southwestern zone, embraces Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Louisiana.

5. Zone 5, the mountain Pacific zone, is composed of the Rocky Mountain States and those west.

The rates south of the Ohio River and in the southern zone are 40 percent higher than north of the river.

In the western trunk-line zone they are 47 percent higher than in the eastern or official zone.

In the southwestern zone they are 75 percent higher than in the eastern zone.

In the mountain Pacific zone they are 71 percent higher than in the eastern zone.

We quote here three short paragraphs from the first document cited:

"It is the task of a transportation system to carry all commodities from points of production to consuming centers throughout the continent and to seaports for export. The more freely and cheaply they are carried, the higher the standard of living that can be attained.

"On the other hand, the maintenance of a high standard of living requires the wise use of natural resources; it necessitates reasonable economic security of a stable nature for the people in each region through proper diversification of activities. Millions of people, as previously indicated, are distributed over the country irrespective of the location of natural resources, and it would require generations for all of them to move to centers of mass-production industry and specialized agriculture, assuming it possible to persuade such millions to migrate or that it would be wise to do so even if it were possible. There are also established regions of specialized one-crop agriculture whose people must face readjustments to restore and protect their land and to diversify their sources of livelihood.

"One of the basic principles of rate making for transportation purposes, therefore, should be the prevention of rate barriers against regional or territorial development. Discriminatory or preferential rates unduly favoring some regions or territories as against others will surely operate to lower the future living standards of the American people by interfering with economic readjustments which are necessary for the national welfare."

We quote three further paragraphs from the supplemental document:

"Those who welded the indissoluble union of States found that the policy of creating a national commerce and protecting it from artificial barriers was the touchstone of the birth and growth of a nation. Allegiance to that fundamental policy today demands the adjustment of these regional freight-rate structures to remove discrimination which obstructs and distorts the flow of commerce and inhibits a natural economic development of the national resources.

"There are substantial reasons for achieving in this field of transportation a more rational economic pattern symmetrical with our time-honored predilection for a free national market.

"This regional rate discrimination penalizes substantially the present and potential movement of processed goods from the South and West, thereby discouraging the expansion and diversification of industry natural to those areas. A plea for equalization is more than a demand for regional justice. It is part of the struggle for national unity and economic stability."

There is ample evidence that many new industries would spring up almost simultaneously with a proper leveling off of freight rates. Aside from the tremendous impetus it would give to the South and West as regions, it would mean increased business and more employment for the railroads themselves.

The statements quoted from these documents have been sustained and confirmed by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. The Southern Governors' Conference filed with the Commission, early in 1939, Case No. 27746, thereafter known as State of Alabama et al. v. New York Central Railroad Company et al. It was decided on November 22, 1939, subsequently reopened in part, and a final decision handed down on March 5, 1940. The complainants charged that the railroad companies had set up discriminatory rates, almost doubling in some instances rates on manufactured articles originating in the South; in other words, that the rail rates as set up favor manufactured articles originating in the North and shipped southward and virtually preclude the shipment of manufactured articles originating in the South and shipped northward. The Interstate Commerce Commission found that these charges were true as regards some particular items included in the complaint and ordered reductions. The Commission fixed the rates in fact and said concerning them, quoting from the supplemental decision:

"That the rates on each commodity named in the following table from shipping points thereof in the South named in the appendix to destinations in the North are, and for the future will be, unduly prejudicial to said shipping points in the South, to the traffic therefrom, and to the shippers of such traffic, and unduly preferential of shipping points of the same commodity in the North, of the traffic therefrom, and of the shippers of such traffic, to the extent that they exceed, or may hereafter exceed, rates made the same percentage of the constructive first-class rates, determined as described in finding numbered (1), from said shipping points in the South to each destination in the North as the rates generally applicable on the same commodity from shipping points thereof in the North to such destination are of the first-class rates which were in effect on November 22, 1939, from and to those points."

It made a similar finding regarding certain other carload rates and ordered similar reduction.

It is observed that this case cost the South more than $100,000 and that, although it definitely paves the way for future reductions, it is manifestly unfair for the railroad companies to maintain such rates and for the parties injured thereby to be forced to spend such vast sums and carry the burden all the way in order to obtain the very equities which the Interstate Commerce Commission was set up to guarantee.

It is our conclusion that perhaps there is no other one cause that is today contributing more to the Nation's unemployment rolls than freight-rate discriminations.

III

Interstate trade barriers created by monopolistic control in commerce and industry, are, in our opinion, Mr. Chairman, in many instances most detrimental to the general welfare. They retard growth, diminish purchasing power, unduly increase prices and thus add vitally to the causes of unemployment. However, inasmuch as there is a special committee on monopoly we shall not further invade the field of its function here except to make a recommendation at the conclusion of this report.

The General Effect

President Roosevelt, writing Gov. Robert L. Cochran, president, the Council of State Governments, April 1, 1939, had this to say:

"MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I am immensely pleased to know that the Council of State Governments has called a National Conference on Interstate Trade Barriers, to meet in Chicago in April.

"Long known as the world's greatest single free-trade area, much of our country's commercial importance has been due to the mobility of trade throughout all the States. The last few years have seen the rise of virtual tariff barriers along State lines—damaging restrictions that have hindered the free flow of commerce among the several States. Business, agriculture, and labor have all suffered because of State and regional discriminatory measures adopted in the vain hope of protecting local products from the hazards of economic fluctuations.

"Interstate trade barriers have arisen in many instances from the same causes that resulted in mounting tariff walls between nations—accountable for so much of the world's unrest in recent years. The Federal Government is seeking to break down trade walls between this and the other nations of the world, and to remove the hampering restrictions that have been placed upon world commerce.

"Interstate trade barriers, if allowed to develop and multiply, will, however, constitute social and economic problems even more serious than international tariffs. It is a matter which demands the immediate attention of all the people of our country, and it is my earnest hope that the several States meeting in Chicago will take effective steps toward the removal of all barriers to the free flow of trade within our Nation.

"Very sincerely yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

But the cumulative result of all these barriers has been to destroy to a great extent free trade.

"'Thus,' says James Harvey Rogers in his article, From State Rights to State Autocracy, appearing in Harpers, November 1938, 'under the impetus of depression conditions and under the impact of lobbies supported by powerful pressure groups, State legislators today are busily destroying the chief economic basis of our national unity. Certainly it was the view of the framers of our National Constitution that interstate barriers to commerce were to be eliminated. However, the United States Supreme Court—supposedly the chief bulwark of our American system against all enemies—in its dogged attachment to words and to rationalization, rather than to substance, seems to be putting its stamp of approval on the wrecking movement. Thus, the chief influence in the unparalleled economic development of the United States and in its usual high prosperity above that in other enlightened countries is apparently on the way to being destroyed.'"

We are forced to the inevitable conclusion that these interstate trade barriers have contributed and are contributing materially to the Nation's public enemy No. 1—unemployment.

We realize that many of the barriers will have to be solved by cooperative effort between the States, and between the States and the Federal Government; however, we do believe there are certain definite steps which the Congress could and should take now.

We desire before submitting our recommendations to congratulate the Department of State, the Governors of the several States, the Council of State Governments, and the American Bar Association on the progress they have already made in eliminating interstate barriers through reciprocal agreements.

Our Recommendation

Therefore we, your committee appointed to study interstate trade barriers and their relation to unemployment recommend, Mr. Chairman:

1. That this Congress amend the Federal Aid for Highways Authorization Act to provide that after the next regular meeting of its legislature no State shall participate in said fund which shall not have adopted the uniform weights, measurements, and specifications for all motor vehicles which shall travel Federal-aid highways, as set up in said act, and until it shall have enacted uniform licenses as proposed therein, and until it shall have enacted the uniform highway code as provided therein. That this Congress provide such uniform law, but provide that a motor-vehicle license issued in one State shall be good in all States, subject only to regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission as applied to vehicles engaged in interstate commerce; and provide that such legislation shall take into account the debt obligation of the several States.

2. We recommend that this Congress enact legislation to provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized and directed to institute an investigation into the rates on manufactured products between points in one classification territory and points in another such territory, and into like rates within any of such territories maintained by common carriers, subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, for the purpose of determining whether said rates are unjust and unreasonable or unlawful in any other respect in and of themselves or in their relation to each other, and to enter such orders as may be appropriate for the removal of any unlawfulness which may be found to exist: Provided, That the Commission in its discretion, may confine its investigation to such manufactured products and the rates thereon as shippers thereof may specifically request be included in such investigation. And it is further recommended that section 3–1 of part I of Interstate Commerce Act be amended to include the words, "region," "district," and "territory."

3. That the Congress enact legislation providing that upon the request of Governors of two or more States the Department of State shall offer its services toward assisting such States in arriving at agreements, pacts, or understandings designed to prevent or eliminate threatened or existing barriers between the States.

4. Lastly, while the committee realizes that many monopolies existing in this country add substantially to the causes of unemployment, yet inasmuch as you have a special committee, Mr. Chairman, studying monopolies, this committee feels that it should, and it does hereby, adopt the report of your Committee on Monopolies and its recommendation as a part of this report and recommendation insofar as same may apply to interstate trade barriers.

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, last night a great American died, Maj. Gen. Smedley Darlington Butler. During the 3 years that I have been a Member of this body his picture was the only framed picture of a living man that has hung on the walls of my office. I was privileged to call him a friend. I regarded him as one of the great Americans of my day and I regard him as one of the great Americans of all time.

He was a great soldier—a brave, brilliant leader in the United States Marine Corps.

He was a great citizen—a hard-hitting, courageous leader in civilian life.

I recall the first day I met him; his quick interest in the people he met. I recall his request that we take time to go down aisle after aisle of disabled soldiers in the veterans' hospital at Hot Springs. "Just think," he said, "20 years ago these men were the flower of our young manhood. They were picked men."

He never forgot his men. That was why they loved him in war and in peace. And he fought for peace. He was engaged in that fight the last time I saw him. We traveled together from Philadelphia to New York to speak at Carnegie Hall during the debate on the Neutrality Act last fall. He was then, as ever, a personality of so much charged dynamite, vigorous, observing, resourceful, tireless.

A Quaker, he was twice awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for brilliant bravery in time of war. A lifetime soldier, he retired after 30 years of service to spend his time working for peace and against war. We shall hardly see his like again in our generation. America will be under obligation to him for all generations to come.

Insurance Benefits of Certain Persons Employed in Coal-Mining Operations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK O. HORTON
OF WYOMING
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, S. 4070 and H. R. 9955 are companion bills. S. 4070, which was sponsored by Senator WHEELER of Montana and Senator SCHWARTZ of Wyoming, has already passed the Senate.

The bill provides for more uniform coverage of certain persons employed in coal-mining operations with respect to insurance benefits provided for by certain Federal acts.

The Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board recommends its passage, as does the Federal Security Administration and the Treasury Department. The Bureau of the Budget advises that it is in accord with the program of the President. Judge R. V. Fletcher, on behalf of the Association of American Railroads, likewise recommends its passage.

Both by letter, wire, and telephone conversation, the Union Pacific Coal Co. and the United Mine Workers of America, through Alfred Carey of Rock Springs, Wyo., urge the passage of this legislation. These two Wyoming organizations are particularly concerned in this legislation.

Two distinct groups of coal-mine workers are covered under this bill. One group consists of workers who are employed directly by a railroad itself in connection with coal-mining operations in which it is directly engaged. The other group consists of mine workers who are not in the employ of a railroad but are employed by a company which is directly or indirectly owned or controlled by some railroad to which it sells all or a large part of its coal production.

I am particularly interested in this second group and will so direct my remarks, because both the operators and miners in my State fall under this classification. This is the group of mine workers which has suffered under the interpretation of the present law.

Neither this group of mine workers nor their employing companies have ever regarded them as railroad employees. They have been coal miners pure and simple because their operations were confined to coal only and never went beyond work on the tipple. Their pay was received from an operating coal company, not from any railroad.

Prior to July 24, 1939, the U. P. Coal Co. neither paid taxes for the account of the workers or their own account on the wages of such employees nor made deductions from such wages to cover the income taxes levied upon employees by the Carriers Taxing Act.

On that date, however, the general counsel of the Railroad Retirement Board, in an opinion rendered to the Board, stated that a strict interpretation of the language used in the act seemed to indicate that this group, who, as I have already stated, were doing only regular coal-miners work, came under the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act.

The Railroad Retirement Board at first was inclined to adopt the opinion of its counsel as its own, but later, upon petition of interested parties, called for a reconsideration of the question.

Hearings have been held, but its final conclusion has not been announced.

Naturally the interested coal companies, after the original opinion of the counsel of the Board had been announced, had to take the necessary steps to protect themselves with respect to refund of or relief from liability for taxes paid or accrued prior to the date of its enactment.

In the case of the Union Pacific Coal Co., about $169,000 has been deducted from the pay of its employees, but because the matter is still unsettled has not been paid into the Railroad Retirement Act fund.

Upon the passage of this bill, all funds collected will be returned to the miners and the miners will be covered by the State statutes enacted in conformity with the Federal Social Security Act.

There is no question of good faith involved. The miners know that the U. P. Coal Co. is only too anxious to make these refunds, and all parties interested have so advised me.

In closing, let me say that the real purpose of S. 4070 is not only to prevent the various acts mentioned in the bill from being construed as applying to the mine workers employed by railroad subsidiary coal companies, but also to amend such acts so as specifically to exclude therefrom all mine workers directly employed by any railroad in its own coal-mining operations. This is in accord with the wishes of both groups of mine workers who, like all other mine workers the country over, prefer to be covered by the various State statutes enacted in conformity with the Federal Social Security Act.

This view is concurred in by the Railroad Retirement Board, the railroad employers, railroad employees, the mine workers, the Federal Security Administrator, and the State unemployment compensation administration.

Refugee Children and House Joint Resolution 581

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ, OF MICHIGAN, BEFORE HOUSE IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION COMMITTEE

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, the plight of all children orphaned by the present European holocaust is the concern of all humanity. This mass exodus of peoples before what has been termed "blitzkriegs"—fleeing for their lives—has awakened the sympathy and interest of America.

I have received scores of telegrams and letters from various organizations and individuals offering to take care of these poor unfortunates for the duration of the war. This morning I appeared before the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee and made the following statement in support of my bill:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appear before you for the purpose of making a statement in support of my bill, House Joint Resolution 581, which provides for the admission into the United States of a limited number of refugee children from Poland and other occupied countries for the duration of the European war.

It is not necessary to dwell on the mass deportation of men, women, and children to known and unknown destinations after the enemies' invasion of their countries. There are approximately 9,000,000 Poles left within the confines of the Reich who are destined to die of starvation and disease. This number includes thousands isolated in concentration camps and others, younger and more hardy, who have been separated from their families and doomed to a life of hard labor.

Authentic sources reveal that thousands of the families of those doomed to hard labor and concentration camps in the countries occupied by the enemy have escaped. The children orphaned by the war who were fortunate enough to escape from German- and Russian-occupied Poland and other countries, an endless trek of humanity, just ahead of the invading hordes, found their way into Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Switzerland, France, Albania, Italy, and finally the more fortunate refugees arrived in Spain and Portugal.

We are chiefly concerned with the fate of the refugee children, the innocent victims of Europe's disintegration, who, bewildered, homeless, and facing starvation, have become the problem of humanity.

In recent months I have received a number of letters from organizations as well as individuals indicating their willingness to provide for these destitute children. Offers are being made daily by private organizations, business firms, the clergy, camps, schools, and philanthropists who guarantee the care of these children for the duration of the war. In a letter dated August 5, 1940, the president of the Polish-American Council, Mr. F. X. Swietlik, asked that I inform the committee that the Polish-American Council is most anxious to render aid to the Polish refugee children. This organization, consisting of a committee of all Polish-American organizations in the United States with a membership of over one million and a half, has pledged itself to defray transportation and maintenance expenses and offers the guaranty that these children will not become public charges.

Authentic sources reveal that there are about 800 known Polish refugee children in Lisbon, Portugal; about 400 in Casablanca, Morocco; and about 1,000 in England. This number of children of the entire population of Poland constitutes a very small percentage of the pre-war Polish population of 35,000,000 people and does not include the refugee children of other occupied countries. Over 7,000,000 Americans of Polish extraction in the United States are vitally interested in this problem.

The present handling of refugees defeats the purpose of maintaining a proportionate ratio and may cause some confusion. We should avoid discrimination. If a law is to be enacted it should be confined to a nationality ratio basis in determining the number of refugee children to be admitted.

The situation is such that immediate consideration should be contemplated. We must consider the possibility that the countries mentioned in my statement may be subject to invasion.

The Bryan Breakfast at the Chicago Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR JOSEPHUS DANIELS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Ambassador Josephus Daniels, delivered at the Bryan breakfast at the Chicago convention, July 17, 1940:

"I think if you will be quiet I can make myself heard" was the first sentence audible to the packed galleries in the Democratic Convention in Chicago 44 years ago when the young Lochinvar out of the west won the leadership of the Democratic Party. "I was leaving the hall, tired because none of the speakers could make themselves heard above the confusion, when that sentence with flute-like resonance fell upon my ears," Dr. Franklin Martin told me years after. It was the first time Bryan's voice had been raised in a national convention. The ablest statesmen in the party—Hill and Russell and Daniels—in the packed superheated hall had vainly tried to speak above the din. But "the Heaven born Bryan," as Vachel Lindsey called the Nebraskan, without any apparent effort, reached the ear and thrilled every listener in the remotest gallery. You could feel that they literally hung upon his words, charmed by the music of the timbre of his voice as well as by the logic of his argument. He closed with the famous sentence that electrified his listeners. As the climax of the most remarkable speech in the annals of American political oratory, Bryan declared with the seriousness of a prophet of old and with the beauty of the purest rhetoric "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns; you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold." That gem of eloquence comes back today to all of us privileged to have been present with all its cadence as it lifted hypnotized men to a new and holy consecration, and as it moved hardened conventiongoers into an enthusiastic demonstration without precedent.

Twescore and four years have passed since Bryan captivated that great gathering. In the same environment as in 1896, I seem to hear again that voice of mingled sweetness and challenge and feel again the thrill that comes but once in a lifetime. Many thought and said an unknown man had captured the convention by one speech. Not so; Bryan did not suddenly reach that pinnacle. Behind that memorable hour was a brilliant record of achievement in the Halls of Congress and on the hustings. He had won two elections to the National House in rock-ribbed Republican districts in Nebraska. He had charmed listening Senates in a noble argument for tariff reform. In the battle between giants in the epoch of silver discussions, the pebble in the sling of the young David from Nebraska had compassed the political death of more than one political Goliath.

Bryan's voice—the voice of a John the Baptist crying "make straight the path"—was raised in every part of the Republic in the succeeding days. The people crowded to hear the advocate who felt the ills under which they suffered. From East to West the forgotten and burdened welcomed him as their spokesman as he pleaded their cause, which had lacked a leader. Those living on incomes derived from monopoly and enjoying the fat of the land raged in jittery fear lest he would win. Political and clerical Brahmins exhausted their vocabulary of hard names. Never in history has a sincere man spoken bravely in behalf of the oppressed without inciting the hate and opprobriums of those enjoying unearned possession. The greater his sincerity, the more their vindictiveness. Jefferson was a Jacobin; Jackson a demagogue. It is the price a great soul must pay to ring true against caste, privilege, and exploitation.

Bryan scared half of the plutocrats out of their wits, so that they opened their purses to buy the election in an orgy of corruption and coercion which had never before disgraced the Republic. Bryan's blaze-of-glory campaign not only enthused his followers, it also attracted many who came to scoff and remained to pray. It extorted a remarkably appreciative pen-picture of the campaign from the wife of the most scholarly leader of reaction. In a letter written after the election to Cecil Spring-Rice, longtime British Ambassador to the United States, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge gave her British friend this illuminating comment upon a campaign waged against all for which her husband stood:

"The great fight is won. It was a fight conducted by trained and experienced and organized forces, with both hands full of money, with the full powers of the press—and of prestige—on the one side; on the other, a disorganized mob at first, out of which burst into sight, hearing, and force—one man, but such a man. Alone, penniless, without backing, without money, with scarce a paper, without speakers, that man fought such a fight that even those in the East can call him a crusader, an inspired fanatic—a prophet. It has been marvelous. * * * His speeches spoke to the intelligence and hearts of the people with a capital P. He almost won."

Mrs. Lodge might truly have added "Bryan did win but he shares with Tilden the distinction of being denied the fruits of victory." However, that would have been an indictment of her husband's party not to be expected.

Sixteen years after he had captured the convention in Chicago I sat again in the Baltimore convention under the spell of Bryan's power to move men. In Chicago he won for himself the nomination for the Presidency. In 1912, gone was the lute tone that at Chicago had been as pleasing as the strains of a Mendelssohn composition by the master of a great instrument. Gone was the suppleness and the grace that made him an Apollo. But in its place had come out of long contests against privilege, the strength and courage of a noble crusader. He had buried ambition for political honors. Only devotion to a cause dominated his actions. He had come to believe, rather slowly, that Wilson incarnated the liberalism to which he had consecrated his life. Just as at Chicago Bryan's mastery of a convention won him the victory, so at Baltimore in a historic conflict Bryan made possible the selection of Woodrow Wilson as President of the United States. If there had been no fighting Bryan at Baltimore, it is my deliberate judgment, based upon my participation in the organization to nominate Wilson, America and the world would have been denied the statesmanship of Wilson in the high office in the great days when in peace and in war Wilson was recognized as the foremost chieftain of the world. If his own countrymen and others had followed Wilson in 1919 the present holocaust would have been averted.

Among permanent achievements of Bryan's public career, to name only a few, are the writing and compelling the insertion in the Wilson-Gorman Tariff Act of the graduated income and inheritance taxes. When, by a mysterious change of one vote, the Supreme Court declared the levy of an income tax unconstitutional, it was Bryan who began and led the long campaign which resulted in the submission and ratification of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. If the name of the man chiefly responsible for a constitutional amendment was attached to it that amendment would bear the inscription, "Made by William Jennings Bryan." As a matter of fact, the sixteenth amendment did bear the name Bryan for, as Secretary of State in 1913, he officially signed the proclamation of its ratification and placed on it the official seal of his Government.

The same inscription should go on the amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the people and the amendments for woman suffrage and national prohibition. No man since the reconstruction days has left his impress upon the Constitution to such an extent as Bryan. Likewise much reform legislation owed its inception to his advocacy, including the law forbidding contributions by corporations to campaign funds and requiring the publication of all contributions to political campaigns and ended Government by injunction and fathered the law guaranteeing the right of trial by jury in contempt cases. It was Bryan's championship of the Federal Reserve System in a crucial time that contributed to ending an antiquated system.

The perspective of time alone can properly appraise the place of Bryan among the distinguished men who have served as Secretary of State. In Bryan's incumbency of that office he was secretary of peace. That cannot be said of all his predecessors or his immediate successor. Bryan's policies, exemplified in his 30 peace treaties foreshadowed the spirit of the League of Nations, the Kellogg-Briand treaties for the outlawry of war, and all the attempts to substitute arbitration for force. When asked by the Japanese Ambassador in an acute situation, "Is this the last word?" Bryan gave the answer, "There is no last word between friends." That inspirational sentiment ought to be engraved in letters of living light over the door of every chancelry in the world.

Bryan's devotion to the Monroe Doctrine and his principle of consistent opposition to dollar diplomacy and the use of the big stick in dealing with small nations has grown into the doctrine of "the good neighbor," and the hope of Western Hemisphere solidarity against penetration.

Controversy continues over the wisdom of Bryan's resignation from the Wilson Cabinet because he felt the policy adopted would carry our country into war as it did. I have always believed he should have remained with the ship. Whatever may be the final verdict of Bryan's course in those troubled days, his Government has now approved his insistence that it was wiser for Americans not to assert the right of travelling on ships voyaging through the zone of war. Bryan is vindicated whereas in 1916–18 he was derided.

When passion has subsided, the historian will write Bryan's name high among the great men who followed Jefferson in the high office of Secretary of State and as an illustrious patriot who never sold the truth to serve the hour. In confidence in that verdict we gather to do honor today to William Jennings Bryan and pray that others called to leadership will be as steadfast in devotion to the common weal as the sincere and eloquent Commoner.

Shall We See England Perish?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, we hear much in the way of debate in Congress as well as in the press and over the radio for and against a really helpful attitude on the part of the United States towards England, who is now battling for the last vestige of democracy in Europe.

Our Government has pursued a policy of nonappeasement toward Germany, Italy, Japan, and Russia. Our Government has vigorously protested the conduct of these nations in their ruthless destruction and conquest of many of the weaker nations in Europe.

It is my contention that, our foreign policy having been what it has been, and our likes and dislikes being what they are, any adoption of the Lindbergh policy today would appear as a complete back-down and would be that.

We are committed toward an attitude of hostility toward the ruthless aggression of the totalitarian states and toward their political and moral philosophy.

The question as to whether or not it would be a good policy on the part of this country at this sad hour, under these circumstances, to isolate ourselves from the rest of the world, simply praying that England may win, without doing anything to assist in this perilous hour, believing that it would help bring about an unfriendly attitude on the part of Germany and Italy is ridiculous.

The President, the Congress, and the people of our country are definitely against sending our people to Europe. I will vote against sending any of the young manhood of my district and my country to Europe to engage in the ruthless and destructive war which is now raging in Europe.

I am one of those who believe that if we can help England win along the lines which I am advocating it will definitely keep us out of war.

If it is possible to assist England in the way of furnishing her with implements of war, cruisers, airplanes—in fact, everything along this line that we can possibly send her, other than sending our ships into the war zones or sending any of our people over to Europe to engage in this destructive war, to the extent that England would be able to win—it would mean the saving of billions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country in that we would not have to continue to build up and preserve that type of defense program which we would have to have; and it would mean the saving of untold misery and slavery in Europe. It would also tend to dispel fear of an invasion at any time; and, in the last analysis, it would mean everything to this country from an economic standpoint.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to insert herein a poem entitled "Shall We See England Perish?" written by Lalla Adams Stark, Adams Grove, Columbia, S. C., which is very appropriate at this time.

SHALL WE SEE ENGLAND PERISH?

(Inspired by last Saturday's "Merry-Go-Round" column)

Shall we see old England perish?
Turn deaf ears while bombers raid?
Play the game of watchful waiting
While she stands alone, arrayed,
One, against a ruthless axis—
Armies massed at channel gate—
Fighting for her sea-girt islands—
Shall we aid, or hold debate?

See her mighty fleet patrolling
In the gray dawn, 'neath the moon;
See our vast coasts undefended,
Timbers for our ships unhewn.
Cut the red tape, cliques dissolving;
Men, red-blooded, oh, arise,
Scrap the obsolete, the feudal—
Leo's sign is in the skies.

Hear the knell of brave ships sinking,
See the isles ringed round with steel,
Vision beauty of the ages
Ground beneath the vandal's heel.
Would we see her navy captured?
Heed not signals of distress?
See the bulwark of our ocean
Seized by foes so merciless?

Share with England our destroyers
(God, how long must we delay?).
Shall this glorious empire builder
See her star set in the gray?
She who bears the torch of learning
Day by day pleads, e'er reminds:
"Mine a struggle for existence;
Yours a tie that ever binds."

Hear her calling, calling, calling:
"America, Land of the Free,
Rise, defend your own blood mother;
Live, let live democracy."

AUGUST 5.

Senator Reynolds Congratulates Governor Hoey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

TELEGRAM FROM HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS TO GOVERNOR HOEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I sent to Governor Clyde R. Hoey, of North Carolina, on August 6, 1940, with respect to the Communist Party, German-American Bund, alien enemies, and so forth.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 6, 1940.

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY,
Governor of North Carolina, Raleigh, N. C.:

Please accept my sincere congratulations upon fine speech which newspapers report you made at Raleigh on August 5 before North Carolina Food Dealers' Association in condemnation of Communist Party, German-American Bund, alien enemies, saboteurs, spies, and "fifth columnists." For 5 long years I have been outspoken against Communists and all subversive organizations in this country and introduced bills in United States Senate to outlaw the Communist Party, the German-American Bund, and other subversive organizations. One of my bills is known as S. 4132 and other bills of similar character. May I hope that at every opportunity you will bring my bills to attention of our people of North Carolina. I earnestly solicit your continued support and also wholehearted support of American people with respect to legislation which is so badly needed in America at this time. Am happy to know that at last the American people are beginning to think in American terms.

Highest regards,

ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senator.

The Hull Trade Treaties in 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, ever since their inception I have been opposed to the Hull brand of reciprocal-trade treaties. I have always felt, and still feel, that they are wrong in principle.

The fundamental wrong is the delegation of legislative power.

During this session of Congress the House, at the request of the lawyers of this Nation, passed the Walter-Logan bill. Why was this legislation passed? The Walter-Logan bill was submitted to Congress for the simple reason that the lawyers of this country could see that if Congress continued delegating power to the President and to individuals, bureaus, and commissions there would be little need for lawyers, or for Congressmen either for that matter. The bureaucrats become judge, jury, witnesses, and executioner in some cases, and the lawyers were well within their rights in asking that the rulings of the bureaucrats be open to court review. The Walter-Logan bill sets up a procedure in Government comparable to procedures followed in several States for State commissions and bureaus. Evidently the Jeffersonian Democrats in the House were anxious to preserve or regain some of the powers delegated to the President. This is evidenced by the vote on the Walter-Logan bill, when 129 Democrats, as well as 151 Republican Members, voted for this bill in the House, and only 94 Democrats, or new dealers, voted against it.

ARE THESE FAIR QUESTIONS?

First. If the lawyers of this country who requested the passage of the Walter-Logan bill are justified in asking that delegated powers are subject to review by court procedure or hearings, am I not, as a Congressman from a rural section, as fully justified in questioning the delegation of power to one man, giving him direct control of the milk check of every dairy farmer in the country?

Second. Am I not justified in asking for the farmers of my district what the lawyers requested and obtained? If the lawyers ask and obtain this safeguard for all legislation, should not the farmer be entitled to the same legislation?

Third. Is not this a fair question to ask when you realize that 1 out of every 100 cows in the United States is in my district? Is not this of interest to dairy farmers when cheese averaged 17.5 cents per pound the 7 pre-New Deal years and only 13.2 cents per pound the 7 years of the New Deal? Is not this situation also of interest when you know that in 1939, after 7 years of the New Deal, cheese averaged only 12.8 cents per pound? Is not this delegation of power of interest to the dairymen of America when in 1938 cheese averaged only 12.6 cents per pound and the New Deal lowered the tariff by another 20 percent?

Fourth. Is not this delegation of power of interest to the dairy farmers of America when they are told that these tariff reductions are recommended by experts, and then no one can find out who the experts are? I have spent nearly 2 years trying to find out, but they tell me that they do not give this information out. Have we become so politically low that a free people cannot find out who makes or recommends decisions of the Government?

Fifth. Why is it that no Democratic colleague has been able to tell me where Jefferson, in any of his writings or sayings, has ever given anyone reason to vote for such kind of power-delegating legislation?

Sixth. Will we not, as a people, vote on November 5 as to whether we believe in a philosophy of government of Jefferson and Lincoln or in a big and little dictator form of government?

The Jeffersonian Democrats and the rejuvenated Republicans are now pretty close friends in Wisconsin and the Jeffersonian Democrats feel at home as Republican candidates for office.

Although a first-term Congressman, I am happy to think that I have been able to equalize and reduce the interest burden of the farmers of this country to an extent that it represents a saving of tens of thousands of dollars each year to the farmers of my district and an annual saving of millions of dollars to the farmers of the Nation.

Send 50 Destroyers to Britain? How Tantalizing to Warmongers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE ENTITLED "FACING REALITIES"

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, interventionists and warmongers are proceeding with less caution in their efforts to drag America into the European conflict. The latest suggestion to turn over United States destroyers to Great Britain is another step in the direction of war, if it is not an act of war in itself. The following newspaper article discusses the problem:

FACING REALITIES

General Pershing has posed an issue of the utmost gravity for the American people. He clearly sees that the course of events in Europe is giving rise to uncertain but nontheless real dangers for the United States. And he asks that "we make up our minds to face the truth without flinching."

This is sound advice. When any nation is confronted by the momentous issue of going to war it would be suicidal not to face realities with courage. But to do so is not a simple task. For if our national security is to be preserved, we must take a comprehensive view of world problems and our relationship thereto, and not confine our understanding of reality to one particular set of circumstances that seems of special importance at the moment.

In the opinion of General Pershing, it is not enough greatly to strengthen our armaments against possible attack. He told his radio audience that "if there is anything we can do to save the British fleet" during the next few months "we shall be failing in our duty to America if we do not do it." If that is the case we should not stop with selling over-age destroyers. We should be furnishing, of our own self-interest, our best ships, our fastest planes, and men to handle them.

The American people are overwhelmingly sympathetic with the British in their struggle against Nazi domination. But they are also overwhelmingly opposed to participation in the war in Europe. Obviously the advice offered by the distinguished commander of our expeditionary force during the World War must be examined from both these points of view.

Specifically, General Pershing suggests that the United States make available to the British or Canadian Government "at least 50 of the over-age destroyers which are left over from the days of the World War." But he made it plain that he was thinking of "measures short of war" and that this plan should go into effect only "if a proper method can be found."

Here, of course, is the weakness of the proposal. At present the law flatly forbids sending war vessels out of the jurisdiction of the United States with the intent of delivering them to a belligerent nation. Moreover, Congress recently forbade the sale or transfer of any naval equipment unless the Chief of Naval Operations certifies that it is not essential to defense of the United States. Such a certification as to over-age destroyers could not be expected from Admiral Stark, for he recently told Congress that the Navy needs all its destroyers, plus 81 more.

Thirty-nine of the World War destroyers have been converted for a special type of service. The remaining 123 are all useful as fighting ships, in spite of their age. Most of these have already been recommissioned for naval service and all of them will have been recommissioned within the next few weeks. So they are an active part of our present Navy.

To sell or give any of these vessels to Great Britain would require congressional action. And Congress could not transfer even a minor portion of our fighting ships to Britain without committing what Germany would be fully entitled to regard as a hostile act. Hitler might or might not retaliate with an act of war against the United States. But Congress would certainly have to take into consideration the very real possibility that the proposed step would take us swiftly into war, regardless of our state of unpreparedness.

In the circumstances the "probable hazards" which General Pershing sees in his own suggestion will seem to many to outweigh the aid, imperative though it may be, which 50 over-age destroyers would give to Great Britain.

Protect America!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

ADDRESSES OF J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, at the Federal-State Conference on Law Enforcement Problems of National Defense, Department of Justice Building, Washington, D. C., August 5, 1940:

PROTECT AMERICA

The significance of this conference is equalled only by the emergencies which have brought it about. Today our Nation is a fortress of liberty, fighting a vicious, implacable army of foreign "isms." Never before has there been a greater need for unity, for calm appraisal of the forces which work against us, for coordination of thought and effort in building an impregnable defense.

A nation faces a desperate moment when its men and guns are called into action. It is in the period before this time, while the enemy is making every possible inroad upon our moral defenses, that the true battle takes place. That battle is now in progress in America.

This conference has been called so that we may consider every maneuver by which we may outwit a resourceful and ruthless foe. I refer, of course, to the sinister foreign "ism" advocate. Protected by sentimentalists and by innocents, these termites have succeeded in boring into every phase of American life, masquerading behind "front" organizations. Nothing is so dangerous as these foreign "isms" which are working their way into the very lifeblood of our country with their lies, their deceit, and their suave presentation of their cause.

I insist that in approaching the job of protecting America we must consider the problem of separating true liberty from license. We must set apart freedom, as defined by our Constitution, from the purloining of privileges by enemies within our gates, who would fit our country to the patterns of the dictators they serve. It is one of the paradoxes of democracy that the guarantees of freedom of speech, assembly, and the press are the shields behind which the foes of democracy conduct their vicious campaigns to destroy the system which permits them to exist.

Ours is a land of freedom, but that freedom does not include the privilege to set off bombs. It does not guaranteee freedom to those who undermine our efforts at national defense by smoke screens which pretend patriotism but in reality seek to weaken our defenses so that bloody dictatorships may find no resistance in their way. It does not mean freedom to put emery dust in the cylinders of airplane engines, to place destructive pieces of metal in the motive power of naval vessels. It does not mean the freedom to falsify the motives of those who would carry on our Government to the best of their ability.

Yet we find that every one of these heinous things has been done and is being done by persons shielded by innocent appearing but subversive forces under that portion of our Constitution which guarantees free speech and liberty of normal endeavors. America is proud of her Bill of Rights, but this sacred heritage will not be preserved by its enemies who invoke it to undermine and weaken the world's last great bulwark of democracy. Our democracy was ordained to insure the welfare of our people. The time is rapidly approaching when as a nation we must choose between the welfare of the great masses of Americans and a few interlopers who hide behind the Bill of Rights while they undermine our Nation. If any effort is made to hamper these subverters, their defenders immediately proclaim that their liberties are being trampled upon; that America has adopted the methods of the Ogpu or the Gestapo.

I submit that these persons, and not ourselves, are the ones who know best what the Ogpu is and how the Gestapo operates, because they espouse the causes which have brought these agencies into existence. They seek to carry on, in our free America, the very Ogpu and Gestapo methods which they decry by breaking down our resistance, by spreading fear and false rumors, by attempting to weaken our means of national defense.

Let me give you an example:

In a certain large factory, engaged in the production of defense materials, every possible effort is being made by a Communist-controlled labor group to foment a strike. In that factory are many, many loyal, honest, American men, devoted to this country, willing to work for it, to die for it, if necessary. But their voices have been smothered by the control of men working for the cause of Lenin and Browder, the kind of men who hate Americans and American ways and who would supplant them with a tyrannical reign of terror.

As an example to which the inane avenues of protection have been carried, I recently received a letter from a minister of the gospel who protested against a special agent of the F. B. I. carrying out his duty of telling chiefs of police to make reports on the subversive activities of Communists and members of the German-American Bund.

The Chief Executive of the United States foresaw last year the dangers which would confront us as a result of the war in Europe. He immediately gave orders to coordinate on a Nation-wide basis the fight against espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities by designating the F. B. I. to act as a clearing house to handle these matters, with the aid of all law-enforcement men of America.

Acting under the instructions of the President and Attorney General Jackson, the F. B. I. quietly set in motion its machinery of coordination of State, county, and local law-enforcing officers to enlist their cooperation and did in this important work. As a result, I am pleased to report that today all law enforcement presents a united front against so-called "fifth column" activity in every State, county, and municipality throughout our land. There is more unity today among the forces charged with the responsibility of maintaining our internal security than ever before. This is a happy contrast with the confusion that existed in the first World War, when over a score of Federal agencies were investigating spies and saboteurs, with a resultant lack of coordination and cooperation with the various State and municipal groups.

In other words, we of law enforcement, with the aid of a patriotic citizenry, are fighting a common enemy upon a national basis. We should fight him in exactly the same manner that we fought and conquered the kidnaper and his destructive forces. Defense against "fifth columnists" cannot be handled by posses or by citizen-groups operating as vigilantes. It is the task of constituted law enforcement, and it is not a matter which can be taken into the hands of private citizens, although we must have all the help citizens can give us. There is a great deal of difference between private assistance and private action. One is of great aid to us, the other of tremendous hindrance.

Law enforcement in the United States is better prepared today than ever before to meet any challenges to our democratic standards. There will be no black-out of justice in this country. Already we have seen among us vile domestic forces that are un-American. But they can hope to accomplish little, so long as law-enforcement agencies are on the job and are given the support that is typically American.

The fact must not be overlooked that meeting the spy, the saboteur, and the subverter is a problem that must be handled on a Nation-wide basis. An isolated incident in the Middle West may be of little significance but, when fitted into a national pattern of similar incidents, it may lead to an important revelation of subversive activity. It is for this reason that the President requested all of our citizens and law-enforcing agencies to report directly to the Federal Bureau of Investigation any complaints or information dealing with espionage, sabotage, or subversive activities. In such matters, time is of the essence.

It is unfortunate that in a few States efforts have been made by individuals not fully acquainted with the far-flung ramifications of this problem to interject superstructures of agencies between local law enforcement and the F. B. I. to sift what might be vital information, thus delaying its immediate reference to the F. B. I. This cannot be, if our internal security is to be best served. This is no time for red tape or amateur handling of such vital matters. There must be a direct and free flow of contact between the local law enforcement agencies and the F. B. I. The job of meeting the spy or saboteur is one for experienced men of law enforcement.

We appreciate everything which the well-meaning citizen may do for us. He can be of tremendous aid in the field of observation, but not of activity. Sooner or later, the spy, the saboteur, the dynamiter, or the subverter will be exposed and observed by the honest American citizen. It is then that the alert American, alive to the evils of the foe who has shown his hand, will decide whether to report his unusual or seemingly subversive actions.

To this challenge, there is only one answer. In justice to himself, to his country, and to the person under suspicion, the citizen should report anything which seems to him to be out of the ordinary, and once having reported it, clear his mind and his conscience of the matter. It is then the task of experienced men of training and good judgment to function—protecting the innocent and identifying the guilty.

Much has been accomplished in recent months, but the task has only begun. The F. B. I., for instance, at the request of the War and Navy Departments, inaugurated many months ago a program of surveying protective facilities of manufacturing plants engaged in the production of defense materials. There are thousands of factories in America which we will need in time of war. Already Communists have sought to impede such a program. They do not want American industry protected. The F. B. I. has been accused by these willful obstructionists as being antilabor, in an effort to stir up dissention and unrest. Everybody knows this is a malicious falsehood and nobody knows it better than the Communists and propaganda purveyors themselves.

In making plant surveys, we are concerned only with our Nation's safety. Airplane plants, munition works, and other vital industries must be made impervious to attack. Here and now, I want to give my thanks and appreciation, as well as that of every other patriotic law-enforcement officer in America, to the far-sighted and wholly American labor leaders who, knowing the truth and sincerity of our efforts, have stood shoulder to shoulder with us against the vile attacks of forces which have attempted to undermine our efforts.

So far we have been able to avoid much of the violence which characterized the early days of the World War. However, this does not mean that any of us can relax our vigilance for a single instant. The skilled saboteur carries out his acts with cunning and cleverness. Schools actually exist for these despicable subverters, wherein they may be taught the most terrible means of creating destruction. Incendiary bombs have been devised, no larger than a cigar, which will create disaster. Plans to place chemicals in boilers, with the idea of creating wholesale destruction, have been discovered.

The immediate task is to marshal and coordinate every protective facility. Industries once open to visitors, with little attention given to the background of key employees, should now scrutinize all comers and entrust secrets of production only to persons whose Americanism is thoroughly established. Gullibility must cease. These are times when too much trustful innocence may be repaid by a stab in the back. Remember that the craven propaganda-purveyors of "ism" forces are not concerned with the future of America but with the power, the secretiveness, the aggressive greed of their unholy foreign Communist cause. And their advice should be taken exactly for what it is worth, self-serving hokum designed for any sucker foolish enough to believe it!

For such statements I shall be charged as standing for the abrogation of civil rights. Such despicable lies are self-evident. I hold that for every right there is a duty. I insist that no one can claim civil rights and at the same time work for the overthrow of the civil liberties which we all cherish. The subverter is not content merely to discard freedom of thought. He wants to kill freedom in any form that exists. He sneakingly seeks the thralldom of our America. This means that we must not relax in our vigilance.

Every city, for instance, should survey its utilities to insure a maximum of protection. Think for a moment of the chaos that would ensue if a city's water power were shut off, even for a day. The demoralization of cities by means of water famine has already been used by totalitarian saboteurs.

In this period of national emergency, the strength of law enforcement is as important as the strength of our Army and Navy. Yet to the discredit of the civic spirit in many communities, local police departments are sorely undermanned and ill equipped. Should war come, uprisings and domestic violence can do more to undermine public morale than squadrons of screaming dive bombers. This will be one of the techniques used, should America be attacked. In such times, a community must depend upon its law-enforcing agencies to maintain order. Where law enforcement is weak, it should be strengthened without delay and above all it should not be hampered by impractical theorists.

Five years ago last month, in order to lift the standards of professional law enforcement, the F. B. I. National Police Academy was created. One of the things we had in mind at that time was the need for a mobile force of highly trained men throughout America in case of great emergency. Because of this academy and the training which its graduates have been able to impart to others, I am proud to say that America can today depend upon the greatest body of specially trained law-enforcement officials in her entire history—thousands and thousands of them, who know exactly what to do in emergency and when and how to do it. Thus, we are exerting every effort in closing up the holes through which the serpent of infiltration has penetrated.

Remember always that the spy, the saboteur, or the destroyer carries no badge. He hides behind a hundred fronts. He pretends innocence. He likes to rub elbows with patriotic men because he thus can seek to break down morale, to preach unpreparedness, and undermine honesty. It is his job to sap the national strength by untruth, by confusion, by fomenting unrest in the community, the school, the factory, and the mill.

Little has been published of the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in carrying out its responsibility of coordinating the handling of matters dealing with espionage, sabotage, and subversion. That very fact has aided us materially in our work. The enemy does not know our actions and cannot anticipate a time when he might plan his devious task with a minimum chance of detection. The effectiveness of our activities would be hindered unless our work were conducted with the utmost secrecy. There will be honor and glory for all in the meeting of the challenge, and the public will be fully advised of all the facts in every matter when it is ready for presentation in a court of justice. There should be no trials in the newspaper columns or persecutions by word of mouth in such a vital situation.

I want to express my heartfelt gratitude to the loyal Governors, mayors, State and county officers, law-enforcement officials, and patriotic citizens for the unselfish, eager cooperation which they have given to the F. B. I. in its efforts to combat the inner enemies of this Nation. We have depended upon you in the past; we shall depend upon you more and more in the future, feeling sure that you understand our problems and the necessities of our many common tasks.

Unfortunately the spy is not a person who can be arrested and prosecuted like a gangster. That would only allow his comrades to outwit our further efforts. So we must combat him in ways and means which have been evolved from long experience, trusting always to the confidence, the support, and the assistance of you who form our main bulwarks, our listening and observation posts, without which we could not succeed.

May we as Americans live up to our sacred trust by protecting our flag and all that it symbolizes. This is the first order of the day for every patriotic citizen. Until our land becomes impregnable there must be no cessation of coordinated Nation-wide effort in that direction. Let us press on as of one purpose to the high calling—preserving the traditions and ideals of the established Americanism whose militant spirit is our proudest heritage and surest hope for the future.

During the fiscal year 1940 the Federal Bureau of Investigation was confronted with a greater volume of work and more responsibilities than during any other time of its history. Occasioned by the national emergency, the burden of work has increased tremendously. Nevertheless this was the most successful year from the standpoint of accomplishments during the 16 years that the Bureau has been under the direction of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover.

From 1932 to 1934 the F. B. I. underwent a transition with the passage of new Federal laws directed at curbing the interstate activities of desperadoes who were defying the control of local authorities. The national emergency has brought about another period of transition. During the past year new offices were opened in Honolulu, T. H.; Juneau, Alaska; San Juan, P. R.; Albany, N. Y.; Phoenix, Ariz.; Baltimore, Md.; Savannah, Ga.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; San Diego, Calif.; New Haven, Conn.; and Houston, Tex.

INVESTIGATIVE

During the fiscal year 1940, 5,605 convictions were secured in Federal courts in cases investigated by special agents of the F. B. I. as compared with 5,162 convictions secured in the fiscal year 1939. This represents an increase of 443 (8.6 percent) convictions during the fiscal year 1940. Convictions were secured in more than 96 percent of the cases investigated by the F. B. I. and prosecuted in court.

During the year, sentences imposed in cases investigated by the F. B. I. totaled 10 life, 17,833 years, 4 months, and 28 days, while during the fiscal year 1939 sentences imposed totaled 12 life, 16,948 years, 6 months, and 5 days.

As a result of the investigative activities of the F. B. I. during the fiscal year 1940, fines, savings, and recoveries totaled $58,390,-180.64 as compared with $16,876,717.99 in the fiscal year 1939. The regular appropriation of the F. B. I. for the fiscal year 1940 totaled $7,300,000. For every dollar spent in connection with the regular operations of the Bureau during the fiscal year 1940, $8 was saved or returned to the Government or individual citizens in stolen property recovered, fines imposed, and savings effected for the Government.

During the year, a total of 4,153 stolen automobiles valued at $1,911,162.03 were recovered in cases wherein the F. B. I. performed investigative work. Since the enactment of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act in 1919 a total of 56,144 stolen cars valued at $32,310,216.57 have been recovered in cases wherein the F. B. I. performed investigative activity.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE

During the past year, 2,389 Federal fugitives from justice were located and apprehended by the F. B. I. In addition, 7,809 fugitives were located for State, county, and municipal law-enforcement agencies through the Fingerprint Division of the F. B. I., making a total of 10,198 fugitives from justice located during the fiscal year 1940. In the fiscal year 1939, 1,890 Federal fugitives were located by special agents of the F. B. I., while 7,933 fugitives from justice were located by checking incoming fingerprints through the F. B. I. fingerprint files, making a total of 9,823 fugitives from justice located.

ESPIONAGE

In the 5-year period preceding 1938 the F. B. I. investigated on an average of 35 espionage matters each year. In the fiscal year 1938, 250 such matters were handled by the F. B. I., while in the fiscal year 1939 a total of 1,651 matters pertaining to the national defense were received for investigation. With the outbreak of war in Europe early in September and the Presidential proclamation establishing a limited emergency, this type of work increased materially. On one day alone in May of 1940 a total of 2,871 complaints were received. A total of 16,885 national-defense matters were received during the fiscal year 1940 which required investigative activity.

On September 6, 1939, the President issued a statement calling upon all law-enforcement agencies in the United States to refer "any information obtained by them relating to espionage, counter-espionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of the neutrality laws to the F. B. I." The handling of such matters is definitely the task of constituted and well-trained law-enforcement agencies, and the citizens' function in the present emergency is to refer to the F. B. I. information coming into their possession which they believe bears upon the furtherance of our national defense.

The success of investigations of espionage and sabotage cannot be judged by prosecutions and convictions, as is the case with kidnaping, bank robbery, and other heinous types of crimes. Espionage and sabotage investigations must have for their objective the identification of the individuals involved, together with ascertaining their contacts, methods of operation, sources of information, and related matters. The preventive aspect is of paramount importance. There has been a negligible amount of sabotage in the second World War in contrast to a similar period in the first World War.

In September of 1939, in accordance with the request of the War and Navy Departments, a program of surveying the protective facilities of manufacturing establishments having large contracts to provide the Government with defense materials was inaugurated. A priority list of some 800 factories and manufacturing establishments has been furnished the F. B. I. by the armed services and of this number 270 have been surveyed and recommendations made to the plant officials designed to maintain a maximum of protection. The F. B. I. has no interest in the employer-employee relationship and its sole concern is bolstering the physical protective facilities in manufacturing plants and establishments. Eventually it is estimated that some 12,000 manufacturing establishments will be surveyed by the F. B. I.

In consummation of the defense plans of the F. B. I. for emergency situations, regional conferences have been held in the various F. B. I. field divisions with ranking law-enforcement officials to fully advise them as to the procedure to take in connection with the emergency matters which are arising from time to time and in order to enlist their cooperation in this type of work.

KIDNAPING

Since the enactment of the Federal kidnaping law, which was approved on June 22, 1932, a total of 184 cases have been reported to the F. B. I., of which 182 have been completely solved. In these cases 367 persons have been convicted in Federal and State courts with the imposition of sentences totaling 12 death, 42 life, 4,132 years 7 months and 13 days. During the fiscal year a total of 46 convictions was secured in this type of case with the imposition of sentences totaling 451 years 11 months and 7 days.

During the fiscal year 1940 only 14 kidnaping cases occurred, all of which were solved.

EXTORTION

The Federal Extortion Act was approved on July 8, 1932, and since that time the F. B. I. has investigated a large number of extortion cases. During the fiscal year of 1940, 105 persons were convicted for this type of violation with the imposition of sentences totaling 351 years, 1 month and 16 days with the imposition of fines totaling $4,525.

BANK ROBBERY

The Federal bank robbery statute was originally approved by the President on May 18, 1934. As a result of investigative activities of special agents of the F. B. I. into this type of crime in cooperation with State and local police agencies, bank robbery has declined approximately 80 percent since its peak year of 1932. During the fiscal year of 1940, a total of 178 convictions were secured, with the imposition of two life sentences and other sentences totaling 2,189 years and 28 days, with fines totaling $52,601. The total amount of loot recovered in this type of case amounted to $69,413.18. In the fiscal year 1939, there were only 126 Federal convictions secured.

WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC ACT

Investigations of violations of the White Slave Traffic Act during the fiscal year 1940 resulted in 476 Federal convictions with sentences totaling 1,242 years, 8 months, and 28 days.

IDENTIFICATION FACILITIES

At the close of the fiscal year 1940, there was a total of 13,205,855 sets of fingerprint records on file in the Identification Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. These fingerprints are so classified and arranged in the files that an incoming record can be searched and identified within a period of 3 minutes in the event the individual has previously been fingerprinted and his fingerprints forwarded to the Bureau. A total of 2,449,397 sets of fingerprints was received during the fiscal year 1940. Identifications were effected in 60.4 percent of the criminal fingerprints received.

Included in the fingerprints received were 570,850 fingerprint impressions of citizens to be placed in the personal identification files; 182,549 sets of fingerprint impressions of individuals applying for employment in the Federal service and whose fingerprints were forwarded to the Bureau by the Civil Service Commission; together with 741,443 sets of noncriminal fingerprint impressions, including those of unidentified deceased persons and Army, Navy, Coast Guard, and Marine Corps enlistment prints.

On July 1, 1940, the personal identification files contained 1,898,-052 fingerprint impressions of citizens who desired to insure their identity against emergencies; 713,395 civil-service prints; 1,055,003 noncriminal prints, and 9,535,334 criminal fingerprint records.

During the fiscal year 1940, a total of 10,885 law-enforcement agencies were contributing fingerprint records to the F. B. I. The F. B. I. is currently receiving 7,700 sets of fingerprint records daily for search against the criminal files and approximately 2,500 personal identification prints. There are 27,493 wanted notices posted on the fingerprint records in the F. B. I. files, including 7,662 parole violators and 696 probation violators.

THE TECHNICAL LABORATORY

During the fiscal year 1940, a total of 7,097 examinations were made by F. B. I. scientists compared with 5,559 such examinations during the fiscal year 1939. Of the 7,097 examinations made in the F. B. I. crime laboratory, assistance was rendered to other Federal agencies in 369 instances and to State, county, and municipal law-enforcement agencies in 2,065 instances. The 7,097 scientific examinations involved 39,500 different specimens of evidence.

During the fiscal year concentrated research work has been carried on in the laboratory to devise ways and means to meet the many problems that have arisen in connection with the widespread activities of the F. B. I. in coping with sabotage, espionage, counterespionage, and other matters related to national defense.

F. B. I. NATIONAL POLICE ACADEMY

The fourteenth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy was graduated on June 29, 1940. With the graduation of this class, a total of 478 select law enforcement representatives have been trained in the F. B. I. National Police Academy since its inauguration in 1935 in order that they might return to their home towns and inaugurate police training schools. These representatives come from every State in the Union. Most of the graduates have received promotions since their graduation and the great majority of them have engaged in training activities. During the fiscal year, the F. B. I. cooperated in the inauguration and organization of 418 police training schools, most of which were under the supervision of the graduates of the National Police Academy. In September of 1939 a special re-training course was afforded the graduates of the F. B. I. National Police Academy in Washington, D. C., to consider investigations arising under the national-defense laws and plans are now being made for another re-training conference to take place in September of 1940. The graduates of the F. B. I. National Police Academy constitute a reserve force for the F. B. I.

QUANTICO BARRACKS

A training center designed to be used in connection with firearms instruction and the F. B. I. National Police Academy was inaugurated on the Quantico Marine Corps Reservation with the opening of a barracks building in the late spring of 1940. In view of the emergency it was necessary to utilize the barracks as training facilities for new special agents and at the present time three classes of new special agents are being trained and graduated every seven weeks in all phases of modern scientific crime detection, although a special emphasis in the course is placed upon national-defense matters.

Summary of accomplishments during the fiscal years 1939 and 1940

Convictions	5,162	5,605.
Sentences	12 life, 16,948 years, 6 months, 5 days.	10 life, 17,833 years, 4 months, 28 days.
Recoveries, fines, and savings	$16,876,717.99	$58,390,180.64.
Automobiles recovered	3,982	4,153.
Federal fugitives located	1,890	2,389.
Fugitives located through fingerprints	7,933	7,809.

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 7 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

PRAYER OFFERED 150 YEARS AGO

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a prayer offered by George Washington.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Almighty God, who hast given us this good land for our heritage, we humbly beseech Thee, that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will. Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion; from pride and arrogancy, and from every evil way. Defend our liberties and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom in Thy name we entrust the authority of government, that there may be peace and justice at home and that through obedience to Thy law we may show forth Thy praise among the nations of the earth. In the time of prosperity fill our hearts with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble suffer not our trust in Thee to fail; all of which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chattanooga Times for August 6, 1940:

[From the Chattanooga Times of August 6, 1940]

VOICE OF A LEADER

For Americans who are not so blind they will not see and not so deaf they will not hear, the address of Gen. John J. Pershing delivered Sunday night is both a message and a challenge. The distinguished soldier who led the American Expeditionary Force in the World War asserts in support of his recommendation that at least 50 destroyers be provided Great Britain that, "by sending help to the British, we can still hope with confidence to keep the war on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, where the enemies of liberty, if possible, should be defeated."

That recommendation gives rise to several questions, of which the most important is this one: How can any American who is reasonably well informed contend that this country is not at this time actually involved in the war? In the past 10 months the situation of this country has undergone a profound change; for the first time in our history we are not isolated in the world solely because of our splendid aloofness from international quarrels and controversies, but because isolation is being imposed upon us by combinations of aggressor nations in Europe and in Asia.

The lesson taught by the events of the past few months and implicit in General Pershing's statement is that if Great Britain is defeated, this country will be in the position Britain occupies today; we shall be without strong friends ready to help us, and we shall spend billions of dollars to defend ourselves in this hemisphere against aggressors immeasurably strengthened for attacks they will make in their own time and when it is most advantageous to them.

Whether this country can spare 50 destroyers is a matter on which no layman is competent to pass. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Nation's armed forces, and the Cabinet officers charged with the task of maintaining those forces at maximum efficiency must be depended upon to say whether warships or any other type of defense equipment can be spared. It is extremely unlikely that General Pershing would have made such a recommendation (Secretary of State Cordell Hull congratulated him warmly on his address), if he had not understood both that the British Government needs and desires the destroyers and that the Roosevelt administration is willing to make them available. Every aid we give the British will be defending our own way of life. And we can be certain that our failure to assist the British will be regarded in Berlin only as an indication of our weakness and disunity.

The layman may hesitate to pass judgment on military and naval matters, but he can have an opinion as to whether it makes any difference to this country if Great Britain is defeated. And if it does make a difference, if there is even the remotest possibility that by aiding the British the war can be kept out of this hemisphere, then it follows that we should, as a matter of self-interest if for no other reason, give the British every form of assistance they can use and we can spare.

Col. Charles A. Lindbergh believes that since we may have to deal with a Europe dominated by Germany, we should "cooperate" with the Hitler regime and thereby maintain "the supremacy of our western civilization and the right of our commerce to proceed unmolested throughout the world." General Pershing's recommendation does not foreclose any dealings with a Hitler-dominated Europe; but he proposes that we try to obviate the possibility of having to deal exclusively with Hitler by strengthening the country with which we have dealt in peace, and honorably, for a good many years. Instead of thinking about cooperating with a Europe dominated by Germany, we shall do better to cooperate with Britain so that Europe and the world may be saved from a Nazi domination of violence, brutality, and mercilessness.

No one who has not refused to face realities can question the accuracy of General Pershing's description of the present war. What we see "developing right before our very eyes" is:

"A new kind of war * * * fought with all weapons, including treason, and fought most insidiously during what some of our countrymen call 'peacetime.' It is a war against the civilization that we know. It is a revolution against all the values which we have cherished and which we wish our children to cherish in the future. It is a revolution which denies the dignity of man and which banishes the hope of brotherhood and comradeship on earth."

The United States is involved in that war, and to pretend that it makes no difference to the American people whether Germany or Britain wins is to be incredibly stupid. And to contend that this country can safely afford not to give Britain every aid which can be spared is to refuse to try to insure ourselves against having to fight in the Western Hemisphere. To be sure, we shall encounter risks if warships are sent to Britain. But the risks we shall certainly face if Britain is defeated are so much greater than any risk we dare to take now seems by comparison inconsequential.

What the American people need to understand is that if they draw back now from taking action which might enable Britain to survive, they will draw back later when other risks need to be taken to defend our vital interests. If we can spare 50 destroyers, they ought to be sent to Britain immediately. But what we need as a people even more than a willingness to send 50 destroyers to Britain is a resurgence of the spirit of freemen. We need to abandon the easy-going ways, the softness which make attractive the counsel of men like Lindbergh. In General Pershing's words:

"We must lift up our hearts. We must reaffirm our noble tradition. We must make ourselves so strong that the tradition we live by shall not perish from the earth * * * the time has come when we must rise up as a united people to make secure our country's independence and our great inheritance of constitutional liberty."

That challenge will not impress those who refuse to look or listen. It will appeal to freemen who love freedom, to freemen who understand that human liberty is being threatened as it has never been threatened before and who know that when liberty has to be fought for, the thing to do is fight and secure it.

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson from the Washington Daily News of today:

[From the Washington Daily News of August 7, 1940]

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

NEW YORK.—You can get a sample taste of what "can happen here" from Monday's debate in the Senate blasting Charles Lindbergh's speech against the massive current New Deal attempt to stumble, fumble, or blunder this country into war. Three New Deal Senators, than whom there are none whicher, danced around the torture stake: MINTON, PEPPER, and—with deep blushes for my own home State of Oklahoma—that ineffable ex-teacher of elocution and delsarte, JOSH LEE.

SHERMAN MINTON knows better. I imagine him with his tongue in his cheek having a swell time making the animals squirm. But Senators PEPPER and LEE just have no more sense. They are hot-eyed fanatics for the perfectly preposterous and patently absurd wherever they can find them.

Senator PEPPER is old Doc Townsend's godchild. He honestly wants to give $200 a month to everybody over 60, regardless of what that would do to everybody under 60 and the country in general. JOSH LEE wants to make everybody who has so much as a peanut stand put it in hock to buy Government bonds bearing, say, 2 percent interest on which, plus the peanut stand, the Government will charge them 5 percent and to hell with the American economic system and the Constitution which says that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

These gentlemen offered to disembowel Colonel Lindbergh for saying that if we are going to do business at all after this war is over we will have to do it with both victor and vanquished, even if the victor is Germany; that we shall have to reconcile ourselves to this idea, and that it would be wise to try to intercede to stop this war before it destroys any more civilization.

For that Senator PEPPER screamed "fifth column"; Senator LEE and Senator MINTON chipped in with dirty cracks about Colonel Lindbergh's courage, loyalty, and Americanism. I get a picture of three of the breed of Mexican hairless snapping at a St. Bernard.

Some journals implied that Colonel Lindbergh's speech had been ghost written by Nazis and contrasted it with General Pershing's urging that we send part of our Navy—50 destroyers—into this war by the subterfuge of "selling" them.

Is anybody fool enough to think that we can or should dictate to other countries their form of government? I disagree with part of what Colonel Lindbergh said, but the man who denies his right to say it as being un-American convicts himself thereby of an un-American state of mind out-Hitlering Hitler. It is a preview of what to expect from such hands.

There are about four living men in my gallery of living demigods, and one of them is General Pershing—comrade in arms, old commander, personal friend since I was a shavetail. But nobody can tell me that the general wrote that speech. It smells to me of Bill White.

Black Jack at 80 is still one of the world's great soldiers, but he knows as little naval strategy as I. George Eliot unconsciously "obsoleted" his text at the moment of its utterance. However, it may later be dragooned by the apostate Knox. I happen to know that the Navy doesn't agree with General Pershing.

There is a portent and an omen in this concerted New Deal attack on an American hero, even down to Senator SCOTT LUCAS' command radio appearance castigating Colonel Lindbergh, arranged before the colonel spoke.

Do you want to know whether we are going to be pushed into this war? Watch Wendell Willkie. If his progress continues toward the November victory now apparently in sight, we will be in it before the end of September.

I don't accuse the President of meditating any such poison. I accuse him of few of the recent terrible, obvious, and undeniable hypocrisies and betrayals. But I think he has abdicated intellectually to an infinitesimally small adulating group of unelected totalitarian associates who would stop at nothing to perpetuate not him, not any principle except the Nazi principle of personalized power, not anything—but themselves.

Poll-Tax Barricades

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. LEE E. GEYER

LETTER FROM A VIRGINIAN WHO WOULD LIKE TO BECOME HER REPRESENTATIVE'S CONSTITUENT

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a letter from a woman in Norfolk, Va. Her letter is typical of the many I receive from residents of the eight poll-tax States, where American citizens are blocked from participation in Government by the poll-tax barricade.

NORFOLK, VA., July 16, 1940.

Hon. Congressman GEYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our newspaper, the Sunday Virginian-Pilot, recently mentioned your fight to have the nefarious practice of a prerequisite of $1.50 for a poll tax abolished. We know the tax is not legal. The men in office, or running for office, will pay the poll tax of friends so they can vote for these candidates.

Complaints of this abuse have appeared in newspapers from time to time.

We have in the city of Norfolk 160,000 inhabitants. We have only 7,000 voters with poll taxes paid. This poll tax must be paid 6 months in advance. Thousands of people here never have voted. Is this democracy? "Taxation without representation is tyranny." We are under a load of bureaucracy, autocracy. You are right when you say, "No feudal lord was ever more secure behind his stone walls than the Congressmen behind the stone walls of the poll-tax barricade. Even Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin are not more secure in tenure of office."

Now, let me say. What interest do young men have to join the Army and Navy to fight and die for any nation in which they have no part?

I am politically inclined. I have lived in this city 20 years. But we don't vote. It's no use. Citizens have been trying all these years to get the slums cleaned up. We are no nearer accomplishing that than we were 20 years ago. Families who have small incomes or who are on W. P. A. can't pay a poll tax. They might as well live in Siberia, Russia, as complain of conditions.

The poll tax keeps the mighty in office.

Respectfully,

MRS. ELIZABETH SUTHERLAND YOUNG.

London Predicts That the United States Will Enter the War

ARTICLE FROM THE ECONOMIST

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from The Economist for July 6, 1940:

[From the Economist of July 6, 1940]

AMERICA'S ROLE

The anxieties of the free world are concentrated on the coasts of England, where watch is being kept against the new Armada; but the hopes of the world are more and more directed to the outer continents. Our role here in Great Britain is to hold the bastion; for victory we shall need aid from overseas.

The turn of events in the United States has served as an encouragement to hopes that the necessary aid will be forthcoming. The evolution of American public opinion is as exasperatingly slow and illogical to us as our own has so often been to those on the continent of Europe who looked to us for support, rescue, or avenging. We are too quick, in our anxiety, to read a declaration of war into an expression of hatred for the Nazis; too apt to underrate the American's hereditary desire to escape from Europe. But, when all the necessary qualifications are noted, it is still true that such an event as the nomination of Mr. Wendell Willkie as the Republican Party's candidate for the Presidency is at once convincing evidence of the extent to which American opinion has already evolved and a guaranty that it will continue to evolve rapidly during the months immediately ahead.

Judged by the available evidence, Mr. Willkie would make an able and distinguished President. But his historical importance lies less in his possible future virtues as a President than in his actual present character as a candidate. The strong probability is that the next President of the United States will be Franklin Delano Roosevelt; Mr. Willkie's service to humanity—it is a very large one—will be to save the United States from its usual election-year predicament of having no foreign policy. Until very recently, it seemed almost certain that isolationism and intervention would be an issue, perhaps the main issue, of the Presidential campaign. The leading Republican candidates were all more or less isolationist—or at least neutralist—in their outlook. True, the great revulsion of popular feeling after May 10 had led to some entertaining displays of agility; but until the convention met at Philadelphia last week the prospect was that the Republican Party would either oppose Mr. Roosevelt's policy of aid for the democracies or, if it did not have the courage or political obstinacy to come out in formal opposition, that it would snipe at him in detail. Congress supplied an example of the delays and obstructions that such an unavowed but splenetic opposition could create by passing a bill designed to delay and reduce, rather than prevent, the flow of surplus war material to England. The platform adopted by the Republican Convention appeared to confirm this forecast, for, while approving of the principle of aid to countries defending their liberty, it made such aid subject to American defense needs and the requirements of international law—qualifications which, in the hands of an isolationist, could easily be made to nullify the main principle.

The balloting for a Presidential candidate to interpret this ambiguous platform, however, entirely upset the calculations of the trimmers, for it resulted in the nomination of a candidate whose views on foreign policy, if they differ at all from the President's, do so by being more strongly in favor of aid to Great Britain. Moreover, the circumstances of Mr. Willkie's nomination were such that he is under no obligation to any section of the party that would lead him to place any but his own interpretation on the platform. Mr. Willkie is a very remarkable candidate. His nomination has been compared to that of William Jennings Bryan in 1896, and though he was by no means as obscure before the convention as Bryan was, he was nevertheless a very dark horse, with no entry in the political form book. Bryan had at least served a term in Congress (and, incidentally, rehearsed there his famous cross of gold speech); Mr. Willkie has never held any political office, national or local, whether by election or by appointment, and he is still listed in the reference books as a Democrat. What little was publicly known of him might have been thought to have been to his disadvantage as a politician, for he is the head of a great public utility holding company and an outspoken opponent of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the grandiose idealism of whose task has seized the imagination of the public, even if its commercial methods have been condemned by those whom they affect. To have secured the nomination in spite of these disadvantages and in the face of opposition from the party managers, is a triumph of personality and a demonstration of the enthusiasm that can be aroused by Mr. Willkie's political philosophy, which might be called either liberal capitalism or progressive private enterprise. His nomination is not, of course, such a triumph of spontaneous and unorganized popular enthusiasm as it has been made to appear. Though he condemns big business, he is the businessman's candidate, and if he were elected it would be interesting to discover to what extent he could dissociate himself from supporters less progressive than himself.

From the point of view of domestic American politics Mr. Willkie has undoubtedly imported into the campaign a degree of color and popular interest that would not have been there if any of his rivals had been successful. The personality will not all be on one side; it will not this time be a contest of F. D. Roosevelt versus A. N. Other. But from the point of view of world politics (which even the American politician must now concede a primacy of importance) Mr. Willkie's nomination is a guaranty of continuity. Whatever happens in the election, the foreign policy of the United States in the remainder of 1940 and for 4 more years will be based on assistance to Great Britain. Mr. Roosevelt had already taken what precautions he could before the convention opened by nominating to his Cabinet two such eminent Republicans as Mr. Stimson and Colonel Knox—a clear hint that the Republican Party would be split if it turned to isolation. But the precaution has proved to be unnecessary. If the President's foreign policy is criticized at all during the campaign, it will be for not moving far enough and fast enough in support of Britain.

All this, of course, is very much to the good. But we in this country should beware of reading too much into recent events. It was not primarily because of this advocacy of support for Britain that Mr. Willkie was nominated, but because on a combination of personality and domestic policy he seemed the most likely man to beat Mr. Roosevelt. We cannot go further than to say that Mr. Willkie's interventionism did not prevent his success. Moreover, there are severe limitations on interventionism even of the Willkie type. American opinion has followed much the same evolution as British opinion, with a time lag of from 1 to 3 years, and many of the illusions from which we have awakened are still prevalent on the other side of the Atlantic. For example, there is the almost universal qualification that aid must stop "short of war"; that is the delusion that afflicted many here who paid lip service to collective security—the delusion that hostile acts can be taken with limited liability. Or there is the determination of Americans that, even if they are dragged into war, they will not send an army to Europe. That is the equivalent of the British decision to concentrate on a six-division army, the disastrous fruits of which we are still reaping; in its French context, it is the delusion of the Maginot Line.

Clearly, many of the implications of American policy still require to be thought out on the other side of the Atlantic. The basic fact that wars, even nonbelligerent ones, cannot be fought without doing distasteful things has yet to be learned. There is still no sign, for example, that the restrictions of the Neutrality and Johnson Acts are to be removed; until they are, though the American people say that they intend to give us all the material assistance they can send, what they mean is that they intend to sell us all the material assistance we can pay for. These hesitations and inconsistencies will disappear; events can be relied upon to bludgeon them out of existence. As has so often been pointed out in these columns, it is not the direction in which American policy is evolving, or even the goal at which it will arrive, that is in doubt but only the speed with which it is moving. The great gain from last week's events is that we, Britain and America alike, are not now faced with the hideous danger of a 6-month hiatus, during which the underlying unity of purpose might be obscured by the formalities of a rigid constitution. This is what Mr. Willkie has achieved by the mere fact of being nominated. If he and the President between them, while preserving their domestic antipathies, can now give some formal expression to their unity on foreign policy, they will be doing no more than their duty to America and to the cause in which they both believe.

The Poll Tax Again

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK EVENING POST

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, while we are talking these days of giving the people of the District of Columbia the vote, let us not forget those who, because of their economic status, are unable to make their voices heard. I refer to those three and one-half million Negroes and seven million whites in the poll-tax States that are denied the right to vote.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the New York Evening Post.

[From the New York Evening Post of August 1, 1940]

The Geyer poll-tax bill, which would make voting free in the last-remaining poll-tax States of the South, lies buried in Judiciary Committee on Capitol Hill. In 1938, when the last vote for new Congressmen was counted, it was estimated that one Representative from the city of Chicago received 28,000 more votes than all the 32 Congressmen from the eight poll-tax States put together. In a year when democracy has suffered so many set-backs on the battlefields of Europe, Chairman SUMNERS can do the democratic thing by reporting this bill out to Congress. Let the people's representatives say whether the vote shall be restored to thousands of American citizens in the South this November.

Industrial Firms Earn Average Return on Net Worth of 11.4 Percent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. McKEOUGH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

ARTICLE BY ROBERT P. VANDERPOEL, FINANCIAL EDITOR OF THE CHICAGO AMERICAN

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks and include therein an article appearing in the August 5 issue of the Chicago American, written by Mr. Robert P. Vanderpoel, the financial editor of that newspaper, he calls attention to a net profit of 11.4 percent having been reported by 334 leading industrial corporations of the Nation reporting earnings for the first half of 1940.

It is apparent from the exceptional earning power reported by these industrial corporations that no justification is present for the complaint so frequently repeated that the present national administration has seriously handicapped and harassed individual initiative, thus restraining earning power of industry. I think it timely that Mr. Vanderpoel directs attention to the unusual opportunity which these exceptional earnings indicate being present for private capital to find opportunity to engage itself in private profitable enterprise.

I have inserted this article in the RECORD in the hope that the Republican National Committee and all others who have criticized this administration for its interference with business, may have an opportunity to learn from this source, which is not a part of the national administration, just how the administration of the affairs of the National Government, under President Roosevelt, have benefited and not injured industry.

[From the Chicago American of August 5, 1940]

LEADING INDUSTRIAL FIRMS EARNED AN AVERAGE RETURN ON NET WORTH OF 11.4 PERCENT

(By Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor)

Leading industrial corporations of the Nation, totaling 334 in number, the first to report earnings for the first half of 1940, earned an average return on net worth of 11.4 percent. These figures were revealed by the National City Bank of New York in that institution's August monthly bank letter.

The same corporations in the first half of 1939 earned an average net return of 7.2 percent.

While 334 corporations are, of course, but a small segment of American industry, there being about 92,000 manufacturing corporations in the country, net worth as of January 1, 1940, of the 334 companies aggregated $10,705,551,000, which compares with net worth of all manufacturing companies in the Nation of something less than $40,000,000,000.

RANGE TO 22 PERCENT

In other words, the leading corporations covered by this National City Bank survey comprise something more than one-fourth of the total industrial worth of the Nation.

Twenty-four separate classifications are covered by the report, each showing a profit ranging from a low of 5 percent to a high of 22.2 percent.

The poorest showing was made by four firms in the shoe and leather group which earned but 5 percent on net worth.

Seven firms classified as wood products earned 5.5 percent. United States Steel Corporation, given a classification by itself because of its size, also earned 5.5 percent. Other iron and steel makers, totaling 29 in all, earned an average of 6.2 percent. Building equipment manufacturers earned 7.1, baking concerns 7.9, petroleum products 8.5.

GENERAL MOTORS NET HIGH

All other groups earned in excess of 10 percent. General Motors Corporation, also given an individual classification because of its size, earned a net profit of 21.6 percent. Other automobile manufacturers earned 22.2 percent, and producers of automobile accessories netted 20.7. Miscellaneous metal products earned 20 percent. Beverage concerns, which make their best showing in the third quarter of the year, earned 13.6 percent. The chemical and drug industry earned an average of 14.7. Many groups earned around 12 percent.

It should be borne in mind that these earnings are after all charges, including depreciation, interest, taxes, and reserves. Even the increased Federal corporate income tax recently voted by Congress has been deducted before figuring this profit. Some corporations made substantial charges covering possible foreign losses during the quarter. These, too, were deducted before computing the earnings.

COAL MINERS LOST

Corporations falling into classifications other than industrial made somewhat less favorable showings. The coal mining industry continued to operate at a deficit. Metal mining concerns earned an average of 8.7 percent on net worth; other mining, quarrying, etc., 14.6 percent; wholesale and retail trade, 6.6 percent; service and construction, 6.3. Each group showed improvement over a year ago.

These figures once more prove what we have contended in this column for many years—that great profit opportunities exist for American business. With idle capital reaching the greatest aggregate in all time and interest rates tumbling to the lowest levels of all time there should be a rapid flow of capital into productive enterprise as long as such enterprise is able to earn attractive returns on net worth as has been the case for the last 5½ years, with the exception of 1938, when the return was only modest.

AVERAGE RETURNS

We should like to emphasize again that these are average returns of the larger half of industry. While the figures cited cover only slightly more than one-quarter of the industrial net worth, this is simply because the reports as yet are incomplete; there is no reason to believe that the percentages will change greatly as more reports are made public until approximately 1,000 corporations are covered, comprising about one-half of the industrial wealth of the Nation and earning well over one-half of the industrial profits of the country.

They include the efficiently managed as well as the less capably managed concerns, the most thriving industries, as well as those which for one reason or another have experienced difficulties.

The big domestic problem before the United States is why, with the opportunities for profit as great as they have been, does not capital go to work? There are a number of explanations, some psychological and some much more fundamental.

The whole situation may be changed by the defense drive now in progress, but if ever there comes a time when the United States can once more concentrate its attention solely on its domestic problems, intensive study must be given to the failure of capital to flow more freely into profitable enterprise.

Federal Expenditures, Per Capita, in Kansas Have Been Three Times as Great as Internal-Revenue Collections for Period From March 1, 1933, to January 1, 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a comparative table showing internal-revenue collections in Kansas from March 1, 1933, to January 1, 1940, with comparative Federal expenditures in Kansas from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, and a breakdown showing collections and expenditures per capita based on population estimates for July 1, 1937:

Estimated population, 1937	1,864,000
Total revenue collections	$136,625,326
Revenue collections per capita	73.29
Total Federal expenditures	444,106,787
Federal expenditures per capita	238.25
Average for group of Great Plains States (including Kansas):
Revenue collections per capita	95.25
Federal expenditures per capita	213.02
Average for group of Middle Atlantic States:
Revenue collections per capita	350.40
Federal expenditures per capita	157.80

The Indispensable Man

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM HOT SPRINGS (S. DAK.) EVENING STAR

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Hot Springs (S. Dak.) Evening Star for August 6, 1940:

[From the Hot Springs (S. Dak.) Evening Star of August 6, 1940]

THE "INDISPENSABLE MAN"

President Roosevelt allowed himself to be "drafted" at the Democratic Convention at Chicago because he believed that he is the only man in the whole Nation who is capable of guiding America during these turbulent times.

This impression that Mr. Roosevelt is an "indispensable man" was carefully fostered before and during the convention by his friends and was never discouraged by him. He allowed the idea to come to full flower, until today it is the main argument of the new dealers in their attempt to break the third-term tradition.

But like other ambitious men, the President finds that his public remarks of previous years sound strangely at variance with some of his current views. Certainly he did not believe in the "indispensable American" theory in 1932, when he was out to get Mr. Hoover's job.

"This country needs the tonic effect of such a reiteration of American principles," said Candidate Roosevelt at New York on November 3, 1932. "It calls to its service with particular emphasis the independent and courageous spirits who are willing to leave the household of a betrayed faith, who are asking for substance, not shadows, who are seeking for truth, not names for truth.

"In speaking for the common * * * men and women I have, I believe, avoided the delusion that this is a campaign of persons or of personalities. To indulge in such a fantastic idea of my own individual importance would be to betray the common hope and the common cause that have brought us all together this year. A great man left us a watchword which we can well repeat: 'There is no indispensable man.'"

And when Mr. Roosevelt wound up his 1932 campaign at Madison Square Garden, we find him making this studied declaration:

"The genius of America is stronger than any candidate or any party. This campaign, hard as it has been, has not shattered my sense of humor or my sense of proportion. I still know that the fate of America cannot depend on any one man. The greatness of America is grounded on principles and not on any single personality. I, for one, shall remember that, even as President."

If what Mr. Roosevelt said about the "indispensable man" was sound in 1932—and we believe it was—it is sound now. It should be a cardinal principle of democracy that no man is indispensable in any public office.

Should the time ever come when public men become indispensable, then America no longer will be a democracy. It will be as totalitarian as any continental European state.

Money and Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY ROBERT M. HARRISS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting signed article appearing recently in the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial. The article was prepared by Robert M. Harriss and discusses the relationship of money to agriculture and agricultural interests.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial of July 31, 1940]

CONSTRUCTIVE MONETARY MOVE HELD NEEDED BY AGRICULTURE—HARRISS DECLARES DEBT AND TAX STRUCTURE STIFLES RECOVERY IN COTTON, FARMING, AND BUSINESS GENERALLY—SUGGESTS THREE-POINT PROGRAM IN THIS DIRECTION

(By Robert M. Harriss)

In August 1933 I stated in an article written for the Journal of Commerce that there could be no sound recovery in agriculture, commerce, and industry without a constructive monetary program to give our people relief from the then crushing debts and excessive taxes.

During these past 7 years we have failed to adopt such a program and basically conditions have grown worse. Instead we adopted a program of Government borrowing, spending, regimentation, and planned economy. Not in a single year has it been possible to balance the Budget, but on the other hand the Federal debt has more than doubled. Taxes have become so excessive that they now absorb approximately 30 percent of an already impaired national income. Such taxes naturally curtail purchasing power and destroy incentive for capital and business to go forward.

Today I believe it is apparent that sound recovery in the great cotton industry and national recovery are impossible, and basically conditions will continue to grow worse until we adopt a threefold program along the following lines:

THREE-POINT PROGRAM

1. Restore to Congress the greatest economic privilege of all—the right to coin and regulate the value of money—where it belongs, according to the Constitution. This is to be followed by sound monetary program, free of either private or political control, with an expansion of the currency instead of bonds against the more than $20,000,000,000 of sterile or hoarded gold, until the commodity and general price level is restored to where the people can pay their interest, debts, and taxes, and realty mortgages become sound.

At existing price levels it is impossible for the people to pay interest, debts, and taxes. The lower the price level the more difficult and impossible it is to pay the interest, debts, and taxes, and the higher the price level the easier or more possible it is to pay them. Therefore, until the price level is restored, it will be impossible to have national solvency and balance the Budget.

The sterilizing or hoarding of more than $20,000,000,000 of gold, approximately 80 percent of the world's gold, has a deflationary effect not only on our country but the world. The sterilization of this gold has been a large contributing factor in the break-down of world economy and has driven nations to the barter system.

2. There must be a prompt lowering and revision of taxes, including lowering of tariff barriers, with the repeal of certain punitive and uneconomic taxes. However, this will not be practical without a constructive monetary policy to restore the general price level.

3. Businesslike and practical economy in government.

A representative constitutional government cannot support and regiment the people. This can only go with dictatorship or totalitarian states. A constitutional government can only be expected to make fair and equitable laws and enforce them. Therefore, our form of government cannot long endure if the citizens look to the Government to support and take care of them. If our constitutional Government is to endure, the citizens must instead support and take care of their Government.

We have the choice of two roads ahead. One is the road we are traveling—the road of Government borrowing, spending, crop reduction, regimentation, interference and competition with agriculture, industry, labor, business, banking, increasing Government debts, and uneconomic and destructive taxes. The end of this road will lead to inflation, repudiation, and disaster.

The other road is the constitutional road. It will require courage and fortitude to take the constitutional road, because we must have the strength of mind and justice to face and equitably adjust the debt, tax, or money question and adopt a sound constructive economic and financial program. Further delay may mean the loss to us and our children of that wonderful God-given form of constitutional government we inherited from the founding fathers. Therefore, before it is too late, let us unite in this most serious crisis and demand that Congress take the right road—the constitutional road.

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, my colleague, Senator CARTER GLASS is unavoidably absent from the Senate. I am requested by him to ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain newspaper clippings making reference to the Postmaster General of the United States, the Honorable James A. Farley.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD such newspaper clippings.

There being no objection, the clippings were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARLEY RETIRES, FAITHFUL TO THE END TO HIS PARTY—DREAM COME TRUE TOPS CAREER OF SERVICE

(By Walter Trohan)

James Aloysius Farley made his exit from the American political stage last night in a dramatic exhibition of party loyalty, for which his name has become synonymous.

After his name was placed in nomination by his political father, CARTER GLASS, the senior Senator of Virginia, and the convention gave him 72.9 votes, Farley stepped before the convention to move that the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the man he twice elected to the Presidency, be nominated for a third term.

In the greatest moment of 28 years of political life, Farley received a thunderous ovation from the convention when he was announced at the end of the balloting.

READS HIS SWAN SONG

Grinning broadly, he motioned the delegates to take their seats and began reading a statement which he prepared as State after State piled up the vote which shattered American political precedent against a third term.

He began by stating that the convention twice had given him the highest honor in its gift—the chairmanship of the Democratic Party—and he was now appearing before that body to ask a courtesy.

"I have pursued a course that has been dictated by the deepest conviction, and when a man fails to follow his convictions he is false to himself, false to his party, and false to his country," he solemnly declared.

"I wanted this convention to proceed as a democratic body should proceed to nominate its standard bearers in keeping with the highest traditions of the Democratic Party. That is the democratic method and that has been observed.

PAYS TRIBUTE TO GLASS

"My name was placed in nomination by a great and noble American. As long as I live I shall be grateful to Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia.

"I am grateful to those delegates of this great convention who voted for me and those who would have done so had they not otherwise been pledged.

"Down through the years I have always been giving my best efforts to the Democratic Party. I want this convention to know I will continue to give that same effort to my party.

"Therefore I move suspension of the rules to declare President Franklin Delano Roosevelt nominated by acclamation."

DELEGATES CHEER HIM

This example of party devotion, which climaxed the realization of a dream of 28 years—to have his name submitted for the Presidency—and a firm conviction against the breaking of the third-term tradition, provoked a demonstration from the convention.

Officers of the convention wrung Farley's hand. In tribute to the leader who was making his exit from the American political scene, a tenor sang When Irish Eyes Are Smiling, the theme song of the Farley Presidential boomers.

Farley turned away from the speaker's stand and made his way to his chair the biggest man of the convention equal to the biggest moment of his life. He fought his fight against the third term, and when his party turned him down he bowed to the will of his party and in a magnificent gesture moved to make the third term the unanimous sentiment of the convention.

CHERISHED PRESIDENTIAL HOPE

From the day he entered political life as clerk of his Republican home town at Stony Point, N. Y., Farley had cherished the hope that he might some day be considered Presidential timber.

At the moment he realized that ambition he well knew that he had no hope of securing his party's nomination, but his cup of joy was none the less full, for he had achieved what he considered a fitting climax to his political career.

And he had carried his objective over the combined opposition of both President Roosevelt and a man whom he had saved from a New Deal purge, Mayor Edward J. Kelly, of Chicago.

In 1932 Farley's green-ink letters and drummer canvass of the county won the nomination for Mr. Roosevelt. In 1936 Farley's political salesmanship brought his chief the greatest endorsement the Nation has given a Presidential candidate in more than a century.

RECALL AID TO KELLY

Three years ago Farley persuaded his chief not to heed the advice of Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, a Republican turned new dealer, who urged the President to purge Kelly as the administration had disowned Tammany Hall, in New York City. Last night the man Farley saved was whooping it up for the third term, which Farley could not stomach.

But the few moments of triumph when he was put in nomination last night repaid Farley for the many heartaches ingratitude has brought him since 1936. There was a song in his heart.

"I am truly grateful," he said. "It is the greatest moment of my life. I consider it a high honor to have my name presented, and particularly by such a distinguished American as my old friend CARTER GLASS. It's great to be an American."

TOMORROW: HIS FINALE

Farley will complete his exit from the political stage tomorrow when the Democratic National Committee names his successor. He will retain his post as New York State Democratic chairman just to keep a hand in at the political table rather than to play the game.

The Postmaster General and party chieftain was born at Grassy Point, N. Y., May 30, 1888, of Irish parents. His father died as a result of an accident when Jim, as he is know to hundreds of thousands of Americans, was a youngster.

In his early teens financial circumstances forced his mother to permit him to tend bar in the combination grocery and saloon she operated to keep her family together. Before she would permit him to serve Rockland County neighbors she made him promise that he would not drink or smoke.

TAPERS OFF ON GUM

At the age of 52 he has never tasted alcohol nor tobacco. In the last year he has striven to give up the chewing-gum habit, which displeases his wife.

In 1920 he married Miss Elizabeth A. Finnegan, who has been admiring his convention performance from a box in the stadium. She is also a Hudson Valley native and of Irish descent. They have three children—two girls, Elizabeth and Ann, who have been on the platform with their father, and one son, James A., Jr., the baby of the family, who is at a summer camp.

As a tall, rangy youngster Jim played first base on the town ball team. This brought the early popularity which led county political leaders to place him on the ticket for town clerk of Stony Point in 1912. He held the office until 1919.

In the meantime he entered the cement business as a salesman, and he will tell you he was the world's best cement salesman when he quit in 1933 to enter the Roosevelt Cabinet after managing the Democratic campaign as party chairman.

In the years between Stony Point and Washington Farley served in the New York Legislature, held the political sinecure of port warden in New York, and was chairman of the New York State Athletic Commission under Gov. Alfred E. Smith.

He and Franklin D. Roosevelt had met only once before the latter became Governor of New York and was recognized as a Presidential possibility. Once acquaintance was made, it flourished, and Farley worked untiringly to make Roosevelt the leading contender for the nomination at Chicago in 1932. He inspired the deal with Texas and California which made that nomination a reality.

Farley has a tremendous capacity for work. He maintains a huge correspondence, spends hours on the phone, and finds time to see all callers while working at a schedule which would break down most men.

In 1936 Farley rolled up his shirt sleeves and by his personal drive he carried 46 of the 48 States for Roosevelt. For this unparalleled campaigning he received public thanks from his Chief on election night, 1936.

FORGOTTEN BY HIS BOSS

After election night Mr. Roosevelt forgot the man who had made him President and who is acknowledged to be the political master of the day. Farley was not consulted in the fight to pack the Supreme Court, because he was known to be out of sympathy with it. Consequently he was not called on to direct the purge of the Senators who defeated that plan.

Jim advised his chief to forget that lost battle and seek to reestablish party harmony. Mr. Roosevelt ignored that advice and put the political campaign in the hands of Secretary of Commerce Harry Hopkins, a social worker, and Thomas G. Corcoran and Ben Cohen, White House lobbyists.

When this strategy board lost the purge campaign in every State Mr. Roosevelt secretly blamed Farley for its failure, although Farley had told him it had no chance of success.

A BREAK DEVELOPS

From this coolness developed a break, although neither Roosevelt nor Farley would acknowledge it when Farley showed himself indisposed to lead the Roosevelt drive for a third term.

Farley went about the country "selling stamps," as he put it, but the White House was confident he was selling himself for the Presidential nomination. The White House, however, could not openly break with Farley because he did nothing but praise the New Deal and its chief in his addresses.

Never in those days did the President give Farley any hint of his third-term plans and never did Farley ask for them.

Not until the day before Farley left for Chicago to direct convention preliminaries did Mr. Roosevelt confide his secret to Farley's ears. In the President's boyhood home at Hyde Park, N. Y., Farley learned that Mr. Roosevelt would make no move to secure the nomination but would accept a draft.

After Farley came to Chicago he learned that Mr. Roosevelt had set up a strategy board consisting of Hopkins, Senator James F. Byrnes (Democrat, South Carolina), and Frank Walker, who financed the 1932 preconvention campaign, to conduct the draft movement. Farley found the President did not regard this as lifting his hand for the nomination.

With outward urbanity but inward irritation, Farley watched this group put the heat on his friends among the delegates, and in particular on the Massachusetts delegation, which was pledged to him.

He made no attempts at retaliation. In his frequent contacts with the press he preserved his high good humor, and even in his contacts with the opposition groups he showed no rancor.

WORKS AGAINST STAMPEDE

He bent his efforts toward heading off a stampede for Roosevelt which would prevent his own name from being offered, a distinction which the administration begrudged him.

Farley balked a New Deal plan to persuade GLASS not to nominate him. He balked new efforts to halt all nominations and allow no name but Roosevelt's to be voted upon.

And when the triumph of having his name put in nomination last night was his, Farley did not gloat. Nor does he intend to "take a walk" in the campaign, although he will no longer be chairman.

He will show his successor the ropes and make speeches for the Democratic ticket.

[From the Bangor Daily News of July 19, 1940]

SMILING JIM

A lot of people, in and out of the Democratic Party, are wishing today that James Aloysius Farley could have become the No. 1 man on the Democratic ticket as he surely became the No. 1 man in the affections of all who have watched him play his saga of friendship and loyalty to the bitter end at Chicago this week.

There is no President maker in our history quite like this American Warwick. The legend of Mark Hanna is kept alive by his daughter, who wields some of his wizardry today, but whoever seriously thought of him as anything more than the cleverest politician of his time? Who, including himself, ever mentioned him for the Presidency to which he had unerringly guided his fellow Ohioan, William McKinley?

Yet Farley was the outstanding independent candidate—in itself that word "independent" for the two-term chairman of the Democratic National Committee speaks volubly—before the convention, other than the President himself. Farley had the largest votes next to the President, a very poor second, indeed, but in the hands of anyone less scrupulous a very substantial spring board from which to go to the top.

All our trained observers at the convention are unanimous in their belief, that the convention was ready for anything due to the bungling of the third-term zealots. The inference is pretty plain that if Farley were wholly free in his own conscience to make the kind of fight for himself that he made for the President in 1932, there would have been no question but what he could have had the nomination. It took manhood of an extraordinary character for him to keep his hands tied while he could have had his life's ambition simply by reaching out for it. We could all feel safe with such a man at the helm.

CHIEF VICTIM

Jim Farley isn't coming out of this convention with anything special except some more experience—unless you count the increased respect and admiration which a lot of people have conceived for him since the party clans started rallying.

Farley has been the chief victim of the adroit game by which President Roosevelt killed off all rival candidacies for the nomination. Farley had ambitions of his own—but instead of getting a run for his money, he had to go out to Chicago and take charge of the ceremonies at which the ashes of his ambitions were quietly laid to rest. And it never knocked the smile off his face.

Not once during all the conferences, meetings, and public appearances which kept him busy before and during the convention, did Farley, by word or action, betray resentment at the way his chief had used him. He wasn't happy—you didn't need to know him very well to see that—but he didn't whimper, he didn't sulk, and he stayed loyal.

All of which is really worth noticing, because the general public has somehow got a distorted picture of Jim Farley, and it ought to be corrected.

Farley is supposed to be just a politician, with the accent on the word just. He happens to be a lot more than that, and that he never got credit for it is pretty much the fault of the inner circle new dealers. All through the Roosevelt administration, whenever principles had to be compromised for political expediency, Farley was the whipping boy—the guy they blamed it on. He always took the rap—and down the years he took quite a few bum ones.

As a matter of fact, for principles, honesty and general all-round decency Farley will stand comparison with anyone in the Cabinet. And as for his awareness of social and economic problems, and his ability to approach them intelligently—well, on the eve of the convention one of the most prominent and nonpolitical of the New Deal's economic general staff confided that he would be perfectly content to see Jim Farley in the White House.

DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

Farley's uncomfortable situation at the opening of the convention was aggravated by the clumsiness with which the new dealers played their hand. Farley knew that a huge majority of delegates were ready to vote a third-term nomination, and he wasn't prepared to buck; all he asked was that things take their regular order, with the names of other candidates (himself included) being put before the convention to get such votes as might be available. Yet the new dealers continued to work for a nomination by acclamation, despite the plain warnings that that would mean a fight.

To cap it all, the new dealers reversed their field abruptly on the matter of naming a national chairman. At first they had done everything in their power to get Farley out; then, about the time the convention opened, they began to realize that they needed him, and—having got him to the point where he wanted to resign—they did all they could to get him to stay.

It all added up to a bad situation for the party and for Farley personally. It would have been a great deal worse, especially for the party, if Farley hadn't been able to meet it with a good deal of real sportsmanship. No whit of his deep hurt was in his words or voice as he stepped to the microphone and testified to his abiding faith in the Democratic process. It was his desire to see it work out in orderly fashion which compelled him to let his name go before the delegates. With the vote all in he acknowledged defeat, pledged his support to the winner, and called for the nomination of the President by acclamation.

Jim Farley will go down in American political history as the man who wouldn't snatch the crown from a friend who had all but disowned him.

JIM FARLEY'S POPULARITY

There is much more sincere regret among the rank and file Democrats of the country because Jim Farley, Postmaster General and national chairman, is resigning from his position as leader of the party than there would have been if President Roosevelt had decided he would not stand for reelection.

Jim Farley, by his nature, has always been closer to the people and even though he had to be content to step aside for other presidential counselors after he had accomplished the task of electing his friend to the highest office in the Nation he retained the confidence, admiration, respect, and love of the hundreds of thousands who knew him either personally or through his frequent public appearances and utterances.

Few American statesmen have ever been paid greater tribute even in eloquent obituary addresses than was paid Jim Farley in the Presidential nominating address delivered before the convention by the distinguished Senator CARTER GLASS. And few men in history, regardless of the nature of their service to humanity, have lived to read as many and as laudatory comments about themselves as have appeared during the past week about Jim Farley in thousands of editorials in newspapers of all political preferences.

The respect for Jim Farley's ability, fairness, honesty, and loyalty to his friends knows no political party boundaries.

Those who have had dealings with him know there is no secret to his popularity.

Any one of them would declare immediately if asked about his power for obtaining the highest cooperation: "He is such a square-shooter; such a regular fellow; and he never goes back on his word."

Aside from the help of those splendid qualities, he relied upon a love for his work to become the master political leader of his time.

In announcing plans to retire from public life and establish his personal fortune, he said: "I have remained in public life at great financial sacrifices because I love politics."

The same qualities that made him the "miracle man" of 1932 and 1936 will assure success in his new business interests—success that may permit him some day to return to politics.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY LOSES SERVICES OF ONE OF THE GREATEST NATIONAL CHAIRMAN THEY HAVE EVER HAD

With James A. Farley, Democratic national chairman and Postmaster General, passing out of the national political picture, it must be admitted that the Democratic Party has suffered a severe loss, but the Democrats are thankful that they can still retain the leadership of "Smiling Jim" in Democratic State affairs. He remains as the chairman of the Democratic State committee.

It was Mr. Farley whom President Roosevelt selected as State chairman when he ran for Governor of the State of New York the first time. Then, later, when he was elevated to the candidacy for the highest honor in the Nation, he again chose Mr. Farley as national chairman, and it was Mr. Farley who guided both of the President's last two campaigns to victory. What the loss of his services will mean in the coming campaign, of course, remains to be seen, but Democrats admit that the loss of his services as national chairman is a blow to the workers within the ranks who have come to know Jim so well.

He has been one of the greatest systematic organizers that ever entered politics, and the Republican Party has often wished that they had a man like him, so capable and competent. His successor will be chosen by a committee selected by a committee of five, who will recommend to President Roosevelt, who will then pick his successor on August 1.

It is known to all that Mr. Farley was opposed to a third term. The final meeting of the national committee was held in Chicago, when Mr. Farley tendered his resignation. The session was packed with emotion when the departing Jim bade farewell to his loyal captains. As he himself expressed it, he looked into a sea of faces when he was saying good-bye. He said he accepted the action of the convention and pledged his support to the national ticket.

All predict among his thousands of friends that he will go down in history as a great statesman in national political affairs. He remained true blue to the end to his superior, the President. Whatever his thoughts are, they are kept to himself, as he betrayed no confidences, but his many friends know that he had been on the outs with the President for some little time. We still say that if Mr. Farley had wanted to go out among the delegates in that convention to put pressure on them, he would have received a greater vote and perhaps might have been successful as a candidate. He knew, however, that many were pledged, and he was too big a man to ask them to break that pledge. He said he had a conviction and carried it through. Then he stepped down.

Whatever his future may be, he carries with him the wishes of thousands of friends for success in whatever undertaking he may assume, and still remains as one of the most popular men that ever entered Democratic politics.

FARLEY QUITS

James A. Farley announces that after August 17 he will retire to private life, resigning both his Cabinet job of Postmaster General and chairmanship of the National Democratic Committee to which he was reelected unanimously at Chicago. Thus will come the final parting of the ways of the President and the man most responsible for his political career. Such a break has been common enough in political history, but this one may be more shattering than any of the others since Farley has been so much more of a partner than subordinate of the President and as such has enjoyed such complete confidence of his party. Without the genial Jim the political scene at Washington will never be quite the same for Democrats again.

Farley suffered the fate of all who interfered with the "draft" of the President for a third term. When he refused to go along in that he was pushed aside as ruthlessly as any potential candidate of any strength and became only a figurehead chairman. Management of the convention at Chicago was taken out of his hands by the "drafters" as was obvious in the results. What little Farley did assert himself prevented a rout becoming a party disaster. He would not permit his beloved old party to be entirely destroyed by the amateurs, although he could not prevent it being grievously hurt.

Now, all the Democrats can expect from Farley is his straight vote which they have always had. With a mess on their hands that baffles them, they hated to see him go and would have kept him if they could but that was more than even the genial temperament and loyalty of Farley could stand. Having been permitted no voice in shaping the campaign, he did not intend to run it as it had been started.

Loyal as he has always been to his party, Farley proves even more loyal to his country. Opposed to a third term for any President as a dangerous weakening of our democracy, he did all he could to persuade the President against it and when he failed stuck to his conviction and let the President go along without him. Farley probably knows how this country thinks politically as well as any man ever did and can judge all reactions accurately. When he opposed a third term he was representing far more than his own sentiments, as his successor may learn to his sorrow. For this he may have a bright spot in American history.

FARLEY IS LOYAL TO THE PARTY TICKET

It was a matter of sincere regret when the Democratic National Committee organized at the close of the party convention in Chicago that James A. Farley could not accept unanimous approval and continue as the chief executive of this important party organization.

Mr. Farley has rendered 8 years of remarkably effective service. There is realization that it will be difficult to find another party leader who can guide the committee through a national campaign with equal ability and effectiveness. When Mr. Farley assumed this leadership, the Democratic National Committee was carrying an indebtedness of a large sum of money. That was all cleared away. There was a substantial amount in the treasury at the close of this recent Chicago convention.

There was no more genuine approval expressed at Chicago than that accorded his leadership. Committee resolutions from the whole country, and from the Western States in particular, were presented in highest praise for remarkable work through an 8-year period.

From news reports over the country there has been considerable erroneous comment as to the attitude of Mr. Farley.

A number of Republican papers have endeavored to persuade their readers that Mr. Farley will be less loyal to the Democratic Party than he has been heretofore. This prejudiced comment cannot long survive. His own statement issued at Chicago at the time the national committee was organized puts aside any impression of this sort. The text of his statement is as follows:

"Eight years ago in this city I was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee. In the intervening years I have had the happiest associations with Democrats all over the country and my debt to the party can never be repaid.

"I have remained in public life at great financial sacrifice because I love politics. I have an opportunity now to accept an attractive offer in business and in justice to my family, because of my financial situation, I am going to accept.

"Before leaving, I shall cooperate to the fullest extent with my successor as national chairman in setting up the machinery for the coming campaign. I have said repeatedly that the American people want the Democratic Party to remain in power. My opinion has not changed, and again I pledge my full support to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket."

The statement of Mr. Farley is the best evidence of what he intends to do. Anyone who had the privilege of talking to him at Chicago will not have the slightest doubt about what he will be doing in the approaching campaign.

CAN THEY DO WITHOUT JIM?

During the latter days of the speak-easy era Jimmy Durante, of the headlight nose and the buzz-saw voice, used to rasp his way through a tin-pan alley chanson immodestly called I Kin Do Wid-out Broadway, But Kin Broadway Do Wid-out Me?

A parody is in order to commemorate the resignation of Jim Farley as Democratic national chairman. Farley can do without the New Deal, but can the New Deal do without Farley? It is a question Democrats will not fail to place high up on the list along with other such vital matters as: "How deep is anti-third-term sentiment?" "Can the spirit of '32 and '36 be recaptured?" and "How strong is Willkie?"

The pushing around Big Jim received at Chicago has been adequately reported. Not even the tributes paid the big, bald chairman by the President and by Mrs. Roosevelt—both of which sounded more like belated afterthoughts than like heartfelt expressions—could wipe out the impression left in delegates' minds that Farley was being eased out none too gently. The question also remains as to how much of the New Deal's genius for putting electoral votes "in the bag" departs with Farley.

Not even Farley can tell. The answer is wrapped up in Big Jim's astounding memory for names, his unfailing bonhomie with party little wigs in nearly every metropolis and bulge in the road in 48 States, his green-ink signature on thousands of "personal" letters. Not until after November will the loss of Farley be capable of measurement. The only certainty is that it will not be small.

FARLEY'S RESIGNATION TAKES GREAT FIGURE FROM POLITICS—TIMES EDITOR TRACES CAREER OF POSTMASTER GENERAL IN THIS STATE—FRIENDLY TOWARD ALL—DELEGATE PREDICTS RETURN OF FARLEY TO THE NATIONAL SCENE IN FUTURE

James A. Farley, who has become so well and widely known throughout the Nation, on August 17 will be giving up the reins of national chairman of the Democratic Party. All Democratic workers who have come in contact with this great national figure and who have come to know him intimately seem sad today over the thought that they will not have him as their leader, adviser, and friend in the campaign ahead. However, they are still very grateful to know he will remain as chairman of the Democratic State committee.

The writer first became acquainted with Mr. Farley in a fraternal way. It will be recalled the Postmaster General took a prominent part in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He became president of the State association at the time the writer was exalted ruler of the Batavia Lodge. I never knew or asked about Jim Farley's politics. Neither did he ask me as we became stanch friends. At once I was able to observe that he was a man who was very thorough in any work he undertook and that he had a way of doing things that spelled success in his undertakings. This quality made him a great leader in fraternal work.

I met him again after being elected a Democratic State committeeman in Genesee County. I will recall the first State convention I attended when Mr. Farley was secretary of the Democratic State Committee. It was the first time that either of us knew the other's politics. We then worked together until President Roosevelt ran for Governor of New York State the first time.

At the convention in Syracuse Mr. Roosevelt was named. The first thing he did was to select Mr. Farley as State chairman to guide his campaign, which turned out to be another of Mr. Farley's outstanding successes. Before he left Syracuse he asked me if I would not further assist him up-State and take on the chairmanship of Genesee County. I accepted, and from that day on I have had the real pleasure to work with Jim and to learn all about him. He is one of the greatest leaders I have ever known and a man among men always.

While it has been pretty hard sledding in Genesee County to change votes, still we have made inroads, politically speaking, and one that wants to work for the cause of Democracy could not help but have the feeling that he was working for a great leader, an honest man whose word could always be relied upon. I can say he never made a promise he did not keep and when he became a greater man and entered national politics he never forgot those who had worked with him before. He always knew everyone he met, no matter if it was long afterward. This was borne out at the national convention just closed in Chicago. He invited the writer to attend his press conferences, held each morning, where prominent newspapermen representing some of the largest publications throughout the United States gathered. I got a great kick out of attending these sessions and listening to the questions tossed at him. He had an answer for every one and it was given in a courteous way no matter how silly the question might sound.

They all gathered about and stood around while Mr. Farley was seated at a desk. Once while he was answering their questions he happened to look my way and said, "Good morning, Al. I am sorry I did not see you when I came in the room." That is the way he knows people.

One of the foolish questions asked by a reporter was "about that Massachusetts 14 to 15 vote." "What do you think about that fellow?" the reporter asked, and as quick as lightning Farley pointed his finger and said, "I am going to write that fellow a letter and thank him."

One reporter asked him if he would like to know who the 25 delegates were that voted for him in the New York delegation, and he replied:

"I do not want to know. I never want to know because I know they were my friends just the same. You might be interested to know, gentlemen, that many of the delegates who could not vote for me came to my room yesterday afternoon with tears in their eyes. They were honest men and they told me why they could not vote for me. I appreciated that even more than if they had been able to vote for me."

If time and space would permit, I could go on and enumerate any number of things like that, that were of real human interest, all of which would go to show and bear out the greatness of Farley.

It was known that the New York State delegation was divided and I understand that it was Farley's idea to call the New York State delegation together prior to the evening sessions, while there was a chance of polling the delegates. We were called at 5 o'clock and no one but accredited delegates was allowed to enter the room. Gov. Herbert H. Lehman presided at the session, stating that he wanted to handle the New York State votes so that none of the delegates would be embarrassed. Later a committee of 10 was appointed to canvass the delegation before the evening session to make their choice known and this plan was followed. When the New York delegation was called, Governor Lehman, the floor leader, announced 25 votes for Mr. Farley, 64 votes for President Roosevelt, and several others which were scattered. Immediately the slip of paper on which they were written was destroyed.

This further shows the greatness of Jim Farley. He knew that many of these delegates might be holding some political position or might be seeking something from the administration and he would not have them embarrassed.

When I first became county chairman and would go to New York, I would find in Mr. Farley's office a complete file of Genesee County, with the name of every Democratic committeeman and of every Democratic election inspector. The names of the candidates that were running and the town tickets in Genesee County were also included in the file.

Following an election in any town, a letter would arrive from Mr. Farley, asking if any Democrats were elected. If any were, he requested their names and they would receive a personal letter from him congratulating them on the run they made. If they lost, they would receive a letter thanking them for the effort they put forth, with a wish that the next time they might be successful.

Now, this is the system Mr. Farley practiced, and he was able to keep his finger on the button at all times. There was nothing so small that he would not take notice, and it was this plan he followed in organizing his workers. He carried this system into national politics, and no doubt a great measure of the success he attained as a great leader came through his keeping in close touch with every individual.

When the writer was elected county chairman Mr. Farley put himself out to come from New York to Batavia to lend his presence at a big dinner meeting, which was attended by over 300. When in 1934 the Democrats tendered me such a rousing birthday party at St. Anthony's Community Center, with about 800 people present, Mr. Farley was unable to come himself and he sent Vincent Dailey, his confidential aide, all the way from New York to be present at the event.

I have mentioned a few of my personal reminiscences of a man who has been one of the truest friends I have ever had, and, though I may be what you might call "small fry" in politics, I was never forgotten. When success came to the Democratic Party I was never forgotten in requests that I made for appointments of some of our Democratic people. In fact, today there are 8 or 10 people working in various departments in Washington, where I have asked for a favor and the appointment was granted.

I have on my desk a copy of Mr. Farley's book, Behind the Ballots, and I prize it greatly. It is personally inscribed with his famous green-ink pen, as follows:

"To Albert F. Kleps, Sr., with every good wish to Al Kleps, one of the best friends I have ever known—a real fellow.

"(Signed) JAMES A. FARLEY."

It is needless to say that I will always retain it and prize it.

I do not mean from what I have written here that this is a swan song for Jim Farley, because I still glory in the thought that he will remain as the head of New York State Democratic politics and that another day may come when Jim will return to the front in national affairs.

[From the Baton Rouge (La.) Advocate of July 23, 1940]

MR. FARLEY STEPS DOWN

Mr. Farley steps down as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and makes his bow out of public life at a moment when his action is beheld with sincere regret by many members of his party and when his particular powers will be poignantly missed in the Democratic fold. His unique talents enhanced two highly satisfactory campaigns for Mr. Roosevelt, and his peculiar knowledge of the technique of conducting a political tour de force may be sorely missed before the coming race is over.

Loyal to the last, Mr. Farley ended his political career with a full and fond endorsement of his friends, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wallace. But something makes us wonder whether or not the course of events in Chicago was just a little too much for him. The course of the New Deal third-term bandwagon must have left Mr. Farley and his powers of political persuasion feeling just a bit out of things and alone. Mr. Farley's democracy is equal to a good stiff fight, but Chicago left it standing around without anything to fight for. The streamlined success of the New Deal's bright young men in engineering a third-term acclamation must have made Mr. Farley feel that his old-school Democratic tactics belonged to a different era. Those administration "insiders" who had Mr. Roosevelt nominated before anyone knew whether he would run again or not did not even bother about Mr. Farley's preconvention knowledge of the "third-term riddle," which proved to be no riddle at all.

These things and others, unless we are mistaken, must have left Jim Farley amazed, even though he had the drift of things long before the convention met. Probably there is a party element which is happy to have Mr. Farley out of the way, and perhaps it is that same element which set in motion the mechanics of the third-term nomination. On the other hand, there are those who would be pleased by more Farleys and fewer bright young new dealers on the Democratic bandwagon.

FAITHFUL FRIEND

Whatever the outcome of the Democratic convention, it will be conceded that Jim Farley has been a good friend to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Also, he has proven himself a loyal party leader. Whether he continues as chairman, his past service has been generously given, and perhaps few men could have carried the party burden so capably, and with such unfailing good humor.

His role has not been easy. Behind his friendly countenance and his affable manner, he has perhaps puzzled over many a situation not relating to his own Post Office Department. He has cheerfully shouldered blame, or disposed of criticism with a smile. One of his hardest jobs, perhaps, has been to close rifts within the ranks; and if he has not always succeeded, he has at least mitigated the stings in party friction as best he could.

Jim Farley's friendship with Mr. Roosevelt dates back over 20 years, and he has been unwavering in his loyalty to "the boss."

His own aspirations have been well known, of course. Regardless of any third-term issue, it is a matter of conjecture as to whether he might have been a serious contender for the nomination. But at least he, as others, has awaited word from the White House, though later he permitted his name to go before the Massachusetts voters.

In Chicago prior to the convention's opening, he carried the secret of Mr. Roosevelt's plans. If he was in no great hurry to withdraw his own name, that was his own affair, and could signify no lapse of loyalty. In fact, he gave glowing praise to the Roosevelt administration. But he insisted that convention procedure be as usual, and that nominating proceed regularly.

A quick thinker, Mr. Farley showed himself a match in those preconvention hours for turning aside the thousand and one questions put to him by reporters. His sense of humor came to his aid when one finally asked him, "Do you know what is happening?" and he gave a big laugh as he replied, "Sometimes."

Whether Mr. Farley continues in the political picture, or turns to the management of a major league baseball team, it will be conceded that he has been an energetic and faithful chairman for the Democratic Party. His loyal support has been of great help to Mr. Roosevelt. Should the latter be nominated, he would miss the help of the genial Jim, if Mr. Farley decides to resign the chairmanship.

[From the Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News of July 21, 1940]

"A Good Name Is Rather * * *"

Mr. James Farley quits active politics for baseball. It is an historical fact, plainly writ in the records, that Mr. Farley has been a very active part of active politics. There are many gentlemen now dwelling on the melancholy side of politics who wish he hadn't been so active.

His separation from politics to go into business for himself in the management of the New York Yankees ball club, has been subject of much discussion. It has produced a great deal of sympathetic comment. There has been a considerable feeling that Mr. Farley has been victimized by ingratitude.

However this may be, decision upon it, and equally the doing of anything about it if it requires that anything be done—may be left to those whose concern and business it more directly is. The rest of us can take a less emotional look at the matter.

And that look reveals that Mr. Farley takes with him something that is pretty fine for a man to have, whatever business he engages in.

That is a good name—a reputation for squareness, reliability, sportsmanship and moral uprightness and sincerity which no one questions, not even his political opponents.

There is a very large element of opinion which—some of it devoutly wishing that Mr. Farley had quit politics long ago or else had been less keen at it than he was—joins in the salutation and admonition which Riley's Hoosier farmer gave to the son: "Goodbye, Jim; take keer of yourself."

[From the Binghamton (N. Y.) Press of July 11, 1940]

In neighboring Owego there once lived a wise, experienced and altogether able and honorable gentleman of the old school named Thomas Platt. Over the years he developed a political philosophy, fragments of which have long been recognized as particularly pertinent to American affairs.

Tom Platt thought, among other things, that nothing could be worse than political ingratitude. In it he discerned the seeds of dissolution and decay of political systems. Not that he, or anyone with sense, would expect the public to be grateful to public servants. When he spoke of political ingratitude he was particularly concerned with the relationships between parties and members of parties—between individuals and individuals; between organizations and members of organizations.

All that Tom Platt, as a Republican, used to say on that subject must have some striking force in the reflections of James Aloysius Farley, Democrat, undoubtedly the greatest political organizer of our times, as he contemplates the approaching Democratic Convention at Chicago.

Those who fought the fight with him in 1932 when the Democratic Party was wrested from the Raskob-Shouse-Smith control that had taken it over in the 1928 campaign, are reported by early-bird correspondents present on the convention scene as "glum and sour."

They remember who it was that went out to the country in 1931 and lined up a lasting bloc of Roosevelt delegates under the very noses of the "stop Roosevelt" leaders. They remember who it was that drew the water and carried the wood in the preconvention campaign and in the long days and nights at Chicago before Jim Farley finally swung the deal that took over the Garner delegations from California and Texas to clinch the Roosevelt nomination.

They remember, too, who it was that revivified the rusted Democratic national organization for the victorious campaign which followed; they know who it was that knew the score every minute in that campaign.

And they haven't forgotten who it was that served as whipping boy for the Roosevelt administration when the fallacies of the New Deal became apparent to the American press, until the uncomplaining good sportsmanship of Jim Farley made the critics of the New Deal think twice and then put the whip down where it belonged—on other shoulders.

None knows better than some of those veterans do how desperately in the past few years Jim Farley has tried to maintain the integrity of the conservative Democratic Party against borings from within by new dealers who know nothing and care nothing of the sound political work that had to be done to make New Deal pay rolls possible.

And none knows better than these do how patient and loyal and obedient and cheerful Jim Farley has been in those past few hard years when the fair-haired hosannah boys at Washington tried to push him around. They have wondered at that patience and good nature. They knew that he could not even contemplate the word "ingratitude" in connection with the man he has served so well—the man he calls "the boss."

These men know James A. Farley as an individual who, regardless of his place in the sun, regardless of political power or crush of work, has always had the time to be courteous and fair and honest with his fellow men, with never a trace of an enlarged hatband.

And they know him as the one individual in the Democratic Party who might possibly hold its factionalisms and its disgruntlements together through a third-term campaign.

Some of them have read the short story written by another great Democrat, Col. Frederick Stuart Greene, now dead, who used to admire Jim a great deal. The story won national honors one year. It is called The Cat of the Cane Brakes.

It tells a tale of cruel ingratitude. In the last few words of it the woman who was ungrateful stepped on the fangs of a dead snake—and there was poison enough left in the fangs to kill her, quite horribly.

The Better Game

"Someone else is controlling this convention's activities from here on out," Jim Farley is quoted as having said at Chicago. And he meant it, and in meaning it he dealt the forces that be within the New Deal a staggering blow, for the only flair for doing things some of the chief stooges have is in mismanagement. Oh, they wanted him to remain, all right, but only as a work horse, a behind-the-scenes worker while they bowed and scraped and smiled and took the credit. But Jim was smart and in effect said "Here it is, it's yours; let's see what you do with it."

It will not be too long before Farley is at the head of the Yankee baseball empire, and that brings him pretty close to home, for the Triplets are part and parcel of the organization. He is slated to take over the entire holdings from the Ruppert family within 2 months' time. They include the Yankees; Newark Bears, of the International League; Kansas City Blues, of the American Association; Norfolk, of the Piedmont League; Akron, of the Mid-Atlantic League; and Easton, Md., of the Eastern Shore League, with no end of working agreements. He will be far happier, this old first baseman.

In baseball a honeyed smile, albeit a false one, doesn't get base hits. It reminds that two seasons ago Jim Farley entered Johnson Field with former Judge Dave Lee to witness a baseball game. The wonder is whether the Postmaster General at that time visioned that one day he would head this team as well as the others. At any rate he acted quite differently and humanly from what one might expect—based upon past experience anyhow—from one in his high position in Government. Unobtrusively he sat six rows up among the common people in the grandstand. He bit on the end of a score card as Dave leaned over and gave him an earful. It might have been politics, and then again Dave might have been telling about a certain play, for he, too, did some fancy tossing in his youth out Norwich way. Just two small-town boys grown to man's estate and a pretty fair job done by each.

Then Jim leaned over and whispered in Dave's ear. Dave has long since relinquished the reins of leadership in the tier. He has returned to law practice in Norwich. Could it be that his stanch friend told him the handwriting was on the wall and that he knew even then the cards were stacked? It is possible, but astute politicians rarely tell their innermost secrets to us.

Jim could have had a motorcycle escort of troopers into the ball park. He could have been escorted into a front box with official scraping and all that. His secretary could have called up the county committee and told it to hop on the old ballyhoo bandwagon and signal the great one's approach. None of this was done. Jim didn't stand up, flash a 3-acre grin and, stiff-armed, toss out a ball that couldn't bean a fly and hurt it. He did not have newspapermen there to blind him with flash bulbs. He came there to enjoy a game. And that is the way he has gone about managing his party—quietly, efficiently, and unostentatiously. About the only efficient thing about the party has been the organization for elections.

Jim will find temperament among young players coming up and plenty of it among such a group of prima donnas as there must be on a world-championship team, but how easy it will be to handle them after 8 long years in conniving Washington.

The secret locked so securely within Jim Farley's breast when he left Hyde Park must be revealed to the gaze of the world within a day or two when everybody will be privileged to share it. And would it be surprising if the secret turns out to be no secret at all? There are those who suspect that Jim knew the President's mind long before the recent historic conference between the two on the banks of the Hudson. There is the suspicion, too, that Mr. Farley didn't ask about the third term because he didn't have to and that the only topic under discussion was one of convention strategy.

This business of a rift between Roosevelt and Farley, of a misunderstanding over the third-term issue and of growing discord in Democratic ranks seems to be meat for the Republican press which is making the most of it, but it doesn't seem at all likely that the firm friends of yesteryear would remain so long with their heads together if there were any real differences between them.

Mr. Farley is a master strategist. So is Mr. Roosevelt. Both are showmen of the first order. And isn't it quite possible that Franklin and Jim, appreciating to the fullest the necessity of having a good show at Chicago, were in perfect accord as to the principal actors, the parts to be played, and the lines to be spoken?

A convention isn't a convention without a fight. And so there must be the appearance of a fight at Chicago. But any old-time convention strategist can tell you that those in control, realizing that "opposition" must appear from some quarter, often build up a greater opposition in order to smother the lesser ones. That's old stuff, but there is nothing to indicate that this is not the plan of campaign mapped out at Hyde Park. Opposition, controlled by the one who appears to be opposed and managed by a trusted lieutenant is in reality no opposition at all. It merely paves the way for a smooth-running convention—the kind that the customers like.

We have it on the authority of staff writers of the New York Herald Tribune that the "Farley-New Deal Rift is Widening" and that the chairman says he won't let the Roosevelt stampede stop his own candidacy. Wishful thinking?

TO QUOTE FROM THE HERALD TRIBUNE

"'Do you intend to relinquish the leadership of the party?' was still another question.

"'I'll give my answer Saturday,' said Mr. Farley, his chin thrust forward in a manner that indicated his answer might be pretty strong.

"Asked if he would have anything to say about the third-term issue, Mr. Farley declared that before leaving Chicago he would express himself frankly and freely on all issues."

Well, mebby so, mebby so! Who are we to lift the veil which has proved so impenetrable to others more skilled in the ways of master politicians? It does seem, however, that two men, and two alone, have hold of the strings which will make the convention puppets dance and that, while a good show is to be expected with much outward show of bitterness, it may turn out in the end that Franklin and Jim have hold of the same string and that they have been pulling it together all of the time.

THE NEWSPAPERMEN'S CANDIDATE

If the Democratic nominee for President of the United States could have been chosen by the newspapermen who are covering the convention rather than by the regular Democratic delegates, there is no doubt as to the result. The choice of the newspapermen would be Postmaster General James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Farley, from all appearances, is on his way out. He has told the President that he cannot serve again as chairman of the national committee. Behind it all is a story of loyalty to the President, loyalty to the party, splendid service faithfully performed and badly requited.

The newspapermen are solid for Jim Farley because they know him of old and in their own language "he has never let us down." He has never told an untruth, denied a quotation in order to make a scapegoat out of some reporter, or played false in any manner. To the boys of the press to whom covering national politics is a routine job he is big, lovable Jim Farley, always friendly, always honest, always on the level. No other people in America know better than those newspapermen how wholly Jim has given of himself.

It was he and he alone who engineered the convention deals which brought Franklin D. Roosevelt the first nomination in 1932. It was Jim Farley who stage-managed the election of 1936 with such triumphant results. Then he was pushed rudely aside to make room for the President's new cabinet of strange favorites who rule everything in Washington.

When the convention of 1940 was held Jim Farley was still national chairman, but Harry Hopkins, one of the palace favorites, was in Chicago to give the orders and Jim was in the cold.

The delegates knew this and realized what was going on but felt helpless to do anything about it, though many of them expressed resentment. The newspapermen, not being delegates, were much more outspoken. They were for Jim to the last man.

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald of July 17, 1940]

FARLEY FAREWELL?

Nearly all commentators seemed to get the impression that Jim Farley, in his brief address at the Democratic convention Monday night, was delivering a farewell to active direction of Democratic Party politics. We got the same impression.

Of course, Mr. Farley is a veteran political trooper. He would play his part to the end. And in his speech he sought to be the good soldier, the faithful leader, to the last. Indeed, he did seem to be giving up command with devotion and regret. But underneath all that there appeared to be a note of parting, of sadness.

The fact is that there has been little encouragement to Mr. Farley's Presidential aspirations. The honor of the party nomination, which he may feel that his long service and established abilities justified him in hoping for, seems altogether unlikely to come to him.

Even in the Massachusetts delegation, which was promised to him, there came this shout from a delegate in a caucus: "Mr. Farley is a phony candidate. I want the world to know where I stand—with Roosevelt."

It is even said that Senator BYRNES and Harry Hopkins are the President's personal representatives at the convention. Mr. Farley himself is said to have remarked in substance that he knew less about what was going on in the convention than anyone there.

That is not the old Farley. He was going through the motions in loyal party allegiance. But the old heart did not seem to be in him. It was almost as if he felt that he had played the game, insofar as he himself was personally concerned, to the end.

Perhaps Jim Farley is telling himself that a man has to expect this sort of thing in politics; that it is all in the game. But just now it must not seem to be such a good game as once it did.

[From the Bridgeport (Conn.) Post of July 20, 1940]

MR. FARLEY RETIRES

James A. Farley has announced that he will retire as chairman of the Democratic National Committee on August 17 to accept "an attractive private business offer," possibly head of the New York Yankees baseball club.

In his formal statement Chairman Farley pledges "full support" to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. He explains carefully that he has headed the Democratic National Committee for 8 years at great personal financial sacrifice and that he "owes it to his family" to take a chance to capitalize on his earning power, while he still has the earning power.

That's a good explanation and a reasonable one, and nobody will begrudge Jim Farley the chance to make some money. But the important point is if all was well within the Democratic Party he would not be stepping out now on the very eve of a crucial campaign in order to go into private business. He could defer private business for a few months longer after having deferred it for a full 8 years.

No, everybody knows what is in Jim Farley's heart and everybody respects him for the loyalty which restrains him from saying one ill-natured or ill-tempered word.

He has been very badly treated. Perhaps his successors—the men who have connived to get most of the old-time Democratic leaders out of the Democratic Party—will manage better than Jim would have done. But they have a pretty fine record to beat. Considering 1932 and 1936 we would say that Jim Farley was the outstanding political campaign manager of all time.

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) News]

JIM FARLEY

Democrats everywhere, regardless of what they think about other things, from the third-term question on down, are almost unanimous in liking, admiring, and respecting James A. Farley. The tributes paid to Mr. Farley at the Chicago convention were genuine; the Democrats feel just that way about him.

Democrats in general, therefore, will regret Jim Farley's forthcoming retirement as national chairman. He has been reelected to the chairmanship, but he has consented to serve only until the middle of August, when he will enter private business.

The party will miss Jim Farley during this campaign. But it is good to know that he will give his best to the party in private life.

THE CONVENTION IS OVER—BUT THE MEMORY LINGERS ON—LOVABLE JIM FARLEY HAS RETIRED, BUT REPORTER SAYS HE WILL BE DRAFTED FOR PRESIDENT IN 1944

(By Lily May Caldwell)

CHICAGO.—The show is over and one of the most beloved men in public life has taken his final bow from the stage of the Democratic National Convention. Genial Jim Farley has stepped from the political stage.

But that's not all * * * it's only one of the innumerable sequences of drama and comedy that were a part of the convention of 1940:

There was the memorable demonstration for Alabama's distinguished Speaker of the House, William B. Bankhead, during the bedlam that accompanied the balloting for Vice Presidency * * * the arrival of Mrs. F. D. R. * * * the tears of Mrs. Henry Wallace * * * and the nomination by acclaim of Franklin D. Roosevelt as the man to whom the party turned again in an hour of crisis, with the faith that he will safely steer our Nation again through troubled waters.

Roosevelt was the man of the hour, but that lovable Irishman, Jim Farley, the man whose ability to make friends and influence delegates brought his party from obscurity into the national spotlight in 1932 for a great historical drama—that big, square-shooting, easy, likable fellow who stood there on the platform fulfilling his last task for the man he has served for so many years—shared the heartbeat of the crowd with his "old friend Frank."

Jim Farley is stepping off the political stage forever, he thinks. But try and make those 30,000 cheering souls believe that. They know he is a great man; that politics is his life; and those of us who have sat beside him in press conferences during the past week know that Jim is making a sacrifice—we remember that his eyes were misty when he said good-bye, "You fellows who know me know how deeply I feel your generosity and friendship."

HIS WIFE IS HAPPY, THOUGH

The happiest person in Chicago today is pretty Bess Farley, wife of the chairman, and head of the "major opposition" to his bid for the Presidency, who, with their two daughters, Ann and Betsy, is here to celebrate her husband's retirement.

"I never wanted Jim to go into politics in the first place," she told me as we talked in her flower-banked suite in the Blackstone Hotel, "and although I'm naturally proud of his success, I dislike official life and having him away from home all of the time. In the past we have always maintained an apartment at the Mayflower because Jim had to have some place to live in Washington, but I've never stayed there 3 consecutive nights in my life * * * and I much prefer our New York home to the White House."

Blue-eyed Bess Farley is witty, frank, friendly, and loves to laugh; enjoys the theater, dancing, small dinner parties, and good conversation. And she's as pretty as the girls, who have been the center of attraction since their arrival in Chicago, and who are their father's constant companions—and two good reasons why "Big Jim" is leaving politics to accept an attractive offer in business that will adjust his financial situation and, he says, "be fair to my family."

FARLEY'S COMING RETIREMENT BLOW TO ROOSEVELT CAMPAIGN

It has been generally understood for some time that James A. Farley was going to resign as chairman of the Democatic National Committee. But that did not seem to lessen the severity of the blow when it finally fell.

On Friday Mr. Farley accepted reelection until August 17 at which time he will step down, his place then to be taken by the choice of a special subcommittee appointed for this purpose. Actually President Roosevelt will choose his manager, as candidates generally do.

With that decision the party leaders had to abandon the hope, which they cherished right up to the last, that the chairman might stick through the campaign or at least get it well on its way.

The experience of the New Dealers who ran the convention at Chicago for the President—for Farley was shoved completely in the background—brought home vividly to them what a great void would be left in the party structure with the retirement of the genial New Yorker.

Seldom have there been closer relationships in politics than that between Jim Farley and Mr. Roosevelt. The masterful handling of the original drive for the nomination, then the elections of 1932 and 1936, demonstrated the unusual political genius of Farley. It has seldom been excelled or even equaled.

The real break came over the third-term issue, although the chairman bitterly protested the party purge 2 years ago. That thoroughly unsuccessful "blitzkrieg" was the idea of the close New Deal insiders—the Corcorans and Cohens and the rest. And they conducted it.

In spite of that failure, their influence continued; and never since has Farley had quite the same standing at the White House.

Yet the chairman never discussed the third term openly; and when finally asked Friday about his attitude toward it, he said that he had tried to indicate his position by his candidacy for the Presidential nomination. His attitude throughout has been above criticism with never even a trace of vindictiveness.

Mr. Farley is leaving national politics to accept a remunerative position in the business world. His financial condition, he said, made it impossible for him to turn it down. Certainly his host of friends, in and out of politics, will wish him well in his new endeavor.

He has been not only a great political leader but also an able administrator, as demonstrated by his record as Postmaster General. He is known and respected by every Democrat of consequence—and numberless humble party workers—from coast to coast.

His going is ample cause for worry in New Deal circles. For with a real fight on their hands, Jim Farley is needed as never before. It's going to be hard to fill his shoes.

[From the Buffalo (N. Y.) Courier of July 16, 1940]

NOT CARRYING BAG NOW

Franklin D. Roosevelt has a secret. James A. Farley shares that secret. Mr. Farley has a secret, too. Put the two secrets together, and what do you get? Well, read the dispatches from Chicago and supply your own answer.

It can be one of several answers; or you can try combining the best features of all the answers. All the political correspondents are indulging in exercises of that sort; and there is no reason why their readers shouldn't enjoy the same game. It seems to be no end fun.

For our part, we confess to a bit of perplexity about the Roosevelt-Farley drama. Is it a political comedy? Is it a political tragedy? Or is it what Mr. Farley, in his boxing commission days, would have termed "just one of those things"?

Consider the Chicago scene in the light of the political history of the last decade. Go back to Mr. Roosevelt's gubernatorial days when he decided to avail himself of Mr. Farley's skilled professional services in a political war of maneuver, with the White House as an objective. Mr. Farley proved himself a master strategist and the objective was attained. When the Democrats gathered in Chicago 8 years ago, Mr. Farley already had the nomination "in the bag" for Mr. Roosevelt—although that fact did not become fully apparent until Messrs. McAdoo and GARNER had done their stuff. After the nomination, the election was "in the bag." Four years later, when the Democratic Convention met in Philadelphia, Mr. Roosevelt's renomination by acclamation was in Mr. Farley's bag—and so adroitly was the bag handled during the subsequent campaign that Mr. Farley was able to name the two States which Mr. Roosevelt wouldn't carry (remember them?) before the voting began. Now we have come to the end of what the President's admirers might call the Roosevelt decade—the thoughtless thirties when everything always was "in the bag."

We enter the decade of the forties; and nobody knows what that decade will bring forth. Mr. Roosevelt wants to begin the decade by being drafted for the third term which has been granted to no other President of the United States. Political observers in Chicago believe the draft renomination already is in the bag. Maybe so; but Mr. Farley no longer is carrying the bag.

On the contrary, Mr. Farley seems to be sick and sore, politically speaking. What is more, he seems determined to make some other people sick and sore before the convention is over. Sharer of the great Presidential secret though he be, Mr. Farley has another little secret of his own—or maybe a couple of little secrets—and apparently he isn't telling the answers even to Mr. Roosevelt.

[From the New Orleans (La.) Item-Tribune]

VALEDICTORY TO JAMES A. FARLEY

James A. Farley will step down as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and resign as Postmaster General on August 17. His retirement will be followed by emotions on the part of his fellow countrymen very different from those which greeted his entrance 8 years ago.

He was known then only as a New York politician with some ability for organization. He is recognized now as the possessor of talent for organization that amounts to genius not surpassed in American politics. And he is known as a "grand guy," a first-rate fighting man, and a supremely good sport.

In the past 8 years the Postmaster General has weathered many a storm. Known contemptuously as "The Jobmaster," he made himself a whipping boy to take the beatings for the Roosevelt administration, while the Ph. D.'s "brain trust" looked down their noses at him.

"Big Jim" bore it all with smiling equanimity. And he learned from experience. He got to know all parts of the United States and their ways of feeling and thinking as few New Yorkers have ever known them. The country came to know him as an upstanding, straight-shooting man, upon whose word men could confidently rely. All Democrats, and hosts of others, came not only to trust this big, bald, New Yorker but to have real affection for him.

You could have no greater proof that the boy from Grassy Point had made good than a party given for him when the Chicago convention was over. Cynicism is part of the armor of most newspaper folks. Nowhere in the fraternity is it burnished more brightly than among those correspondents who "cover" Washington. Yet these cynics were hosts at a farewell testimonial to Farley, where feeling was so genuine and unrestrained that, in the words of the New York World-Telegram, it "brought mist to eyes long dry."

As Mr. Farley quits the political arena many will probably remember Tenniel's great cartoon, Dropping the Pilot. It depicted the young Kaiser Wilhelm II watching over the rail of the ship Germania while the great Bismarck went down the ladder to a small boat waiting to carry him away.

Much has been said already, and more will be, about "the doctrine of indispensability." Some persons may wonder, before the present political drama reaches its climax, if the new dealers managing Mr. Roosevelt's campaign won't discover that Mr. Farley was "the indispensable man," too.

Still others, contemplating the greatly heightened stature of this simple, honest, man, will reflect that character is the one thing without which other gifts of the gods are valueless. We salute the passing pilot in words borrowed from James Whitcomb Riley:

"Well, good-bye, Jim; take keer of yourse'f."

[From the Buffalo Evening News of July 17, 1940]

OLD FAITHFUL

James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, is a politician. More than that, he is recognized by friend and foe alike as the best politician in the land, which is saying something for a nation where every other person is either active in politics or a self-avowed political expert. Mr. Farley is a square shooter, a truth teller, a promise keeper, and a man of conviction. He believes in the party system of government and in party responsibility to the people. He is loyal to the principles of his own party, the Democratic Party, but above his party loyalty he places loyalty to his country and what he conceives to be its best interests. Jim Farley is a man who will shake your hand as if he meant it, look you in the eye—and remember your name. But he is not a man to brook subterfuge and double dealing, whether in politics or anything else.

Today Jim Farley is the most tragic figure on the American political stage. Perhaps he does not realize fully himself the tragedy of his situation. But he is certainly aware of his most uncomfortable predicament as master of ceremonies at a Democratic National Convention which is little more than a puppet show. The leading strings of the puppet delegates are being operated by a Cabinet member and amateur politician in a hotel across the street, under instructions received on a special telephone wire from the White House in Washington. Jim Farley, the genial political wizard who organized the overwhelming Democratic victories of 1932 and 1936, has little to do but apply his efforts to smiling through his chagrin and wondering what has happened to the Democratic Party. For in a very real sense the convention which Mr. Farley called to order on Monday was not a Democratic convention at all. It was a convention whose 1,094 delegates bore the label of Democrats but were ready to act, however reluctantly, under orders from the minority New Deal wing of the party. Strangest of all, not even the new dealers who were running the show had any clear idea of what they were supposed to do, or what the reaction would be at headquarters in the White House.

The general plot for the staged drama of the Democratic, or New Deal, convention is, of course clear enough. The idea is to "draft" President Roosevelt for a third-term nomination by an overwhelming vote of the delegates on the first ballot. The New Deal generals, headed by Secretary of Commerce Harry Hopkins, hoped to make the nomination by acclamation without a roll call. But Chairman Farley, who is more or less resigned to the outcome of the convention, would not stand for the crowning insult to the democracy of the Democratic Party which would be implied in a move to dispense with the traditional roll call of the States. Furthermore, it is questionable if a unanimous vote would be obtained in any case. The latest check up revealed at least 150 delegates who are opposed to a third term and intend to vote for other candidates. Finally, the patent lack of enthusiasm for the third term which was displayed Monday when the name Roosevelt failed to evoke the expected demonstrations has convinced the new dealers that more subtle tactics are in order.

The symbol of this weird situation in which a great political party has become the rubber stamp for one man and his idealogical minions is Jim Farley, who typifies the discomfort and ill-conceived annoyance of the delegates. Chairman Farley, himself a candidate for the Presidency, has insisted that his name be placed in nomination. He knows that this would only be a gesture, but he considers it important that his convictions be placed on the record in this way. No one can doubt that it is an anti-third-term gesture, a gesture of complete distrust and opposition to the shattering of the third-term tradition. Many of the delegates who have looked to Mr. Farley for leadership in the past, feel the tragedy of this move in its futility, and resent the situation on behalf of their chairman. Yet the tragedy does not stop there, for Jim Farley, the best of friends, is torn between his friendship for the President and his convictions on the third-term question. The President has personally appealed to his political lieutenant, often neglected and shunted aside in the past for New Deal favorites, to continue as national chairman and handle the campaign. Whatever may be his choice, the American people are likely to couple their distaste for the phoney proceeding at Chicago with profound sympathy for Jim Farley, a politician who knows where politics stops and love of country begins.

[From the Charlotte (N. C.) News and Evening Chronicle of July 21, 1940]

EXIT JIM—7 YEARS OF OFFICE HAVE COST HIM NO LOSS IN RESPECT

The Democratic Party has taken three "sockos" in rapid succession.

1. The third term.
2. Wallace for Vice President.
3. The resignation of Jim Farley.

Time was when the resignation of Jim either as Postmaster General or national chairman would have been eminently in order. This repositing in one man of two such irreconcilable offices was out of harmony with the note of high idealism which Mr. Roosevelt was sounding in the party's name. But Jim held on, and in the latter years of the New Deal it began to be generally understood that he was taking the rap and saying nothing in his own defense.

Not, mind you, that Jim turns red when caught playing politics on either a ward or national scale. Jim is first of all a party man. Andrew Jackson is his hero, and "to the victor belong the spoils" is his motto.

But his unfailing good humor in the face of criticism and ridicule, his rugged loyalty to the chief who overrode him but kept him hanging obediently on, his refusal to "take a walk" or otherwise to play the child, have combined to give Jim Farley's exit the convincing touch of dignity and manliness.

If one felt like laying it on thick, it could be sincerely said, Well done, good and faithful servant.

[From the Butte (Mont.) Standard of July 21, 1940]

FARLEY ON THE SIDE LINES

The retirement of genial Jim Farley as a political prophet seemed to foreshadow his retirement from politics. Otherwise he would have had a different answer than that he was "not for the moment in the role of prophet" when asked concerning the chances for a Roosevelt victory in 1940. The Postmaster General was gracefully bowing himself out of the field of lining up delegates and votes and distributing patronage. Still, it must be remembered that Mr. Farley had not been distributing much patronage for almost 2 years.

Into whatever field Mr. Farley ventures, his friends—and he has millions of them—will wish him success equal to that he achieved in advancing the political fortunes of his boss, President Franklin D. Roosevelt. To Mr. Farley, the President without doubt owed his first nomination and election. And in 1936, when the Roosevelt New Deal forces carried through again, it was with the Postmaster General working quietly behind the scenes, pulling wires here and there, pouring oil on troubled waters, and filling gaps.

It seems that with the breaking of the third-term tradition, the President and Mr. Farley parted ways, although the national chairman of the Democratic Party still professes loyalty. But Mr. Roosevelt will discover that the going may not be so good with his true friend sitting on the side lines. Mr. Farley's refusal to assume the role of the prophet, a role, incidentally, which he played with honor, seems more than an omen.

[From the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer of July 17, 1940]

UNHAPPY JIM

Happy and genial Jim Farley is forlorn and disconsolate.

Pictures flashed back to the newspapers from the Chicago convention prove it.

That infectious smile has worn off. In its stead, there is something akin to a scowl on his countenance.

Mr. Farley is clearly frustrated. His speech opening the convention was eloquent for its evasions rather than for its allusions.

The party chairman is in the throes of a keen and abject disappointment.

He wanted to have nothing to do with a third-term movement for the President, his long-time friend and the man he has moved heaven and earth, first to elect on two occasions, and then to support him as the head of the party to which Big Jim is earnestly devoted and dedicated.

Truth is that a few weeks ago it looked as if Mr. Farley would be on the national ticket himself. He craved that honor.

If he had only remote hopes of securing the nomination for the White House, he was practically sure that, with Mr. Hull chosen for that honor, he would tail-end the ticket for the Vice Presidency.

But a few days ago all hopes for anything which he had entertained went dashing to fragments.

The President took him into his confidence at Hyde Park and told "Big Jim" not to tell anybody what he had told him, but the latter hasn't been the same since.

The assumption is reasonable that Mr. Roosevelt told him that a third-term effort was inevitable and that he would be obliged to bow to it.

That was enough to take the heart out of the chairman, who fears for the fate of the party, the welfare of which he considers to be far above the temporary enthronement of any individual.

At any rate, the speech of the chairman and the pictures being taken of him in Chicago give the secret away.

It is no longer genial Jim.

He's disgusted and will wash his hands of the whole business, not only refusing to take the chairmanship again, but to turn a hand in the campaign, and what a magic political hand that is of his!

It's going to be very bad for the party, too, that Mr. Farley is going into the baseball business and turn the manipulations over to others, most of whom, we may reasonably fear, have not even been among his best pupils.

[From the Cheyenne (Wyo.) Tribune Leader of July 21, 1940]

DEMOCRATS ON THE SIDE LINES

Disapproving flippant flouting of the third-term tradition by a totalitarianized Democratic national convention, disgusted with the megalomanical complex "I am the only one," heartsick from the callous ingratitude of the man whose political creator he was, "Big Jim" Farley will resign the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee of which he has been the backbone and mainstay for 8 years.

His refusal to be associated with the third-term campaign is typical of that of a host of sincere, patriotic big men of the party which has been "blitzkrieged" by political dictatorship.

They will have no part or parcel of the effort to obtain ratification at the polls of the Roosevelt junking of a national tradition made unwritten law by the approval and example of men whose statesmanship prevented them from playing greasy politics in alliance with corrupt State and municipal machines.

They, like "Big Jim," will retire to the side lines and watch the Rooseveltian revolutionaries plunge to the terrific rebuke which is formulating for expression at the polls in November.

It would be interesting to see how they mark their ballots.

FARLEY ALMOST STOLE THE SHOW; NOW A BIGGER FIGURE THAN EVER—HAS QUALITIES LACKING IN MANY POLITICIANS

(By James L. Kilgallen, staff writer for International News Service)

James A. Farley, the man with a million friends, emerged from the 1940 Democratic National Convention a bigger figure than at any time in his long career as a politician. In a way, he almost "stole the show," even though President Roosevelt was renominated.

Jim Farley is a man who possesses qualities many politicians lack. Above all he is true to himself, to his honest conception of right and wrong. He is a "square shooter," loyal to the core—a man who wouldn't stoop to do the slightest underhand act. One of the reasons for Farley's great success is his memory for faces, names, and events.

Newspaper men, who are close to him on all kinds of occasions and who view him with unbiased eyes, know Farley is on the level. They have known it for years. He has never "double-crossed" them, never denied a story he has given out no matter what the public reaction. He has treated writers on Republican papers with as much consideration and friendliness as those employed by Democratic publications. He plays no favorites.

"I make it a policy to tell the truth," Jim says. He has found it to be a good formula.

PROMISES GILT EDGED

His word is no scrap of paper. If he promises to do something, it is a gilt-edged guaranty that he will do it.

He is perhaps the most humane man in American public life today. He has that "common touch."

His humaneness was illustrated by an incident during the recent Chicago convention. His headquarters was crowded all the time with American's greatest reporters—Washington correspondents, star reporters from New York, and the best political writers on papers all over the country. Into those headquarters the other day came a cub—an 18-year-old chap with bright red hair, Bob Kubicek, reporter for the Oak Leaves, a weekly published at Oak Park, Ill.

Kubicek was looking for a ticket for the convention. The "big shots" in the newspaper game had long since reserved theirs—and had them.

FARLEY TO RESCUE

When young Kubicek entered the publicity office of the Democratic National Committee on his mission he was quietly but firmly eased out the nearest door without much ceremony.

Farley happened to come along a corridor. He sensed the youth was in a dilemma. He asked the boy, "What's the trouble, son?"

Kubicek, a bit awed, told him.

"Follow me," said Jim.

He led him to his own private office, opened a drawer in his desk, and produced not only a book of tickets for every session of the convention, but a press badge as well. Wasn't that boy happy when he mingled with the working press at the convention. And isn't he another Farley man.

That incident illustrates Farley and the bigness of his heart. It shows why he has so many friends.

APPLAUDED BY PRESS

I have attended many press conferences with the big wigs of politics, but I have never seen what I saw at Farley's recent press conference in Chicago. Time and again the press, composed of a good proportion of cynics, applauded him when he entered the room. And applauded the answers he gave to some of their questions. He has "sold himself" to the press of the Nation 100 percent.

Farley, now 52 years old, has an assured future. No matter what he turns his hand to, he does it well. He is thorough, a great organizer, an indefatigable worker.

His habits are good. He doesn't drink intoxicating liquor, nor does he smoke. When under tension he chews gum. It is a common procedure for him to work 12 and 14 hours a day. He sometimes dictates to half a dozen stenographers at one sitting. He can confer with 50 persons an hour, and they will all go away satisfied that he has given them a hearing.

HAD HIGH HONOR

Farley feels that no matter how much he has given of himself to the Democratic Party it was well worth while. He has been repaid by the great satisfaction he has gotten out of politics. He has had the high honor of having his name presented as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. And his 72 votes—second to Roosevelt—was a good showing in view of the situation and was a tribute to his tremendous popularity.

But politics has not repaid Farley financially. He has a wife, Elizabeth A. Farley, two daughters, and a son, to consider. He must think of their future. Government salaries, as a rule, are below those paid in private industry—and private industry has been after Jim with offers of big, high-paying positions.

I, like scores of reporters who have known him intimately for many years, wish him well and feel he will make good in all his undertakings. He will carry into his new endeavors a wise head, a great brain, a lovable humaneness, and great strength of character. Jim Farley is a man's man—and the women love him as well.

GENIAL JIM

Although the Chicago convention of the Democratic Party is the dullest convention in living memory, it is not without a touch of unintentional drama. We refer to the plight of Chairman James A. Farley. Eight years ago Farley was the real hero of the Democratic Convention at Chicago. He had found the man, named him, got him nominated, and eventually saw him elected. In 1936 at Philadelphia Farley was the boss. Nobody ever questioned his power to run the convention and the subsequent campaign. Today, Farley is neither hero nor boss of the lifeless show at Chicago.

When Farley pounds the gavel today it is to call to order a convention over which he has no real authority. When he grants interviews he himself interviews the reporters as to what is actually going on in Chicago. The real convention was mapped out in advance at the White House. Operations on the ground are being directed by Harry Hopkins—of all people—from his fastness in the Blackstone Hotel. The new dealers have done an effective job of cashiering Jim Farley.

Some of the less ebullient new dealers are already troubled by their new responsibility—and the mistakes of Mr. Hopkins. Many veteran Democrats are appalled at the prospect of waging a campaign under such auspices against a whirlwind like Wendell Willkie. A movement to draft Farley is afoot. Unlike the movement to draft Roosevelt, this one would be genuine. But there is no indication that Farley will abandon his reputed plan to give up politics for baseball.

Nevertheless, this convention chairman in name only carries out his duties efficiently, cheerfully, and without complaint. Everybody knows that Farley disapproves a third term for Roosevelt or anybody else. But he will do and say nothing to interfere with what seems to be the convention's appointed mission. Genial Jim has taken it on the chin many times in the past 8 years. He will take it again at Chicago, more bitterly than ever before, but probably for the last time. No man has even questioned Jim Farley's loyalty to the Democratic Party. It is an outstanding quality in the man and it lends a touch of human warmth to an otherwise mechanical set of proceedings.

FARLEY STEPS OUT

Jim Farley's decision to retire as chairman of the Democratic National Committee on August 17 was expected, but that fact does not lessen the importance of his action. It is a fitting end to a convention that will probably rank as one of the most disastrous in the history of the Democratic Party. That convention was conceived in apathy and expired in dissension, as the President's hand-picked choice for the Vice Presidency was booed by many of the very delegates who dutifully, but resentfully, voted for him. Altogether, the meeting was a sordid as well as tradition-breaking spectacle.

Farley must feel that he is well out of it. For years he has been shabbily treated by the President and walked on by the more prominent whippersnappers of the New Deal. At Chicago he was inexcusably snubbed by Harry Hopkins, who controlled the private wire to the White House. Farley gets out because of principle—his opposition to a third term. But he has ample reason to be personally sore. Doubtless he will remain formally loyal to the party. He will keep his chairmanship of the New York State committee. But he will probably take no active part in the campaign after the few weeks he has allowed for breaking in a successor.

The Democratic campaign suffers a severe blow in the loss of Farley. He knows as much about practical politics as any man in the country. He has a genius for making friends and enjoys a devoted following in every Democratic district throughout the land. His retirement symbolizes quite as much as Mr. Roosevelt's quest of a third term, the final triumph of the New Deal over the Democratic Party. Whoever is chosen to succeed Farley, the real bosses of the campaign will be the new dealers who ran the Chicago show. Republicans could ask for nothing more.

HERE'S TO JIM FARLEY

Opposed as the News is and was to Jim Farley's advocacies in politics, we nevertheless have to express our admiration of a thoroughbred. This Chicago convention raised the Postmaster General to real heights of sincerity and sportsmanship and in a scene which lacked both virtues.

Mr. Farley in 1928 saw a political comer in Franklin D. Roosevelt and managed his successful campaign for governorship. In 1930 he first saw Mr. Roosevelt's chance for the 1932 nomination, and he spent 2 years of unparalleled effort getting Governor Roosevelt better known to his party. The thousands of visits and letters by Mr. Farley wrote a new history of political achievement.

As party chairman, he directed the winning 1932 election campaign, and in 1936 scored his greatest election triumph. It was not entirely fortune; it was in a great part Farley's vigilant strategy that landed 46 States in the record landslide.

Last fall he did not believe the President should or would seek a third term. As a gentlemanly hint of his convictions to his great friend, he first asked permission and then offered his own name as party nominee. He was courteous, considerate, and frank in what slight campaign he made. But it was evident he considered the party should be saved from a third-term disaster.

Mr. Farley knew what would happen at Chicago. It would have been easy for him, in justifiable belligerent mood, to throw wrenches. He did not. He insured that any candidate whose name was to be presented to the convention would get a hearing, but he entered no "stop Roosevelt" conference, because the President had been his friend.

Every word he said he weighed. He did not emphasize his own feelings, but he did not misrepresent them.

His final act of unselfishness to his friend was to move that a tragic mistake—as he believes it—be made unanimous so that the party Farley had led, whose leadership he was leaving, might have a sense of unity.

We may disagree with his political regularity, but we must admire the act. American politics does not breed much honor. But it produces a great gentleman as well as a leader of triumphs in James Aloysius Farley.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer and Sunday News-Leader of July 21, 1940]

JIM'LL BE MISSED

Until mid-August James A. Farley will continue as chairman of the national committee to which he was first elected 8 years ago. Between now and then administration pressure will be exerted to break his determination to retire to private life.

Farley says he will support the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. He is unwilling, however, to ignore some money-making opportunities in the business world in order to direct the Roosevelt-Wallace battle for ballots.

What the country wonders is how much it is the business opportunities which dissuade Farley from continuing in the chairmanship, and how much it is his hostility to the idea of a third-term candidacy plus his belief that someone less radical than Wallace should have been given second place on the ballot.

Next to the President himself, Jim Farley retires as chairman the most beloved Democrat in the country. What happened at the recent Chicago convention added to his stature as a party figure, as it subtracted from that of many who helped steer the steam roller over the retiring chairman.

Farley stands head and shoulders above his detractors. The Roosevelt-Wallace ticket's chances of success are diminished by his stepping down.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of July 25, 1940]

UNIQUE ROLE IS ENDING AS "BIG JIM" PACKS

(By Walker S. Buel)

WASHINGTON, July 24.—Postmaster General James A. Farley and Democratic National Chairman James A. Farley are packing their bags to leave Washington and rejoin State Democratic Chairman James A. Farley in New York next month.

A one-man triumvirate unique in American politics will be dissolved, liquidated, and committed to the history of an epoch which has closed and of a political party which is no more.

When Farley steps out of the national chairmanship August 17 the Democratic Party will come into the complete control of the new dealers, who embrace former Republicans and liberals of uncertain label, leaving Jim Farley and Jack Garner and Carter Glass and conservative Democrats generally with no political home at all.

Farley will be regular. He will not bolt, and he will not go fishing.

He said at Chicago he would support the nominees of the convention, and he is a man of his word, as was mentioned by everyone who spoke of him at Chicago and as will be attested by everyone else who knows him, including both President and Mrs. Roosevelt. He undoubtedly will speak for the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket.

Nevertheless, when Farley retires, it will be breaking home ties. The old place will not be the same. Farley would not be comfortable in it if he stayed.

It is the best information today that nothing will change his mind about leaving the chairmanship August 17. It is assumed he will shed the Cabinet position shortly thereafter, and New York friends say he also is looking for someone to take over the State chairmanship, although indications have been he would retain it.

Information today also is the new dealers will not lift a hand to persuade Farley to stay. On the contrary, they want to get rid of him, and reports are that the national committee will be given a house cleaning of all of Farley's friends. The new dealers want control from top to bottom, and they unquestionably are entitled to it, for they took command at Chicago, nominated the ticket, and carried off such bacon as there was.

There was a moment or two of panic at Chicago, when gestures were made toward Farley, but they were only fright maneuvers. The President and Mrs. Roosevelt paid highest tribute to Farley in addressing the convention, but new dealers deprecate interpretation that this praise was tantamount to an invitation to Farley to remain.

To the somewhat bitter anguish of new dealers, "Big Jim" Farley, also known as "Sunny Jim," "Genial Jim," and "Just call me Jim," goes out of this picture with this chin up, his countenance as cheerful as when he came, accompanied by the best wishes of thousands in and out of Washington. His theme song still is When Irish Eyes Are Smiling, and his confidential word to all his friends in the days of uncertainty over the third-term intentions of President Roosevelt was:

"Farley still has his sense of humor."

This the new dealers cannot take from him, nor the business offers which few of them could command, acceptance of which will put him into the realm of social security, as retention of Cabinet post or chairmanship could not do.

The first-appointed member of the Roosevelt Cabinet was put on the spot by the rise of the third-term program as was no other political leader.

His loyalties were deep; his allegiance to principle was fixed. Principle argued against a third term as constituting a danger to the country and the party. Loyalties argued against breaking with President Roosevelt.

COULD HAVE TAKEN CONTROL

The result of this inner struggle was a curious kind of compromise. He did not and has not yet spoken out against President Roosevelt. But he offered his own Presidential candidacy as a rallying point for anti-third-term sentiment. Thus he did not forsake his loyalties, and he did not surrender his principle. When the moment came when the convention wanted to bolt to Paul V. McNutt or some other Vice Presidential candidate rather than accept Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, who was the President's choice, Farley probably could have taken convention control away from the new dealers and upset the program. If Farley had flung himself openly and vocally into that fight, he undoubtedly could have brought about another Vice Presidential nomination which would have stymied the New Deal and thrown the third-term candidacy of the President into doubt.

Farley did not lift a hand to block the President's choice, and the Wallace candidacy won.

JIM GETS BEST OF IT

New dealers hotly insist the sentimental furor over Farley's departure from the national chairmanship is a lot of baloney, that if Farley was pushed around by the new dealers, he was doing a little pushing around of his own, and that, after all, he stood as a candidate to symbolize opposition to a Roosevelt third term.

This seems to be decidedly a minority view. Farley gets all the best of it in the final break.

The consensus about Jim Farley seems to be expressed in this language:

"I have known Jim Farley for a great many years, and I have never known him yet to do or think a mean thing.

"For a long time now—a good many years—he has been taking it on the chin with a smile and not batting an eyelid, because, I think, in the back of his head he had the idea that in spite of all kinds of unfair attacks, the American people, just like you and me, will read him for what he is, absolutely on the level."

Those were the words, not many moons ago, of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star]

FARLEY REFUSED COMPROMISE WITH A PRINCIPLE—EVEN NEW DEALERS REALIZE THAT RESIGNATION WILL HANDICAP CAMPAIGN

(By Morris D. Ervin)

CHICAGO, July 20.—The refusal of James A. Farley to compromise where a matter of high principle is concerned is causing the leaders of the Roosevelt administration's campaign for a third term no end of worry. It is the most serious blow that has befallen them and, without the able national chairman to conduct their campaign for them, they are not at all sure about what the future holds for them.

Until the very end the leaders of the third-term movement refused to believe that Farley would carry out his threat to resign as national chairman if Roosevelt accepted a third nomination. There is some doubt that they would have been so eager for another Roosevelt nomination if they had believed he would, for they do not underrate his ability as a campaign manager. What they did underrate was the quality of his conscience and his devotion to a principle.

They really didn't get frightened about the prospect of Jim's walking out on them until shortly before the nomination of Roosevelt when it had become evident to everyone that Roosevelt would not only be nominated but that he would accept. Then, when Farley showed no sign of backing down, they began to show some concern. But still they thought they could fix it up.

FLATTERY CAMPAIGN

They started an intense campaign of flattery. All the third-term leaders in Chicago began to make a big fuss over him. Mrs. Roosevelt took it up. She called Farley on the phone as soon as the nomination had been made and made her arrangements to come to Chicago through him. When she spoke at the convention, the first of her speech was devoted to a eulogy of Farley and an expression of opinion that he would continue to work for the party. The President himself said more of the same when he addressed the convention by phone. The leaders did everything to give the convention opportunities to "demonstrate" for Farley. And they thought that they had it all fixed up. When the national committee met yesterday it immediately gave Farley a big ovation and then unanimousiy and by acclamation elected him national chairman for a third time. And it was right at that point that the third-term leaders' house of cards collapsed. Farley thanked the committee members, said he would serve for 30 days until the President had had time to select his successor—evidence in itself that the President had not thought it would be necessary to take such action—but that on August 17 he would be definitely done. After that, campaign manager or no campaign manager, they would have to run their campaign without his help.

And then suddenly it dawned on them that that would be no easy task. For the first time they realized what they were up against. The leaders of the third-term movement had no one to take Farley's place. The national committee had no one, Roosevelt had no one. The best they could think of was to appoint a committee of five persons to confer with the President and learn from him what he thought about the situation.

POLITICAL GENIUS

In the whole Roosevelt administration there is not another person the equal of Jim Farley in political management. He not only has remarkable natural ability along that line, but he has the experience and the acquaintanceship to back it up. He knows the Democratic politicians intimately from one end of the country to the other and they are all intensely fond of him. A lot of them would work like beavers for him when they probably wouldn't work at all even for President Roosevelt, though, of course, they would go through the motions for the latter. But their hearts wouldn't be in it the way they would if Jim were asking them to do it.

Besides that, the fact that Farley refused to violate a principle which he believed to be more important than party regularity will have a considerable influence on other party workers who have been in a quandary over the same question. Many of them will be inclined now to decide the question as Farley did. Farley put a great deal of store by his political career. He was proud of it and it meant a very great deal to him. He could have forgotten about principle, gone along with the third-term movement, managed the President's campaign once more and been assured of still greater political rewards. But he was willing to sacrifice all this because he did not believe that any man should be elected to a third term in the White House. Because Farley was willing to make such a sacrifice for a principle, other party workers, for whom he has long been a shining example, may be expected to do likewise.

All of that isn't going to make the task of Farley's successor any easier. Even if one can be found who has the managerial ability of Farley, which is more than a little doubtful, he will have difficulties which Farley would not have by reason of the fact that many political workers will be inclined to follow Farley's example and put country above party. The national committee members and the party leaders who had remained in Chicago until after the committee meeting in the vain hope that they could persuade Farley to change his position were leaving the Windy City last night in a pretty low state of mind. As Ernest Lindsay, one of the New Deal's foremost columnar protagonists, put it: "The joyous eagerness for action which has characterized the earlier Roosevelt campaigns is missing now. The Democratic campaign of 1940 will begin, instead, in a somewhat grim atmosphere, tinged with fatalism."

[From The State (Columbia, S. C.) of July 19, 1940]

MR. FARLEY

Postmaster General Farley, the once Genial Jim, has not been so genial in recent months. Something has had him down. The common report is that his opposition to a third term try is the explanation of his unenthusiastic conduct. But this opposition, however sincere, probably is not the complete explanation, nor even the major part of it. The fundamental fact, as nearly as one may discover it from a distance, is this: Mr. Farley took his own candidacy for the Presidential nomination seriously. Some who know him say it has been difficult to switch his thoughts off that ambition, or to talk to him on any other subject.

To many common men this will seem strange. They have known all along that Mr. Farley would not be nominated. He is an able organizer, an able politician, and a loyal Democrat. As such he is respected and admired by a large number of Americans. He is the type of man on whom others depend for support. But, somehow (this comment is not influenced by the fact that he is a Roman Catholic) he is not the type for President. Organization men are necessary to political parties, but the common American does not look to them for his top leaders.

Mr. Farley's hopes for the Presidency were not unnatural, and neither were they improper. He knows what a great job he has done as the manager of two Presidential campaigns. He knows how many men like him. He knows how many favors he has performed for friends, acquaintances, and for strangers. He is accustomed to victory. In his contacts with his friends and his beneficiaries he has heard a thousand times that they were for him. But many of them were not for him in the way he hoped and believed. They did not think he could be elected President, but most of them failed to tell him that.

A man who is a candidate is in poor strategic position to learn the truth. Other men wish to please him, therefore they tell him the pleasant things they hear and frequently they represent their own opinions as more favorable than forthright candor warrants. Blame this, if blame must be placed, on human nature.

But it is strange that Mr. Farley, with his background as a Tammany worker, holder of political office—boxing commissioner—in New York, and later as the lieutenant chief of the national Democratic forces, should have forgotten this disposition of men to please the candidate with whom they are speaking. Surely he has seen scores of candidates go down to defeat despite the fact that prior to election day everybody spoke favorably of them. However, Mr. Farley seems to have forgotten his primary lessons in politics in his desire for the Democratic nomination. Unhappily, he soaked himself in his own worthy hopes.

None of this is written in criticism of Mr. Farley. The State rates him the ablest national chairman it has known and a delightful and lovable man. In this analysis the State is merely trying to understand politics and men.

Neither is the State offering criticism of those who speak pleasantly to candidates. After all, the average man does not think it any obligation of his to disillusion candidates, or to make them sore at him by telling the truth as he sees it. When an agreeable candidate asks a normal man, "What do you hear?" that normal man certainly is not going to reply, "I hear that you are soon to be an also-ran." No, sir. Human nature is not as acidly honest as that.

Defeated candidates often think and say that many men lied to them. No doubt some men do lie to candidates, but the mass of men interviewed by candidates do not lie. They merely withhold a part of the truth. For example:

A candidate asks a Podunk man what men are saying of his candidacy.

"I heard 5 or 6 of 'em say they're gonner vote for you," the Podunk man replies, and the reply may be correct. The Podunk man, however, shuts off the reply at that point instead of continuing with these words: "But I heard 15 or 20 say they wouldn't vote for you if you was the only man in the race."

The candidate goes on his rounds with a sense of warm affection for the Podunk voters—until the votes are counted.

Something comparable to this, on a national scale, seems to have happened to Mr. Farley.

The State regrets his deep disappointment, hopes he will recover quickly from it, resume his natural genial ways, and become even happier in the future than he has been in the past.

[From the Crestline (Ohio) Advocate of July 18, 1940]

THE TRAGIC PICTURE OF THE CHICAGO CONVENTION

Out of the mingled tumult, booing, cheering, and general consternation marking the principal sessions of the Democratic National Convention in Chicago this week reels the gaunt figure of the greatest leader in the history of modern politics, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Postmaster General of the United States, big, genial, courageous, able, and honest James A. Farley.

Jim Farley, the man who elected Roosevelt President of the United States in 1932 and again in 1936, literally kicked out by the man who owed him the greatest debt it is possible for any American citizen to owe, the elevation to the highest honor in the gift of the people of the United States. But that is nothing new for Roosevelt. It was the former Governor of the State of New York who pulled Roosevelt out of obscurity, Alfred E. Smith, who was kicked out in 1932 just as Farley was kicked out of Chicago this week.

Roosevelt and Farley talked together a week ago last Sunday. Nobody knows just what was said in that conference. But Roosevelt must have told Farley then that he wanted to be President again for a third term, something that had never happened before in the history of the American Nation. Undoubtedly Farley demurred, he must have told Roosevelt that it wasn't democracy, that he should step down now after 8 years of enjoying the greatest honor the American people can give. But with typical stubbornness Roosevelt hung on. He knew he had squandered billions of dollars of money of the American people to make slaves, he knew he had them by the neck and, by heaven, he was going to use them.

Like all other great American statesmen the aged Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, was vigorously opposed to a third term for President Roosevelt and volunteered to put the name of James Farley before the Chicago convention. In the meantime the grand old Senator from Virginia became seriously ill and it was then that he received several anonymous letters saying that Farley could not be a Democratic candidate for President because of his religious convictions. It was the Al Smith tragedy of 1928 all over again. Spurred to action by this ravage of constitutional rights by members of his own party, the gallant Virginia Senator staggered from his bed and made the trip to Chicago to place Mr. Farley in nomination.

The grand old Democrat of honor and fame was frequently interrupted by jeers and boos from the New Deal hand-picked delegates. Right from the stage of the convention he told them of the threat against Farley because of his religious convictions. A delegate from Minnesota attempted to insert in the New Deal platform a repetition of the statement in the Democratic platform of 1896 opposing the un-American third-term argument. He, too, was jeered and booed and the amendment to the platform was defeated.

Shades of Thomas Jefferson, father of the Democratic Party and author of our cherished Declaration of Independence. The American doctrine which had decreed that all our people should be equal, that they should never be discriminated against because of their religious beliefs, that it should be the American creed to never nominate the same man for a third term for the Presidency—Thomas, Thomas, if you could only look down on Washington today.

A free people, indeed. The White House has been Hitlerized. May God in heaven help us.

No wonder that Jim Farley, one of the greatest Democrats of his generation, one of the finest of all American citizens, should seek to forever wash his hands and cleanse his body of the slime of the New Deal. What a tragic political end for great, warm-hearted American—Jim Farley.

[From the Dallas (Tex.) Morning News of July 22, 1940]

QUESTION MARK

Appraising humorously but neatly and efficiently the urbane gentleman who had progressed so far from Grassy Point, the New York Evening Post back in 1936 remarked that the G. O. P.'s severest blow was the realization that James A. Farley would not comply with the Roosevelt mandate and resign as national chairman in order to retain his Federal job. "They thought they could defeat Roosevelt," commented the Post; "they knew they couldn't beat Farley."

Many persons have been given credit for the victory of 1932. Certainly Louis Howe had a part in it. But for the most part the fact that Franklin Roosevelt was nominated, the most essential part of victory that year, was due to Farley, to a Farley who had begun the ground-laying task many months before the Chicago convention. And to the ensuing campaign he brought a directing skill that still commands the highest admiration. In 1936 reelection might have occurred with or without Jim Farley, but with him it was a lead-pipe cinch. Now comes 1940.

Acceptance of the post of national chairman for the first month of the campaign seems to be all that could be obtained from the Postmaster General, of whom certain things are known facts: (1) He doesn't believe in third terms; (2) he believes in promotion from the ranks of deserving Democrats; (3) he wanted to be promoted to the Presidency himself.

Now James Aloysius Farley is not going to bolt the Democratic ticket. His own assurance that everybody knows he is a Democrat made it unnecessary for him to say that he will vote the party ticket. No; Jim Farley will not bolt. He will not, like an illustrious fellow New Yorker, take a walk. But the question that bothers the anxious new dealers is, Will he march?

FARLEY RETIRES

The retirement of James A. Farley, "the man with a million friends," from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee leaves President Roosevelt to campaign for reelection without the generalship of one of the ablest and most virtuous practical politicians that this Nation has had.

Farley describes himself as a politician, and if all men to whom the word is applied were of his type, it would have no unfavorable meaning. Politics is a rough game, but Farley has played it so that, as he goes into private life, he is at the height of his popularity.

Although Farley has announced that he will vote for the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket, he is stepping out under circumstances that make his withdrawal embarrassing to the President. The public is convinced that he has refused to assist in breaking the two-term tradition.

The sincere tribute given Farley at the Democratic Convention was long overdue. His good qualities have not been generally appreciated. The brain trusters scorned him as only a politician. Partisan Democrats accused him of giving juicy patronage plums to Republicans, and Republicans have charged him with maintaining a patronage machine for Democrats. But, through it all, he has kept his poise and given good service as Postmaster General.

Farley has had to be practical, and has been content to let others put on the halos of idealism. He has had to talk politics while they have talked philosophy. Yet, if all hearts in Washington were laid bare and analyzed, it might be shown that he is the most sincere idealist of them all. After 30 years in politics, he is retiring with a record that has no ugly blots, and he stands out as a genuine, democratic, patriotic, family loving American.

JIM FARLEY, DEMOCRAT

It was 25 minutes until 2 in the morning by the clock in the Chicago Stadium as a tall, bald-headed man made his way to the platform amid the bedlam created by 30,000 cheering people to get the attention of Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, convention chairman.

The cheering became louder and wilder as he approached the rostrum.

It was Jim Farley, beloved chairman of the National Democratic Committee through two successful Presidential campaigns.

The delegates couldn't give Jim their votes in a moment of world-wide emergency. They wanted the calm, steady hand of Franklin D. Roosevelt to continue at the wheel. But they could give him their cheers. They did.

Jim stood there in the spotlight with the microphones, ears of the Nation, about him. The boy from Rockland County was at the peak of a remarkable political career.

Slowly and forcefully, he speaks: "I have pursued a course here that has been dictated by the deepest convictions, and when a man fails to follow his sincere convictions he is false to himself, false to his party, and false to his country.

"I move now that the rules be suspended and that Franklin D. Roosevelt be nominated by acclamation. I want you to know that I will give my full support to the nominee of this great convention."

He stepped out of the spotlight, out of the range of the microphone. The 30,000 Democrats sang Irish Eyes Are Smiling in his honor.

A great Democrat, a great organization man, a great man—Jim Farley. It was not his lot—and probably not within the range of his abilities—to be President of the United States. But he had helped to make a President. He had fought a fight where other men might have made enemies; but as he stepped from the spotlight he left only friends.

[From the Dayton (Ohio) News of July 22, 1940]

ST. JIM

No man below the Presidency has suffered more derogation in recent years than James A. Farley, who now departs amid a storm of plaudits from the political scene. Jim Farley, now all but canonized among the saints of politics, was not so long ago, to millions of us, the devil-in-chief of politics. As the smiling center of 8 years of political strife departs in peace from the political planet, he is entitled to a satisfaction all his own.

As leader in the fight to nominate and elect the President in 1932, Farley came under the accustomed hail of rocks and rain and mud. You take that for granted in politics as politics is played. Then the national chairman became Postmaster General, the classical berth, in the age of spoils, for the successful general in a Presidential campaign. That, in the day when the post-office tail went with the political hide, was the convenient vantage from which to dispense the pay in offices for services rendered in the campaign. Farley was spotted immediately as the pay-off man of the new administration. This functionary is never popular with the people whom he is to separate from their jobs. The brickbats flew at once.

Then Farley decided to hold on to his post as national chairman. To the enemy this meant an intent to buy the next campaign as well as to pay off for the last. Immediately the Nation was being wrecked by the machinations of the most reckless and ruthless and no doubt otherwise corrupt spoilsman in the story of American politics. Jim Farley was made the millstone by which the Roosevelt administration was to be sunk. The war on Farley went relentlessly on for a full 5 years. Jim Farley sawed wood, said nothing.

The 5 years brought forth finally the facts. Farley was a good politician, one of the ablest any party has had. That did not mean, it was discovered, that he was a bad man. The country was allowed finally to see Farley as a fundamentally honest man, his word as good as his bond, and a patriot who never put Farley or party or faction above his country. The great politician was a sound and efficient Postmaster General and a faithful citizen on whose name clung no whit of the mud his detractors had cast.

Farley quits his post by his own party universally beloved and trusted. So character will tell. The realistic Jim will smile a bit wryly at the sudden love which his old detractors now express. This comes only as he parts from the President for whom their brickbats were really meant. Yet he possesses, regardless of this, the disinterested respect and confidence of old enemies as well as old friends, as he quits politics in search of an old-age security, not often to be got in politics by men of his scrupulousness, for himself.

[From the Decatur (Ill.) Herald of July 20, 1940]

GENIAL JIM STEPS OUT

Until August 17 James A. Farley will continue to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Then he will resign his party post to accept "an attractive private business offer." Some time prior to August 17 President Roosevelt will announce the retirement of Postmaster General James A. Farley. Thus within a month Jim Farley will relinquish the two important posts he has held for almost 8 years.

Today there is little complaint, even among Republicans, that the Democratic national chairman is at the same time the Postmaster General. Six years ago Farley was denounced as a spoilsman and was urged to relinquish either his party or his Cabinet post. But he continued as party chairman and as Postmaster General through the 1936 Presidential campaign and until now in the second Roosevelt administration. Finally he is resigning not one but both of his jobs. He is a loyal Democrat but he doesn't believe in a third term. He's still "Genial Jim." He isn't mad, but he may be a trifle hurt.

Jim Farley has been a popular and successful politician, but at the same time he had administered the Post Office Department in satisfactory fashion. If he has been guilty of "politics" on occasion, he has been so frank and absolutely honest about it that nobody could complain much. He should find deep satisfaction in expressions of affection and admiration extended on every hand as he retires to the comparative quiet of private life.

[From the Detroit (Mich.) News of July 17, 1940]

FARLEY'S FAREWELL

James A. Farley was easily the man of the day as the Democratic National Convention began. For the host of Democratic politicians in the convention, the dull and drab opening contained a genuine event. Farley, whose record as a successful manager of Democratic campaigning lacks an equal, bade them farewell.

The effect, as he delivered a brief speech calling the convention to order, was that someone else must follow him in the job of organizing and managing the campaign which will succeed or fail in electing President Roosevelt to the tradition-breaking third term.

What it means to follow Farley is signified by his successes—management of Roosevelt's campaign for nomination in 1932; management of the Roosevelt campaigns for election in 1932 and 1936; management of the successful Democratic congressional campaigns of 1934 and 1938.

Farley obviously could not do otherwise than predict another Democratic victory. He's a loyal Democrat.

As he quits, it is equally true that (1) he seeks to improve his private financial position in private employment and (2) he wants no part in a campaign to elect the President a third time, being opposed on deep-seated conviction to third terms.

Who will succeed him? Harry Hopkins, in Chicago as the President's representative? Republicans probably hope the Hopkins report is true. For Hopkins, since 1938, when he began appearing in political roles for the New Deal, hasn't made a record to alarm his opponents.

[From the Detroit News of July 20, 1940]

GOOD SPORTS

Workmen cleaning up the stadium in Chicago after the Democratic Convention found a slip of paper on which was written: "Jim, you're a good soldier." It was a note of appreciation to James A. Farley.

Two outstanding features will stick in the memories of those who attended that convention and those who were radio listeners to its noisy broadcasts: Jim Farley's graciousness and loyalty even in defeat, and the pluck of Senator CARTER GLASS in coming from a sickroom to make a political speech which was evidently a matter of conscience. Agreement will be unanimous; they were good sports.

STILL JIM FARLEY

The Democratic rank and file of the country will be told today the plans of Jim Farley. He is one of the best loved among political figures within his party and one of the most respected if not exactly loved without his party of all American history. That may seem a broad statement, but it is made advisedly. One of the reasons, undoubtedly, is his unswerving loyalty to his friends and to his convictions.

His words last night and the night before, following the respective convention sessions, served to magnify his stature in American minds. His attitude, gracious and broad, offered a sharp contrast to the "Al Smith walk" of 8 years ago. He is still loyal. In a word, he is still Jim Farley.

"FARLEY ORCHID SHOWER"

It would be untrue, not to mention unfair, for anyone, friend or foe, to suggest that Jim Farley does not deserve the praise and affection showered upon him at Chicago and by political writers who have been closely associated with him. It would be just as untrue and unfair to suggest that he does not merit the rating he is now being given as a political organizer, campaign manager, and so on. He has turned in the hard and effective job his friends claim he has.

Likewise, it would be untrue to suggest that Mr. Farley's stepping out as national chairman does not leave the party and Mr. Roosevelt with a problem and lessen the chances of success for the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket in November. Everybody understands that Mr. Farley feels that he has been treated more or less badly and that he is less than enthusiastic over the third-term venture. Everybody knows, too, that the Roosevelt forces tried to persuade Mr. Farley to continue as chairman.

It isn't untrue or unfair, however, to remind some of the gentlemen now covering Mr. Farley with orchids that if Mr. Farley is a hero today he is not altogether a self-made hero. And surely, it isn't untrue or unfair to remind the "hero worshipers" that they twist themselves up a bit when they undertake to say that Jim Farley is the only man who can run a campaign and denounce others for saying that Franklin Roosevelt is the only man who can handle the Presidency in this crisis.

The outstanding trait Mr. Farley has manifested these past few months is that he is a man of convictions and the will and capacity to obey them, with consistency and forthrightness. It would, we submit, reflect credit upon his journalistic admirers if they, like their hero, practiced what they preach.

For ourselves, we readily admit that if we were in Mr. Roosevelt's shoes we had rather have Jim Farley in campaign headquarters than anyone we know of. But we also readily admit that there are others capable of carrying on, even as we think there are others capable of carrying on in Mr. Roosevelt's place.

Until August 17, James A. Farley will continue to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Then he will resign his party post to accept an attractive private business offer. Sometime prior to August 17, President Roosevelt will announce the retirement of Postmaster General James A. Farley. Thus within a month Jim Farley will relinquish the two important posts he has held for almost 8 years.

Today there is little complaint, even among Republicans, that the Democratic national chairman is at the same time the Postmaster General. Six years ago Farley was denounced as a spoilsman and was urged to relinquish either his party or his Cabinet post. But he continued as party chairman and as Postmaster General through the 1936 Presidential campaign and until now in the second Roosevelt administration. Finally he is resigning not one, but both of his jobs. He is a loyal Democrat but he doesn't believe in a third term. He's still "Genial Jim." He isn't mad, but he may be a trifle hurt.

Jim Farley has been a popular and successful politician but at the same time he has administered the Post Office Department in satisfactory fashion. If he has been guilty of politics on occasion, he has been so frank and absolutely honest about it that nobody would complain much. He should find deep satisfaction in expressions of affection and admiration extended on every hand as he retires to the comparative quiet of private life.

[From the Fort Worth Star-Telegram of July 24, 1940]

A RETIRING LEADER

The ovations and many compliments extended James A. Farley at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago were evidence of the high respect and appreciation which the party holds for its national chairman, who is retiring September 1. Another tribute was paid Mr. Farley, the Postmaster General, who leaves the Government service September 1, in a vote of confidence extended by the Federal Employees Association of Texas at their Dallas meeting, said to be the largest gathering of Federal workers ever assembled in one room.

When the Dallas tribute was offered, it was pointed out that no political motive could be ascribed to the vote of confidence at such a time, and the same statement could have been made of the previous compliments paid Mr. Farley at Chicago. As a Federal official, Mr. Farley was described by his associates in the service as "a rare executive, an inspiring leader, and a magnificent friend." Mr. Farley has demonstrated those same qualities in his work as chairman of the Democratic Party.

But incident to his leadership as a Federal and party official, Mr. Farley has displayed many other qualities that have marked him as an outstanding man in national life during the last 8 troublesome years. Jim Farley has always kept his head in emergencies. He has never fostered hatreds or dissensions among any of the diverse groups of the country, when nerves of many others were on edge. Stamped as a "practical politician," Mr. Farley has never resorted to cheap politics to win votes. Although a leader of his party, he has kept himself in the background. Mr. Farley has been able to enforce party discipline because he first was capable of self-discipline. He has exemplified one of the rarest of human virtues—loyalty.

There are many members of both political parties, and many persons unidentified with either faction, who realize now that Mr. Farley possesses the requirements of a great national leader. Certainly, both the Postoffice Department and the Democratic Party will find it difficult to replace him.

BACK TO PRIVATE LIFE

James A. Farley, for 8 years chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and for nearly that time Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Roosevelt, before the week end will step down from all his political offices and become just Jim Farley, one of the owners and managers of the New York Yankee baseball team.

With his passing from public life will go one of the most beloved figures ever to hold the political spotlight in this or any other nation. Not alone among the members of his own party but among those of opposite political faith Jim Farley is respected and loved.

No man ever held public office who so universally held the respect and affection of the hard-boiled newspaper crowd as did Jim. Two events which gained no publicity in the recent Chicago convention showed more than anything else the respect they hold for him. On the day of his last press conference when Jim entered the room the entire body of newspaper correspondents rose and cheered him. And on Friday afternoon the Press Gallery gave a reception for Jim in the grand ballroom of the Stevens Hotel. Two such circumstances never before occurred for any man in the position of Mr. Farley and that demonstration of their affection for him was spontaneous. It needed neither the machinations of Mayor Kelly nor of any other cheer leader to bring about those events.

Jim Farley easily was the most popular man before the Chicago convention. The cheers for him always were genuine and from the hearts of the galleries and of the delegates. Abused, slighted, insulted as he had been by the man he had "made," Jim went smilingly about the business of handling the convention, pledged his support to the ticket even though he is unalterably opposed to a third term for anybody. He was loyal to the last moment of his public career. Disloyalty was all on the other side.

He had been hurt to the heart. The greatest hurt of all was when the President said Farley would be unavailable for the Presidency because of his religion. Jim is a devout Catholic who is sincere in his devotion and who is a credit to the church to which, as in everything else, he is always loyal.

Jim Farley started life as humbly as a man might. As a boy he was a bartender, yet he has yet to know the taste either of liquor or tobacco. His mother is a saint to him, and she warned him early against the use of either.

A wonderful memory has Farley. It is said he can call 50,000 persons over the Nation by their first names. And whatever may be their positions in life, whatever their politics, their religious beliefs, their color, or their race, Jim Farley always is their loyal friend.

The Democratic Party has lost its greatest asset in Mr. Farley's refusal to conduct another campaign for the man whom he twice so triumphantly elected. But Farley will not bolt. His loyal disposition does not permit of that. And whatever the party may have lost, public service has lost infinitely more. They don't make a Farley every day. All over this Nation are those of all political faiths who will be wishing Jim Farley the best of success in his new place in private life and who will feel that public life has lost one of its highest types of men, the kind so much needed in the political life of this Nation.

REFLECTIONS OF AN EDITOR

(By Frank M. Sparks)

Alongside this column is an editorial I wrote about the departure of Jim Farley from public life. My only regret in having written it is that I have neither the vocabulary nor the space in the editorial column to sing of Jim all the praises that I have in my heart. I have not at my disposal the space to tell of all his virtues nor of the real friendship which I have for him, and of his friendship for me, of which I am so truly proud.

Jim Farley is a most unusual character. I've known men in public life who had marvelous memories. Senator William Alden Smith was one. But of them all, Farley has the world beaten. Many a man and woman he meets only casually in a crowd but next time he meets that person he calls him by name. And always Jim wears his wonderful smile. It is a genuine smile, a contagious smile, one that sort of makes a person feel good down inside.

The newspaper fraternity everywhere loves Jim Farley. One of the reasons for this is his forthrightness, his frankness. Take his press conferences at Chicago. Many a question was asked him which he would have been justified in refusing to answer. But when such a question came, he didn't do as most men in political life try to do, be smart and slip around the edges. He either answered the question frankly or said, "I don't think I ought to answer that one. I think you should ask that one of the President." And what was the result? Whenever a correspondent framed a question, the propriety of which he doubted somewhat, he always said, "I don't know, Jim, whether this is a proper question, but if it is embarrassing to you, you don't need to answer it." And more frequently than not Jim would reply, "That's a perfectly proper question and I'll answer it."

He is a square shooter, always has been and always will be. That's why he stands so well with hard-boiled newspapermen who are accustomed to having men in public life try to outsmart them. For these they have no mercy and pursue their questions until eventually they get their man in a hole. They never try to get Jim Farley in a hole. They wouldn't put him there if they could. They think too much of him for that.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN

To use the words of Senator SCOTT LUCAS in withdrawing his own name as a candidate for Vice President at Chicago, "had this been a free and open convention," Jim Farley quite likely might have been the nominee for the Presidency. And if he failed for that office, he certainly would have been nominated for Vice President. The two names and the two men who drew the most sincere and spontaneous applause of both delegates and galleries, the two most popular men in the convention were Jim Farley and Paul V. McNutt. Had the convention been free and open, the Democratic ticket this fall probably would have been either Farley and McNutt or McNutt and Farley. I rather lean to the first, with Farley at the head of the ticket because, had the field been open, Farley, with his great organization and his thousands of friends, could pretty nearly have lined up the delegates in advance for himself.

A year ago last April when I was calling on Jim in New York, I asked him why he didn't make the effort and suggested my belief that he could line up the delegates for himself if he chose. He said then to me: "I am quite confident that in an hour or two I could get on that phone over there and have enough States pledged to me to nominate me." But then he went on to say that he would not make any such effort until the President had spoken and the President didn't speak until 48 hours before the nominations were to take place.

Jim told me at that time, too, that the President had told him and others that he would not be a candidate for a third term. But the President didn't tell all that was in his mind apparently. He defeated all ambitions of others, at the same time holding his own counsel until it was too late really for anybody to organize to win the nomination. One after another of those who had aspirations—Farley, McNutt, Garner, and many others—he shunted aside in one way or another until he had things lined up for himself. That's what makes so many leading Democrats so mad these days.

One of the things which made the Farley friends madder than ever was the attempt of the President and of Mrs. Roosevelt, evidently acting under her husband's instructions, to smooth over the feelings of Farley and his friends when it was too late. Apparently they had heard the cheers for Farley, knew of his great popularity at the convention, and decided they would do well to slick things up a bit.

The crowd accepted what Mrs. Roosevelt said of Farley as being sincere, because everybody admires the First Lady of the Land. But when only a few minutes later the President put it on so thick, the whole thing was too transparent, and Farley's friends were madder than ever.

Well, there's one thing I'm glad of. Jim told me several months ago that politics had put a severe crimp in his personal fortune, that he must get out and go to work for himself. He has landed a fine job with the Yankee baseball team. I hope he makes a fortune from it and is happy in the work. I believe he will be, because he's not new to the world of sports. He was boxing commissioner in New York for many years. His personality will help. But I'm going to miss Jim Farley in the political field just the same.

SPORTSMANSHIP

JOHN NANCE GARNER, whose friends say he has sent no congratulatory messages to his party's nominees, is expected to bundle up his traps and go home to Uvalde, there to loaf and invite his soul for the duration of the campaign. "Cactus Jack" simply cannot abide the thought of a third term and has never made any secret of it.

James Aloysius Farley, who liked a third term not a whit better, agrees to stay on as national Democratic chairman for a month and help break in a new management. Thereafter he's to drop out of the more abundant political life for a spell in an effort to recoup his private fortunes.

Both men have for years been intimate friends of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Both contributed handsomely to making him President and have supported him ably in his administration of the country's affairs. Either has the right to call it a day; but while "Big Jim" may still take a profit from his attitude none is apt to accrue to Mr. GARNER.

At 70-odd, however, a self-sufficient individual does not require the airs and graces of a good sport. What boots it if the country generally terms "Cactus Jack" a sorehead? He's got enough to live on, has put, perhaps, as much into public service as he has taken from it and doesn't have to smile when his palate report is bitter.

Mr. Farley isn't anything like so nearly through politically. The more conservative element of his party will be treasuring his willingness to set his face against precedent-smashing while the liberals will praise his cheerfulness in defeat. If he wants to become a candidate for President 4 years from now, he will have lost no ground; for he has made no enemies.

It would have been strange, indeed, if one whose stock in trade down the years has been party loyalty in a huff rushed off the reservation. No doubt it is true, as Mr. Farley has declared, that he puts country above party; but we suspect he will always put his party above any other sort of political organization or combination.

LOSS TO THE DEMOCRATS

The report that Postmaster General James A. Farley will shortly resign both from the Cabinet and from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee to manage the New York Yankees baseball club is, of course, one of much political significance.

For, if these plans work out as reported, it will mean that Jim Farley will not manage the Democratic Presidential campaign this year, and that will be a serious loss to the Democratic Party and the candidate whom it nominates at Chicago next week.

Farley's work in behalf of Roosevelt in the 1932 and 1936 campaigns is widely regarded as having been of inestimable value in rolling the Roosevelt vote up to such tremendous proportions. Mr. Farley's exceptional ability in these fields is sincerely conceded, even by his opponents, and he would be an exceedingly useful man for the Democrats this year, particularly in view of the prospect that the Republicans are going to make an unusually strong bid for popular favor.

Mr. Farley's reported decision may mean that he is now convinced that Mr. Roosevelt will accept a third-term nomination, of which Mr. Farley disapproves. It has been generally said that a coolness has developed between Mr. Farley and Mr. Roosevelt in recent months, and the Postmaster General may have come to the conclusion that he does not wish to be connected actively with a Democratic Party effort to elect Mr. Roosevelt for another term. A few months ago Mr. Farley indicated that his name would be presented to the convention for the nomination regardless of Mr. Roosevelt's decision; but it is now quite evident that if Mr. Roosevelt is willing to accept the nomination neither Mr. Farley nor any other candidate will have any chance to win it.

FARLEY'S "SWAN SONG?"

In his address to the Democratic Convention, Jim Farley gave the distinct impression that he was delivering his "swan song" so far as further active participation in national politics this year is concerned.

Various developments of the last year or so in Farley's public career clearly suggest that there is much ground for the judgment that he does not approve the third term and in addition feels that his own political aspirations have not been given fair opportunity by the party leadership.

In an article from Chicago to the Atlanta Constitution Ralph McGill reveals the gist of the famous secret conversation which Farley had with the President, as gleaned from "a source believed reliable."

Farley is going to retire, writes Mr. McGill, "because Farley wants to establish himself in business and because he believes he has not been treated fairly by the new dealers and because he does not believe in a third term." He will support the nominee, even if it be for a third term, and will remain a party man, but he will not lend his genius to directing it. At the 2-hour conference, the Atlanta writer asserts, "Farley told the President he would have retired 4 years ago if he (Farley) had not believed he would be given a chance to be President or Vice President. He reviewed assurances to that end made him by party leaders and by the President. It was a very frank talk. Farley was not angry. No voices were raised. But Farley spoke his real feelings. He reminded the President that as late as the Massachusetts primary he had been encouraged to enter his name in the primaries. And that then the 'brain trust' group of Corcoran, Cohen, and Ickes had gone in behind him and wrecked his campaign. He said he did not believe he had been treated fairly." And Mr. McGill whimsically sees significance in the tune most frequently played at the first session of the convention, Take Me Out to the Ball Game, which he says will be the Farley theme song.

It must be said that this analysis provides a plausible explanation of certain of Mr. Farley's actions in recent months. His announcement that he would be a candidate for the nomination "regardless" certainly suggests that he was convinced by his conferences with Mr. Roosevelt that the latter would not accept a third-term nomination.

THEY'LL MISS FARLEY

As had been indicated, genial Jim Farley is pulling out of politics.

He remains as chairman of the Democratic National Committee until August 17, evidently to give the 1940 Democratic nominees opportunity to select a successor and a campaign manager.

It is now quite clear to everybody that there has been a real break between Farley and Franklin D. Roosevelt. That seems to have been based on Farley's dislike of the third-term idea, but it is quite possible that Farley's opposition to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt was founded in part at least on Mr. Farley's own aspirations to receive a Presidential nomination.

But at any rate Mr. Farley's admittedly great political talents are not going to be put into action in behalf of the Democratic national ticket this year. That, unquestionably, is a great loss to the Democratic campaign. And with the stiffer opposition this year the Democrats are probably going to need the ablest possible management of their 1940 effort.

[From the Harrisburg (Pa.) Telegraph of July 22, 1940]

AN EXAMPLE OF LOYALTY

Withdrawal of James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, from the front lines as the Presidential campaign nears its crucial stage may prove decisive.

But the genial, able leader of the last two campaigns may not be accused of running out on his party.

Long in advance of the convention he had announced his decision to retire.

After the convention he reiterated loyalty to party and nominee and repeated the necessity of recouping his finances compelled him to embark in private business.

Throughout his long and honorable political career he has been frank, honest, and truthful in his public utterances. His words, "I have an opportunity now to accept an attractive offer in business and, in justice to my family, because of my financial situation I am going to accept," must be accepted at face value.

His devotion to party compelled him to make a further sacrifice.

Instead of withdrawing at the end of his term he agreed to continue until party affairs had been placed in perfect order.

Mr. Farley will retire at the peak of an honorable career and with reputation enhanced by his convention conduct.

As was his right, he had his name placed before the convention, and by one of the most independent Democrats of all time, Senator GLASS.

He insisted on equal rights and privileges for other loyal members of his party.

Though he had intimate knowledge of the President's hopes and ambitions to stampede the convention, he nevertheless insisted upon strict adherence to traditional methods.

His ability to operate the convention with fairness and justice for all again demonstrates his outstanding qualities.

The tremendous ovation given Mr. Farley by the delegates was an acknowledgment of their admiration for one who has guided them to two victories, who has won an uncounted army of friends both within and without the party, who has remained steadfast and loyal through fair weather and foul, who has never broken a promise, who has been unfailingly honest and truthful, who now retires from public life high in the esteem of Democrats and Republicans.

With lesser Democratic politicians running out on the party to clamber aboard the Willkie band wagon, the party will sorely miss the confidence-inspiring guidance of Mr. Farley.

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of July 19, 1940]

THE REAL BIGNESS OF FARLEY

The man who comes out of the Democratic National Convention with the most credit is James A. Farley. Throughout the proceedings he stood steadfastly for maintaining the precedent established by Jefferson against a third-term nomination for any President. He made known his views long before the movement started to "draft" Mr. Roosevelt for another nomination. In his customary outspoken but affable manner, he advised the President to respect this great and wise tradition. He had good reason to believe at one time that his counsel would be heeded; in fact, his assurances were such that he announced his own intention to become a candidate. When he saw that the situation had changed and that delegates were being rounded up in the President's behalf, he let it be known that that would make no difference to him and that he would stick it out to the end. And this he did. He went down with his colors flying, but never once did he lose his good nature.

He saw Secretary Hopkins, who has been living at the White House of late, assuming roles that he himself had customarily played at such Democratic gatherings but if it hurt his pride he gave no outward indication of it. However, he firmly insisted for the good of the party in having his way in certain matters. He would not permit the President's more ardent enthusiasts to try for an immediate nomination by acclamation. He demanded that the convention exemplify, so far as it was possible in the circumstances, all the democratic processes customarily observed. The proposal to dispense with a roll call met with his emphatic objection. "If you do that," he said, "you might as well not hold an election in November." Shrewd, straight-thinking politician that he is he could look beyond July to November, which was more than some of the others could do.

The real attitude of the delegates toward him, bound and delivered as most of them were to the President, was shown first when his name was placed in nomination by the venerable Senator GLASS, of Virginia, and then by the spontaneous ovation that greeted him when he took the platform, after the roll call, to express his thanks for such support as he had received and to add his votes to those that had been chalked up for Mr. Roosevelt. The band struck up, "Irish Eyes Are Smiling," the vast audience chimed in and "Sunny Jim" looked supremely happy, as he had a right to be.

When historians write the story of this convention of the Democratic Party it is likely they will say that James A. Farley was about the biggest figure there, not only physically but in other respects. Lambasted and ridiculed early in his national political career as incapable of rising above his old-time Tammany affiliations, he stands today high in the estimation of the public. He has shown qualities of mind and heart, strength of character and devotion to principle that have made him hosts of friends and admirers everywhere.

MR. FARLEY'S FUTURE

For some years there have been reports that James A. Farley would resign as Postmaster General and go into business. Long before he was a candidate for the Presidential nomination the affable and able chairman of the Democratic National Committee was known to be wearying of sacrificing his best years to the service of his party and the building up other men's fortunes, political or otherwise. Now, with the cheers of thousands of friends and admirers ringing in his ears, Mr. Farley must decide whether he will quit politics immediately and complete his negotiations for the purchase of the New York American League baseball team, or whether he will conduct the campaign of his long-time friend for a third term.

Reelection of Mr. Farley to be national chairman is a well deserved tribute. His agreement to serve only until August 17, however, means that between now and that date he must be prevailed on to stay on the job, or a successor may be found. Already there is talk of Frank G. Walker, friend of the President and former national treasurer, and Senator JAMES F. BYRNES of South Carolina. Neither Mr. Walker nor Senator BYRNES wants the job. It is likely that President Roosevelt prefers that Mr. Farley continue as national chairman, not only because of the successful campaigns of 1932 and 1936 which Mr. Farley conducted, but because Mr. Farley's continuance as national chairman would be welcome evidence of party unity, since the Postmaster General was a rival of Mr. Roosevelt for the nomination and is known to be opposed to third-term nominations.

Mr. Farley, however, would be justified in looking out for his own affairs after the 8 years he has given Mr. Roosevelt and the party. The income from his proposed office of head of the organization owning the Yankees would be welcome, and the work would be to his liking. He is also suggested for an executive position in an automobile manufacturing company. His skill as an organizer makes him sought after by big business. Whatever his decision may be, Mr. Farley always will have thousands of friends who will be his loyal rooters. If he leaves the Democratic National Committee he will be greatly missed. He has been a "square shooter," an even-tempered gentleman, and an altogether admirable citizen. Everyone who knows him will wish him success and happiness in whatever he undertakes.

"BIG JIM" DEPARTING

One of the inevitable results of the heroic answer of President Roosevelt to the will of the Chicago convention is to be the departure of "Big Jim" Farley from national politics, where he reigned as chairman of the party, whose founder frowned on third-term aspirations of any man. So does "Big Jim," who was the directing genius of two Roosevelt campaigns, which, we learn, would have been all for the President had he not discovered in the meantime that the United States cannot go along in safety without him at the helm.

Postmaster General Farley stated his views on third terms a long time ago and when the President "released" his delegates in Chicago "Big Jim" allowed his own name to go before the convention just to show he was standing pat, although he knew that Roosevelt would be nominated that same evening.

To the rank and file of the party Jim Farley's decision to quit will be keenly felt. He was the one new dealer of them all who knew how to keep things rolling for his boss. Kindly and affable, with all of the great human qualities, "Big Jim" knew Democrats in every nook of the United States and while his secretaries once in a while mixed up his friendly, "personal" letters to the constituents from Helena to Hoboken, he was the sparkplug of the Roosevelt forces.

But "Big Jim" was sidetracked in recent years from the inner New Deal circles in favor of "brain trusters" and new politicos to whom the President took a liking and lent an ear that once listened to Farley. Sorely strained as the relations became, "Big Jim" was always loyal to "the Boss." He pulled many a chestnut out of the fire and took the "rap" for many an ill-advised move that was not his.

President Roosevelt, in his speech of acceptance, referred affectionately to "my old friend, Jim Farley" and voiced the hope that he would "continue to give all the leadership and support he can to the cause of American democracy."

However, James Aloysius Farley will leave the master-mind direction of a third-term campaign to others. He is going into the much more enjoyable business of baseball where the paying fans turn out in numbers reminiscent of a November election and where it's part of the game for a pitcher to cross up the batter.

The decision of "Big Jim" to forsake politics—fed up and disillusioned—is going to hurt the chances of the third-term ticket. That they would liked to have had him remain was evidenced in the President's reference to "my old friend." But Jim Farley is just a plain old American, who believes two terms are enough for any President, even his old pal and buddy, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

[From the Houston (Tex.) Post of July 21, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S RETIREMENT WILL END EPOCH IN DEMOCRATIC HISTORY

Jim Farley's approaching retirement as chairman of the Democratic National Committee will end an epochal period in the history of the political party which draws its inspiration from Thomas Jefferson.

In many ways, Farley helped to make that epoch great.

He is retiring for several important reasons. Farley had dreams of a Presidential nomination, perhaps through the aid and support of the man he has called "boss" for 7½ years, and whom he has served with unswerving loyalty. He watched those dreams and hopes crash about his ears during months of silence at the White House, while delegates were pledged to Roosevelt. Farley doesn't believe in a third term, even for the "boss."

He has made great financial sacrifices during recent years because of his deeply rooted love of politics. He likes the tumult and the shouting, the back slapping, hand shaking, and vote counting on election nights. Now he has opportunities to take big jobs at big salaries. Disillusioned and perhaps somewhat broken by the political game he played so expertly and with so much sportsmanship, he will take one of the jobs and the big money. But he probably won't like it.

There is no more proficient backslapper and handshaker in the land than Jim Farley. He knows how to pull political strings in a national campaign better than any living American. But behind his outstretched hand and ready smile lie a fine intellect and deeply rooted convictions on public affairs. "Big Jim" has made politics and politicians respectable.

As he stalked from the Chicago convention, probably the last in which he will participate as an important Democratic leader, disappointment weighed heavily upon him. But he took his medicine like a man and a true sportsman.

He agreed to remain as national chairman until August, so the burden of organizing the campaign will fall on his broad shoulders. He praised the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket, as a good party man would, swallowing his personal feelings. He said he will retain the chairmanship of the New York Democratic committee, and will make a vigorous fight for the Democratic ticket in his own State.

"Big Jim," in other words, is taking no walk.

At the end of a sordid convention, in which the kind of politics in which Jim Farley believes was sidetracked for an infinitely less worthy variety, he stands out as an exceedingly admirable figure.

When the Democratic Party drifts away from such a man, it is getting into dangerous waters.

[From the Hudson (N. J.) Dispatch of July 22, 1940]

FARLEY WINS CONFIDENCE OF THE PUBLIC

The passing of James A. Farley from public life is one of the most impressive exits from politics in many years. When Mr. Farley came upon the scene of national politics 8 years ago he was a target for one of the worst "silent" campaigns of recent times—and much of it not so silent. By inference it was made to appear that he was to be the big "fixer" of the Roosevelt Administration.

As Mr. Farley retires from public life, all this has been changed. He is one of the ablest men in public life in America. He has gained a degree of public confidence seldom acquired by men in public life. This confidence runs far into the realm of esteem, and the confidence and esteem for him run into citizens of both political parties.

It is a rather slow process, but men who are intentionally misunderstood usually win out in the long run.

[From the Knoxville (Tenn.) Journal of July 17, 1940]

FARLEY SINGS HIS SWAN SONG

There are few human qualities more admirable than loyalty, where it be directed toward a person, a cause, or a principle.

It is because Jim Farley has manifested this characteristic in such generous measure that regret at his treatment by Mr. Roosevelt and his new dealers is not confined just to the rank and file of Democratic Party workers but extends to countless Republicans as well.

Every Republican who looks forward to the election of Wendell Willkie in November was gratified from a political standpoint to find out definitely that the New Deal third-term campaign was not to be under the Farley leadership. That announcement boosted the Willkie campaign stock by several points.

But the spectacle of Farley's being snubbed consistently by such new dealers as Harry Hopkins is hard for anybody, even a Republican, to take in the light of the Postmaster General's previous record.

It will be recalled that "good old Jim" was the bright-haired boy in 1932 and again in 1936, when somebody had to shoulder the job of electing and reelecting the administration; that same administration which has made jobs for the Hopkinses et al. But Farley found, and the country observed, that the only real job he had was to get the new dealers into office, they ran the show to suit themselves and had little but criticism to pass his way.

So it's all over now for Farley. He has elected to get out before he could be thrown out, and all the time he has shown a restraint in the face of ingratitude and lack of appreciation that has amazed everyone, knowing how such treatment must have galled him.

Harry Hopkins is to take his place. Harry, the magnificent spender. Harry, the man who directed the wasted expenditures that should have gone for national defense. Harry, the boy who saw nothing wrong with using the W. P. A. for political purposes. Harry, the opportunist who flattered his way into the good graces of the White House, with a million yeses and not a single no.

For many an American citizen, Hopkins is the outstanding symbol for all that the New Deal has stood for in insincerity, impracticality, and the overweening determination to hold on to public power, no matter what the consequences to the country.

Somewhere in this now concluded friendship between Mr. Roosevelt and Jim Farley there is a moral that a wiser man than we might draw. It would be to the effect that there is something the matter with a passion for reform that takes into no account such a basic human characteristic as loyalty.

FARLEY QUITS POLITICS

James A. Farley, Postmaster General and chairman of the National Democratic Committee, has announced that he is closing up affairs as head of the Democratic Committee and arranging to accept a business offer. Farley managed the Roosevelt campaigns of 1932 and 1936, was the original Roosevelt for President active worker, and was connected with President Roosevelt when the Chief Executive of the Nation was Governor of New York.

"I have remained in public life at great financial sacrifice because I love politics," Farley said. "I have an opportunity now to accept an attractive offer in business and in justice to my family, because of my financial situation, I am going to accept."

"Who's going to win in November?" a reporter asked Farley after he had made this announcement.

"I think I should leave comment on that point to my successor," was the answer.

Farley stated that he had said many times that he believed that the people wanted the Democratic Party to remain in power and that he had not changed his mind and that he would support the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket.

Thus James A. Farley, known as "Genial Jim," passes from the political picture. Now it is up to the new dealers in earnest. It was reported that an old friend said to Farley at Chicago: "Better remain on, Jim. The people will forget you in 6 months if you quit." Farley is reported to have said: "When I quit politics I want the people to forget me. That is okay with me."

There will be many who will miss "Genial Jim." He was a great campaigner and he worked like a man who "loved politics." However, in the rush for the power Jim was thrown aside and much happened that dampened his love for the game. Now he quits to go into business and the good wishes of Democrats and Republicans generally will go along with him. Outside of the fact that he needs money, Jim being on a job that did not give him the opportunity, if he remained honest, to better his condition in life, his opposition to the breaking of the third-term tradition made it impossible for him to continue on without great loss of face.

Good luck, Jim. Hope you win some pennants with the Yankees.

[From the Lancaster (Pa.) Intelligencer Journal of July 20, 1940]

TAKING THE GLAMOUR OUT OF POLITICS

With the refusal of National Chairman James A. Farley to longer continue as chairman for the Democratic Party, much of the glamour will have been taken out of national politics as he retires to private life.

Mr. Farley has everything. He could make friends and hold them; he could meet a man at a grove camp meeting today and a year hence call him by name in a mob of a million. He had a ready answer for every question. He kept his feet on the ground under any and all conditions and last, but not least, he always kept his promises, although to get a definite promise was hard going.

It was Mr. Farley's understanding of people which made the Democratic Party what it has been for 7 years. There were none to say him nay in either major party.

The new national chairman of the Republican Party is a man of ability and worth, but he has little of the "it" Mr. Farley has. We do not know who will be Mr. Farley's successor, but we do know that nothing but Roosevelt luck will snare anyone half so well fitted for the chairmanship of a national party.

The best in sight today is Jack Kelly, the Philadelphia leader, and he is being considered only casually because of factional differences here in Pennsylvania.

[From the Las Vegas (N. Mex.) Evening Review-Journal of July 22, 1940]

ONLY ONE JIM FARLEY

When Jim Farley steps down from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee a few weeks hence, one of the greatest figures in all American political history will retire to private life.

For the past 8 years Jim Farley has been the Democratic Party. He knew more political leaders in every State in the Union than any one man ever has or perhaps ever will. And they were not just acquaintances. They were friends. He so regarded them and they so regarded him. He knew them all by their first names, knew their backgrounds and made it his business to keep track of the state of their health and that of their family.

His smile was the smile of victory. His genial personality was the personification of democracy, and his handclasp sealed a word that was as good as his bond.

It was Farley who brought the Democratic Party back into power after many long, lean years. It was he who organized the entire United States as it had never been organized before. He organized so well that in 1936 he was able to accurately predict the sweeping Democratic victory far beyond the anticipation of the most optimistic administration supporter.

Democrats everywhere will regret the passing of Jim Farley from active leadership of their party. Perhaps no one regrets it more than Franklin D. Roosevelt himself.

Whether there is anyone in the party ranks who can step into Farley's place successfully remains to be seen. One thing is certain, whoever accepts the post, will have turned over to him the most efficient organization ever welded together on a Nation-wide scale. Whether he can keep it thus remains to be seen. It was builded by a genius in his particular field and there's no certainty that it won't take a genius to keep it intact.

There seems no question but that only Jim Farley could have kept New Deal liberals and Jeffersonian conservatives working harmoniously together in the same party for 8 years. Whether he has welded them together with sufficient cohesion to withstand another campaign without his guiding touch remains to be seen.

[From the Lawrence (Mass.) Evening Tribune of July 23, 1940]

THE RETIREMENT OF FARLEY

The retirement of James A. Farley, as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, is a big loss to the Democratic Party. A born organizer and executive he was in large measure responsible for the remarkable success of the party in the last two major campaigns.

He has at all times stood for the principles of the party and for what he believed the party to represent. In this work he has been honest, sincere, and straightforward. Because of that he has earned the respect and esteem of Republicans as well as Democrats. A genial personality has added much to his success.

He has established a record that his successors will find it difficult to equal. Probably none will ever surpass it.

[From the Lexington (Ky.) Herald of August 3, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S RETIREMENT

The retirement of James A. Farley as chairman of the Democratic National Committee will be regretted by all member of the party. Jim Farley's sacrifice in order to engage in public activities is in no way better shown than by the fact that as the head of the New York Yankees he will receive a $75,000 salary and will be free of many of the burdensome details and the constant hammering of political pressure.

At the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, Postmaster General Farley was the most popular man there. He is one man who, with great opportunity for personal achievement in business, preferred to devote his time and talents to the service of his party and his country.

Disappointed, no doubt, in his Presidential ambitions, he nevertheless is too good a soldier and too good a Democrat to sulk in his tent. He has accepted results which were not along the lines he advocated with good grace and sportsmanship. Few men in America have more real and true friends. If Jim Farley ever plans a comeback, the national stage will be set for him. He is, above all, a great American.

[From the Lorain (Ohio) Journal of July 22, 1940]

FAREWELL TO JIM FARLEY

Jim Farley bows out as Democratic national chairman with the best wishes of his associates, the newspapermen, and practically everybody in the party.

No one who listened to the tremendous ovation given Farley at the convention can doubt the popularity of the man who for 8 years was President Roosevelt's major domo.

He is unassuming. He has an amazing memory for names and faces. In 8 years he touched pretty nearly every section of the country. Lorain County Democrats will remember when he swung through on a Middle West tour and dedicated the post office at Oberlin.

Dispenser of patronage involving millions of dollars, he leaves his post not rich, but almost broke. Where now are the cries of Farleydom?

So he writes a book to pay off his immediate debts, admitting that that is the purpose of the book. And he tries to take care of the future with a job, as head of a syndicate buying the New York Yankees baseball team.

The Democratic campaign will miss the power and drive of its Postmaster General chairman.

More than that, however, is the loss to the administration of the last representative of that for which the Democratic Party once stood—leadership earned in the hard rough school of experience and not in the college classroom.

[From the Los Angeles Times]

JIM FARLEY'S DEPARTURE REGRETTED—"SQUARE SHOOTER" LIKED PARTICULARLY BY CAPITAL NEWSPAPER WRITERS

(By Warren B. Francis)

WASHINGTON, July 27.—Departure of James A. Farley from the Democratic national chairmanship is a cause of honest regret in political and legislative circles, but brings most tears from the newspaper corps.

During his 7 years in official life the bluff Irishman from Rockland County, N. Y., has made armies of admiring friends. None have a more affectionate regard, however, than the reporters, columnists, interpreters, and piundits to whom his door never has been closed and with whom he always has been ready to talk with utmost freedom.

The press sincerely hates to see Farley leave, even while understanding the sacrifices he has made, the headaches he has suffered, and the treatment with which he has put up. For the newspaper gang respects him as a hard worker and a good sport who has been widely misunderstood and unappreciated.

Since his arrival, Farley always has been ready to chat about political trends and conditions, to offer advice and prognostications. Politics is his lifeblood, so he derives much enjoyment despite his busy existence from gossiping with the press representatives who find him a fountain of information. He never fails to acknowledge a reporter's phone call or letter.

No newspaperman ever complained that Farley failed to play fair. None ever accused him of not telling the truth. When he couldn't or didn't want to answer questions, he not only said so but normally gave a convincing explanation; he did not resort to subterfuges or dodges. Always he shot straight from the shoulder.

To the reporters who have enjoyed an intimate acquaintance, it has been painful to hear Farley sneeringly described as "Jobmaster General." For there are many instances where "Big Jim" has refused to join a move to heave out some faithful worker; often he has been unwilling to have any part in saddling an incompetent on the taxpayers.

One more thing has won Farley the admiration of the skeptical, suspicious newspaper gang. He deliberately passed up enticing chances to make considerable money out of the New Deal. In marked contrast to so many officeholders, the Postmaster General refused to allow the building-supply concern in which he had an interest to take any Government orders. His feeling that this would be unethical was so strong that business associates have wailed that Farley cost them money.

[From the Los Angeles (Calif.) Times of July 20, 1940]

FARLEY

Out of the settling dust at Chicago one figure stands out with enhanced prestige—that of James A. Farley, who will step down within a month from the post of chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Farley accepted temporary reelection to the post only until the President can find a successor. A gentleman and sportsman to the last, Farley gave as his reason, through Tammany Boss Edward J. Flynn, the necessity of recouping his personal finances. But the country will understand.

More than a year ago Farley was told by the President that the latter had no intention of seeking or accepting a third term and later that Farley was free to seek the nomination for himself. Taking at his word the man to whom he had given the utmost in loyalty and support, and to whom his skill in political organization has been invaluable, Farley proceeded to make his own plans, only to discover, as Al Smith, Raymond Moley, and numerous others have found, that loyalty as Mr. Roosevelt sees it works only in one direction. When the latter's friends stand in his way they cease to be his friends.

That Farley is a machine politician with few scruples as a politician, and no squeamishness as to methods, does not alter the fact that his word, once given, is good, and that there are some things he will not do. It was painfully evident from the creaking and groaning of the Roosevelt machine at Chicago that it was not being managed by Farley, since Farley, when he said he was opposed to a third term, meant it. Instead, it was in the hands of Harry Hopkins; but the President himself had to intervene in the midst of the Vice Presidential balloting to save his chosen candidate from the results of Hopkins' blundering.

The President may get somebody else capable of running his campaign by August 17, the date of Farley's retirement, but Farley's successor will rattle a good deal in Farley's shoes.

[From the Lowell (Mass.) Courier-Citizen of July 18, 1940]

MR. FARLEY

According to a news report, Postmaster General Farley, when he was asked if he would support Mr. Roosevelt, replied about as David Hill did when he was questioned regarding his attitude at a time when the party in New York was not at all harmonious.

"I am a Democrat," represents the attitude of the machine politician. The latter words are often used by the uplifters as an opprobrious epithet. They are not so necessarily. A party cannot get anywhere without a machine, and somebody has to operate it. Party government, preferably 2-party government, seems to be the best method for carrying on democracy, so the machine politician has his place, and it may be an honorable place. Once a man has decided to enter politics on the operating side he cannot afford to sacrifice his usefulness by kicking over the traces whenever he is not personally pleased with the candidates or issues of the moment. If he does this he will not be able to serve the party (in which, of course, for the long pull he believes) when it once more is on what he considers the right track.

So Mr. Farley will be regular, whatever his feelings are regarding the later aspects of the New Deal. For that matter his loyalty has extended so far that he has not given public expression to his personal opinions regarding the Roosevelt policies of the second term. It is supposed that he has been strongly against a third nomination of the President—but he will not oppose a third election.

Mr. Farley will probably go further and help along the cause actively to some extent, but his refusal to go so far as to continue as chairman of the national committee and assume direction of the campaign, if persisted in, may be a contributing cause to Mr. Roosevelt's defeat. Mr. Farley's record is extraordinary. Neither Hoover nor Landon could possibly have won in 1932 and 1936, but the magnitude of both victories of Mr. Roosevelt is generally attributed to Mr. Farley's management. He had a firm grasp of the situation and knew in advance just about what he could count on in the several States.

Furthermore, Mr. Farley not only is a shrewd manager but he is also a harmonizer. The party will not be so thoroughly united in this campaign as it would be if it still had his leadership. He could have done a good deal to mitigate the opposition, or arouse the enthusiasm of those who are doubtful about a third term and the general policies of the perpetual candidate. The retirement of Mr. Farley is a serious, and it may prove to have been a fatal, loss to the party, the more so because he is believed to be influenced by his disapproval of Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy.

[From the Lowell (Mass.) Sun of July 18, 1940]

JIM'S NOT HAPPY

Jim Farley isn't coming out of the Democratic National Convention with anything special except some more experience—unless you count the increased respect and admiration which a lot of people have conceived for him since the party clans started rallying.

That is the Sun's Bruce Catton's impression—and ours, too—of the Postmaster General after following the conduct of affairs at Chicago this week.

Farley, it is said, has been the chief victim of the adroit game by which President Roosevelt killed off all rival candidates for the nomination. Farley had ambitions of his own, but instead of getting a run for his money, he had to go to Chicago and take charge of the ceremonies at which the ashes of his ambitions were quietly laid to rest.

Not once during all the conferences, meetings, and public appearances before and during the convention, did Farley by word or action betray resentment at the way his chief had used him. He wasn't happy, but he didn't whimper, he didn't sulk, and he stayed loyal.

All of which is really worth noticing. Whatever may be said of Farley, you've got to credit him with a good deal of real sportsmanship.

[From the Lowell (Mass.) Sun of July 20, 1940]

THE FINGER FOR FARLEY

The present generation of Democrats will have a hard time getting acclimated to the shadow of the man who isn't there.

We mean Jim Farley, who is resigning as chairman of the Democratic National Committee to re-enter private business after a meteoric career in the political life of this Nation.

Farley died a martyr's death at the Chicago convention, although he probably had little justification for Presidential ambitions in the first place. He came from the wrong side of the tracks. He could not compete against back-room influence and machine control when they were directed at him.

The Postmaster General, however, was always completely frank as to his position on every issue, but this marks the first time he was known to take refuge in silence. His heart must have been heavy at Chicago when his well-known partisan allegiance was forgotten in the "blitzkrieg" dictated by Washington.

Party loyalty—what does it mean, after all? Jim Farley must be in a wondering mood today. How many other Democrats are in the same boat?

JIM FARLEY STILL EXISTS

It is rather hard to picture the Democratic national scene without Jim Farley. The picturesque Postmaster General, a self-made man if ever there was one, provided color on the American scene which will be lacking in the future.

Farley was always a practical man. He was the man who remembered thousands of names of minor political leaders throughout the land from San Francisco to Bangor. He knew humanity in the raw, and humanity in its high moments. He had, and has, a complete comprehension of the common man, the plain, everyday citizen whose help is called upon every election day.

The Democratic Party owes a lot to Jim Farley. In retiring to private life, he is not wholly through with politics, in our opinion. He will exert an influence in many sectors of the Democratic Party.

[From the Lynchburg (Va.) News of July 20, 1940]

JAMES A. FARLEY

The one man who comes out of the bedlam of the Chicago stadium with enhanced prestige is James A. Farley.

The country has known him as a politician. He has been that and a good one. The country has known him as a genial fellow with a flair for remembering names and faces and for giving all the sundry a beaming smile and a glad hand, "just a big Elk at large," as he once described himself. The country has known him as a loyal Democrat and a loyal friend who sometimes got what he would describe, if he were inclined to whimper, "a raw deal" from the New Deal.

And that about summed up what the country as a whole thought of Jim Farley.

His close friends and he had many, knew better. They knew that he had convictions and would stick to them and that sticking to them sometimes cost him a great deal he would have liked to have. They knew that though bad treatment could not make a rift in his personal loyalty, his loyalty could not sway him to action he believed inimical to the best interests of his country. They knew his courage, his determination, his devotion to fair play.

Now the country knows it. Jim Farley is the one man who comes out of that Chicago bedlam with enhanced prestige.

[From the Lynn (Mass.) Daily Evening Item, July 27, 1940]

FARLEY'S POPULARITY

It appears that nearly all the nice things to be said about a national politician this year were reserved for Postmaster General James A. Farley. And why was that? He isn't a scholar, great statesman, or an outstanding administrator of a department of the Government. He isn't weak, and he doesn't bend easily.

He is the one big man in the Government who never gets mad, never says unkind or hurtful things about anybody. He is Gentleman Jim Farley, nothing more.

That explains why he is one of the country's most popular citizens.

[From the Manchester Union of July 22, 1940]

FARLEY'S RETIREMENT

Probably no political figure ever left the political stage accompanied by more genuine well wishes than Jim Farley. Throughout his 7 years at Washington as Postmaster General, and during his term as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Mr. Farley has steadily made friends in Republican as well as in Democratic ranks.

There has been a geniality, a straightforwardness about him that the American people like. It has not been without good reason that he has been called "Sunny Jim." Moreover, in an exceedingly difficult place he has refused to surrender the principles of democracy, and has stood squarely for what he believed the Democratic Party to represent.

The good will of the American people has been deepened also by the feeling that somehow Farley got a raw deal. Americans like fair play. They like what they are accustomed to call a square deal. They recognize that after holding the chief responsibility for the Roosevelt successes in 1932 and 1936, Farley's refusal to go along with a third-term movement by new dealers in the administration made him an enemy to that coterie of self-seeking admirers of Mr. Roosevelt.

When the third-term movement succeeded, there was nothing to do but get in line with it or step out. Farley stepped out. Rather than surrender his own conviction on a third term he gave up his career in politics and went back into the business world.

In this retirement, the New Deal campaign suffers a severe blow. For Farley is a great organizer. He knows Democratic leaders everywhere and he knows how to get their cooperation. His skill in organization was a great factor in the two Roosevelt landslides in 1932 and 1936. It will be difficult to find a man as efficient and as colorful to take over his work as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and particularly so at this late stage of the game.

FARLEY LEAVES

The national political scene won't be the same in the months to come with "Genial Jim" Farley removed.

Shrewd, fair, enterprising, and cordial, the New York politician won a warm spot in the hearts of Americans, both Democrats and Republicans alike, for the splendid record he made as administrative head of a national party.

This results from the fact that Farley took his job as national Democratic chairman at its face value and worked for the party's success. At the same time, he kept himself clear of the machinations of the New Deal in Washington.

We have admired Mr. Farley for this fact. That this admiration is shared by other members of the press was shown in Chicago last night when correspondents who covered the convention tendered him a farewell dinner.

They paid tribute to him as a truthful, sincere, and able statesman and politician. This appraisal, we believe, will be generally echoed throughout the United States.

[From the Macon (Ga.) Telegraph of July 17, 1940]

PASSING OF FARLEY

A few hours will tell the tale, but informed correspondents at the Chicago convention are practically unanimous in their forecast that James A. Farley will resign as Postmaster General and chairman of the National Democratic Committee in order to become president and part owner of the New York Yankees.

Reports are definite that a syndicate has been formed to buy the Yankee franchise for $4,000,000, and it has been known for a long time that Farley wanted to do something to recoup his private fortune.

The report is current in Chicago that Farley told the President in their recent Hyde Park conference that he would have retired 4 years ago to enter private business if he had not been given assurances that he would have administration support for a place on the national ticket as President or Vice President.

He is represented as feeling particularly resentful toward the inner circle of the New Deal, such as Tommy Corcoran and Harry Hopkins, who are leading the movement to "draft Roosevelt."

Theme songs are an important part of every convention, and it was noted at Chicago that when Farley arose to make what was looked upon as his farewell speech the organist dropped into Take Me Out to the Ball Game.

Mr. Farley has had his share of criticism during the years he has been at the head of the Post Office Department. The abrupt cancelation of civilian contracts to carry the air mail and the sudden substitution of Army flyers to take over the job cost a number of lives.

When strikers in 1937 picketed industrial plants and refused to permit the delivery of the United States mail, Mr. Farley was blamed severely for compromising with the situation.

But from time immemorial the office of Postmaster General has been regarded as a political job, and Farley's loyalty to the party and to the leader of the party whom he had served so faithfully through the years was beyond question.

His determination to retire from the chairmanship of the national committee is said to be absolutely fixed. Every possible effort is being made to induce him to change his mind and take charge of the next campaign, but unless all signs fail he will throw in his lot with the Yankees and leave active politics to his successor as chairman of the national committee.

Farley has grown immensely in public esteem in the last few years, and he will carry into retirement the affection and esteem of thousands of good Democrats who wish him well in whatever he may undertake.

[From the Meriden (Conn.) Record of July 20, 1940]

FARLEY LEAVES THE STAGE

Amid the din and oratory of the Democratic National Convention, much of it mechanical, professional, and not too genuine, as major party conventions go, some sounds and words were heard in striking contrast to the hub-bub of such an occasion—the warmly sincere tributes paid to the national chairman, Postmaster General James A. Farley.

There could be sensed, far away, an atmosphere akin to sadness among delegates who well knew the high-minded quality of his public service, and who realized that the tide carrying them on toward participation in a tradition-smashing campaign had already swept him aside in favor of men unheard of when he began his great work of organization 8 years ago.

If there can be found, down deep, a heart and soul in politics, it was displayed in the attitude of the convention. Many a delegate declared, some over the networks, "We would like to vote for Mr. Farley, but we are bound to vote for the President." Such expressions, unmistakably, were more from the heart—in honest tribute to a good American—than one often encounters in the hard, selfish game of political warfare.

Jim Farley long ago saw what was to happen at Chicago. That was why he accepted Presidential support from Massachusetts and held it to the time of balloting. He insisted that, as far as he was concerned, there would have to be some semblance of democratic procedure in the selection of the nominee.

He held his peace and kept a disciplined tongue in cheek, while he saved for his party a dying trace of an orderly, American political process, in preventing others from robbing a political convention of all its independence of thought and action through a trumped-up, maneuvered draft that is yet to be revealed fully in its completely synthetic form.

Then, as the night ended with the third term tradition sacrificed and a new campaign about to be launched, the chairman, swallowing the fact that his powers long ago had been usurped by Presidential intimates, and concealing a full measure of chagrin caused by events around him, showed the delegates his caliber by taking it all with kindly graciousness and without the slightest sign of rancor.

This Nation owes Jim Farley a debt of gratitude, unique in political annals. He is getting it today, in acknowledgement of having given long years of upright, decent public service of the kind so much claimed and envisioned, but so rarely demonstrated. In all his career he has not been known to say an unkindly, vicious word about anyone, even of opponents not so scrupulous in their choice of weapons.

He may be remembered superficially for predictions of uncanny accuracy, which were of but passing significance. But, more important, he will long hold a high place in public esteem because he elevated to a higher plane the art of practical politics. That some associates, as indicated, would tear down what he builded so well, reflects greater glory upon him.

[From the Miami (Fla.) Daily News of July 20, 1940]

GOOD-BYE JIM FARLEY

It turns out, as everyone knew in advance, that Jim Farley's determination to quit the national Democratic chairmanship was not subject to revision. A good sport, even in the well of bitterness, he has agreed to serve until August 17, to help the new organization through its birth pains. No further demand upon him could reasonably be made by his party.

Thus passes into what we hope will be a most happy and prosperous private enterprise a man who has served his country with immense ability and fidelity and who has come to be not only respected but beloved by tens of millions. Jim Farley, true enough, was a politician. His horizons were not the distant tree lines of the statesman. But he represented all that was amiable, honest, decent, and square-shooting in the politician. He had a mind without tarnish, a personality without pretensions, and a heart devoid of meanness.

His personal stature was nowhere more cleanly outlined than at Chicago, where he never wavered in dignity, loyalty, and sportsmanship in the face of the most trying conditions.

[From the Miami Herald of July 17, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S GETHSEMANE

James A. Farley retired gallantly Monday night as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, without one word of reproach to the Chief, without one word to indicate any deviation from his faith in the public policies that have been the guiding star of the party he has served so well.

His address of farewell, coupled with a report of his stewardship as chairman of the party for 8 years, was a masterly survey of the party's accomplishments, as he reads the record, and a sincere tribute to the administration that had kept its word to the American people during two terms in office.

It was a fighting Democratic speech; a promise to take the fight to the Republican Party and its candidate, Wendell L. Willkie, rather than allow the extremely vocal Willkie to assume the offensive.

It was just such a speech as the people might have expected from the Farley of 1932, when he and Franklin D. Roosevelt were crusading in almost holy zeal to free the people from the economic woes which had all but engulfed them. It was delivered with the same fire that has been characteristic of Jim Farley during the years he has directed the Democratic Party's battles before the people.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Farley held a press conference and invited nearly 100 newspapermen and women to "toss the book at him." They literally did, even asking some questions that were all but impertinent, rather than pertinent. He answered them all unhesitatingly, explaining in painstaking detail exactly what he meant to convey, when someone misunderstood the import of his reply.

And finally, pinned down under adroit questioning of experienced Washington correspondents, he, by forceful implications, pledged his undivided support to President Roosevelt, in the event of the President's nomination for a third term.

"I am a Democrat," said Mr. Farley in effect. "A Democrat as I see it, believes in majority rule. When a candidate has attained a majority, I contend he then is entitled to a convention vote making his selection unanimous. As a good Democrat, naturally, I shall support the nominee of my party."

Jim Farley may be bitter over the explosion of whatever political dreams he may have entertained. But whatever else he may be, no man can say he is a poor sport. No man can say he isn't loyal to the political faith through which he became a great national leader of our times.

[From the East Wenatchee (Wash.) Journal of August 1940]

JIM FARLEY

Out of public life, on the coming 17th of August, goes a man who will be remembered as one of the truly great in the field of politics. But does he go out of public life? Somehow we can't think of that great organizer, that great maker of a President, that great maker of enduring and honest friendships, as being through.

Somehow we vision him running for the Governorship of the great commonwealth of New York. We see him overwhelmingly elected and a potential candidate for the Presidency in 1944. We see his friends throughout the Nation demanding his candidacy for the great office. We see him nominated and triumphantly elected.

This country needs men of the type of Jim Farley. His stature grew in seeming defeat. The men and women of the Democratic Party know that he is an honest, courageous, and upright gentleman who never goes back on a promised word, who is big enough, fine enough, and honorable enough to realize that, in the long run the old saying that,

"To thine own self be true,
And it will follow as the night the day,
Thou cannot then be false to any man"

Is a mighty good axiom to live by.

FARLEY IS HERO IN CHICAGO SHOW—ROOSEVELT GETS THIRD-TERM NOMINATION BUT GENIAL JIM WINS PLAUDITS OF CROWD

(By C. C. Hemenway, editor of the Hartford Times)

CHICAGO.—If this convention had not already written itself down as the most bizarre on record, it so established itself last night. Mr. Roosevelt has his third nomination, but if he was listening to the proceedings he may have had moments when he doubted the wisdom of trying for it.

Although nearly 900 of slightly less than 1,100 votes were the President's on the first and only ballot, that came like pulling teeth. There was as much rowing and wrangling before they were recorded as though a tight battle was fought.

The votes of numerous delegations were disputed, and in several cases polls were insisted upon, which revealed the ugly feelings the third-term drive had engendered.

The nomination went to Roosevelt, but the man of the evening much of the time during the convention was Postmaster General Farley.

CHEERS FOR FARLEY

Farley had predicted that when the contest was all over his conduct would have been such as would satisfy all sides. When he had taken the platform and made a speech that was more manly than it was logical not only the delegates but the galleries gave evidence by their tumult of applause and cheering that the satisfaction was both actual and eminent.

Next to Farley, the hero perhaps was aged CARTER GLASS, who left a bed of sickness and traveled a thousand miles to nominate Farley and then told the convention some caustic things to which it was not eager to listen, about the violation of the third-term tradition.

GLASS' appearance was reminiscent of days when William J. Bryan baited gallery mobs with his defiances and was alternately booed and cheered. GLASS said he came from a sick bed, but his voice sounded as though it was from the tomb. It was hoarse and raucous, so weak at first that it could scarcely be heard over the excellent amplifying system. When the microphones had been adjusted it was strong and firm, although as rough as that of a circus barker.

TRIBUTE BY GLASS

However, the 82-year-old Senator and bridgegroom had something to say and he said it in his accustomed acid manner. His tribute to Farley was high, as "an unconquerable Democrat who has conducted the affairs of the party in a way that no man in my recollection of 40 years in public service ever has done."

It was not difficult to guess to whom GLASS also had in mind when he alluded to Farley as "a man on whose word every human being can rely, who never in a lifetime violated a pledge."

Then he stirred the gallery by alluding to a matter that had been the unwritten law of the Democratic Party since the day of Thomas Jefferson and recalled Jefferson's urging, 3 months before this death, that the party should never nominate a President for a third time. That brought boos and hisses, but CARTER GLASS is not easily scared. There were almost as many cheers for him and his words as there were hoots.

The convention operated on the same mad-house procedure that has marked much of its deliberations, if such they may be called. It had a rule limiting nominating speeches to 20 minutes and second to 5 minutes in length and four in number. Then when Governor Olson of California, Senator Maloney, Governor Lehman of New York, and Senator Pepper of Florida had used up the four Roosevelt second talks, Chairman Barkley invited all other States which wished to second the nomination of any candidate to do so in a word as their names were called.

SECONDING SPEECHES

The result was a series of seconding speeches which dragged out the roll call interminably. The Roosevelt drive leaders apparently wanted a second from every State. Nevada and South Dakota passed their turns to nominate or second. BARKLEY called them again at the end and fairly insisted that they join in the seconding.

The Nevada spokesman finally rose to the point of order that a State "did not have to offer a seconding speech if it did not wish to." BARKLEY agreed, but only with reluctance did he let the matter drop. South Dakota also held off, but BARKLEY succeeded in pulling the Philippines in.

When that was all over came actual balloting, and what a struggle. There was no trouble until Massachusetts was reached. The State supposedly was instructed for Farley at the start. Then it developed that some delegates interpreted the instructions as holding only if Roosevelt "did not run." The stentorian and defiant tones in which many of the delegates announced their choice indicated the degree of feeling the dispute has caused. There were amusing answers.

One woman declared she had been pledged to vote for Farley, but had promised in her campaign to vote for Roosevelt if she was elected. She was and she did pledge notwithstanding. Another was pledged to Roosevelt and voted for him, but wished she could vote for Farley. When one delegate said he must vote for Roosevelt because that was the pledge of his district convention, the next declared he voted for Roosevelt with pleasure, and the following recorded himself similarly with "double pleasure."

It was noticeable that the delegates who voted for Roosevelt explained that their instructions for Farley held only if the President did not run, which seemed strange, since the President's message to the convention declared he was not running and did not wish to be nominated.

GAIN OF FRACTION

The upshot of it was that Farley gained a fraction over a vote as result of the poll. The sequel to the Massachusetts row came when Senator DAVID I. WALSH rose to second Farley's latter motion that the nomination of Roosevelt be made unanimous. WALSH explained that former Governor Ely had handed in his credentials and walked out of the convention in face of that move, but that all the rest of the Massachusetts votes were ready to go to the President.

When Minnesota was recorded for Roosevelt Congressman RYAN wanted a poll. It was partially taken and then explanation was offered that though the delegation was instructed for Roosevelt, its members stood 21 for him and 1, RYAN, for Farley. That was what RYAN wanted to bring out, and he withdrew his demand for the poll.

Indicative of the restlessness and dissatisfaction which has been apparent among the delegates, it was revealed when New York was called that delegates casting 3½ votes, and their alternates had not taken the trouble to attend the convention. The President did not have his own State unanimously. He got 64½ votes, and Farley had 25, while 1 was cast for Cordell Hull.

One Washington woman declined to vote at all, as there was no candidate before the convention who could be depended upon to keep the country out of war. Another from the State was for Roosevelt because he was for the "poorly clad man."

NINE-TO-ONE SHOT

With the President almost a 9-to-1 shot in the balloting, this all made no sense, but it went on. Another Washington woman from "the biggest county in the United States, by a dam site" was for Roosevelt, "who built that dam."

West Virginia, too, had difficulty in recording its vote to the satisfaction of all its delegates and had to have a poll. Roosevelt had only something like 800 of the 1,100 votes by this time, but the boys in the various State trenches were fighting as though they had a chance.

The call finally ended, and at once Congressman RAYBURN was on his feet to transfer Garner's Texas votes to Roosevelt. Then there came the strange spectacle of a candidate himself taking the rostrum to withdraw.

Farley got a tumultuous ovation. When he finally got a chance to speak he declared he had acted from deepest conviction, to his party and his country. He had wanted the convention to proceed as Democrats should, to vote the matter out in open meeting. That had been done, and he had been beaten, and he accepted the result.

"Down through the years," said Farley, "I have always given my best efforts to advance the cause of democracy and I want the delegates to know that I will give the same support to the nominees of this convention."

MADE UNANIMOUS

Thus Farley made good the prediction of his press conferences that the nomination would eventually be made unanimous and his promise that he would support it. He moved to suspend the rules and make the nomination unanimous by acclamation.

Senator WALSH followed to second and explain the Bay State rumpus. Senator TYDINGS joined in. His forces had stood out for a great principle and lost. They believed in the two-party system "and it was evident that a great majority of the delegates wanted Roosevelt." He bowed to their will. The Governor of Tennessee said that Cordell Hull, who got one vote from New York, was not and had never been a candidate. He did not say that Hull joined in supporting Roosevelt for a third term.

Probably there never was a convention before in which the actual winning of a nomination was not followed by a demonstration. But, instead of marching and cheering for Roosevelt, when Farley's motion had passed, the whole crowd rose, led by a radio star, and sang When Irish Eyes Are Smiling, for Jim as a swell fellow, a swell Democrat, and a swell Irishman. In fact, although he did not get the votes it seemed, as it has on so many occasions, to be Jim's show.

There was a Roosevelt demonstration, of course, but it had come much earlier in the evening when Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama, had nominated him in strictly southern oratory. It seemed at first that he was about to name BANKHEAD, but it turned out that he would like to do that but was nominating Roosevelt instead.

It is, he said, "no time for untried hands to pilot the ship of state." It took the Roosevelt forces, which had marchers from practically all the delegations, 23 minutes to work off their enthusiasm in parading and cheering. GARNER, too, got an ovation after he was placed in nomination. It didn't last long but he had the only color, a parade of cowboys with a cowboy band, headed by the United States and Texas flags and with a cowboy vocalist to do a couple of songs. GARNER'S was the only band that paraded. He got 60 votes, including his 46 from Texas.

Politics does other peculiar things than make strange bedfellows. In the same hall 8 years ago where there was a savage effort to prevent Roosevelt from getting his first nomination, the same party which then named him only after a tussle, last night lined up State after State to toss out of the window a tradition of fundamental policy as old as itself and insist that he take a third nomination.

WENT DOWN WITH COLORS FLYING—MR. FARLEY EMERGED AS MOST CONSISTENT FIGURE IN DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

The man who comes out of the Democratic National Convention with the most credit is James A. Farley. Throughout the proceedings he stood steadfastly for maintaining the precedent established by Jefferson against a third-term nomination for any President, comments the Hartford Courant. He made known his views long before the movement started to "draft" Mr. Roosevelt for another nomination.

In his customary outspoken but affable manner he advised the President to respect this great and wise tradition. He had good reason to believe at one time that his counsel would be heeded; in fact, his assurances were such that he announced his own intention to become a candidate. When he saw that the situation had changed and that delegates were being rounded up in the President's behalf he let it be known that that would make no difference to him and that he would stick it out to the end. And this he did. He went down with his colors flying but never once did he lose his good nature.

He saw Secretary Hopkins, who has been living at the White House of late, assuming roles that he himself had customarily played at such Democratic gatherings, but if it hurt his pride he gave no outward indication of it. However, he firmly insisted for the good of the party in having his way in certain matters. He would not permit the President's more ardent enthusiasts to try for an immediate nomination by acclamation. He demanded that the convention exemplify, so far as it was possible in the circumstances, all the democratic processes customarily observed. The proposal to dispense with a roll call met with his emphatic objection. "If you do that," he said, "you might as well not hold an election in November." Shrewd, straight-thinking politician that he is, he could look beyond July to November, which was more than some of the others could do.

The real attitude of the delegates toward him, bound and delivered, as most of them were, to the President, was shown first when his name was placed in nomination by the venerable Senator GLASS, of Virginia, and then by the spontaneous ovation that greeted him when he took the platform after the roll call to express his thanks for such support as he had received and to add his votes to those that had been chalked up for Mr. Roosevelt. The band struck up Irish Eyes Are Smiling, the vast audience chimed in, and "Sunny Jim" looked supremely happy, as he had a right to be.

When historians write the story of this convention of the Democratic Party, it is likely they will say that James A. Farley was about the biggest figure there, not only physically but in other respects. Lambasted and ridiculed early in his national political career as incapable of rising above his old-time Tammany affiliations, he stands today high in the estimation of the public. He has shown qualities of mind and heart, strength of character, and devotion to principle that have made him hosts of friends and admirers everywhere.

[From the New Orleans (La.) Times-Picayune of July 22, 1940]

MR. FARLEY BOWS OUT

James A. Farley's withdrawal from politics and public life is regretted by tens of thousands of Democrats—perhaps by the President-candidate himself. Mr. Farley led two successful campaigns for Mr. Roosevelt; no Democratic leader has a wider acquaintance nor such intimate knowledge of campaign technique and details; none has served Mr. Roosevelt more loyally. With his notice of retirement went the assurance of "full support to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket." But all men know that it must have taken more than "an attractive offer in business" to pull the genial Postmaster General away from the political life and service he loves so well.

It has been repeatedly and insistently asserted, without denial from him, that Mr. Farley opposed the violation of the unwritten law against third Presidential terms even by the chieftain he has served so long and so devotedly. There have been no less insistent reports that the Postmaster General was the reverse of ardent in his support of certain of the schemes put forward by New Deal extremists close to the President. These differences, according to Washington writers, imposed a perceptible strain upon the Roosevelt-Farley relationship; as the influence of the New Deal insiders grew, that of Mr. Farley correspondingly declined.

In his address Thursday night the President sent his affectionate greetings to his "old friend Farley." Perhaps he would have welcomed the "old friend's" continuance at the head of the national committee. But there is a much greater probability, amounting almost to a certainty, that the New Deal group which engineered the third-term movement is glad to have Mr. Farley out of their way because they do not like his kind of democracy. Not all New Dealers are Democrats, and the converse is, of course, equally true: Not all Democrats are New Dealers. Our guess is that the explanation of Mr. Farley's retirement is to be found in one or other or both of these facts, rather than in "business opportunity."

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

CHICAGO, July 20.—It is not given to every man to listen to the eulogies of his own wake, but Jim Farley has enjoyed that experience this week, and, from the early signs at a testimonial party yesterday afternoon, I speculate that before dawn more than one loving friend of Mr. Farley will be called outside to decide with another which one has known him the longer and admires him the more. The testimonial lunch and the testimonial dinner, as a rule, are tawdry travesties on friendship arranged by pushful satellites with intent to ingratiate themselves with the guest of honor or conspired in cold blood as a means of selling at $5 a place the standard dollar blue plate and a lot of drinks for the benefit of some one who runs a restaurant. In known cases, the promoters have taken back the satchel or loving cup presented to the monkey amid flower pots of praiseful saying and put them aside to serve the same purpose again.

The little ceremonies for Mr. Farley yesterday were arranged wholly and almost devoutly in his honor by the journalists, men and women, of the Washington corps who have known him since 1932, or a little while before, and were attended by other reporters from many cities who have met him on his tours.

Walter Trohan, Turner Catledge, and some lady journalist whom I did not recognize made little speeches in presenting him with unpretentious gifts which were not reclaimed as he went out, and James himself spoke off the record in a manner which could not heighten the company's admiration but made them wish he might be quoted so the public might fully enjoy knowing Jim.

Not by any word or sign from Mr. Farley has the public learned this week of the shabby treatment which he has suffered; and inasmuch as he has not indicated hurt or resentment, even by the subtle sign or the rolling eye of the martyr, I will not spoil the party. He does not want to be pitied or to exploit the ingratitude which has been shown him, to the detriment of the Democratic Party, which still ranks about third in his loyalties, after God and country, and just in front of the American League.

Jim has been the biggest man in Chicago this week, and it is unfortunate that I have bound myself not to be mean, because only by standing him alongside others would it be possible to show the size of him. He has personified the best qualities of the Irish-American in politics, and his conduct and character should be an example and warning, as I know they will not be, to others of the same persuasion. But it can be said that Jim Farley was not among the men that Father Lord, the noted Jesuit journalist, had in mind when he wrote his strong but little-read spiritual admonition to Catholic captains of American politics entitled "Open Letter to a Boss."

Almost 6 years ago Jim was planning to retire from the Cabinet, having, as he claimed, put the Post Office Department on a self-sustaining basis, and go back into business to make some money for his family. Now, having waived many opportunities to recoup, he goes out not merely broke but owing money.

In contrast to those politicians who acquire savings and profits far in excess of their total pay during their years in office, Jim served at a great sacrifice, for the job entailed expenses out of proportion to the pay and allowances.

It has been said that just as Jim made President Roosevelt 8 years ago, the President this week, by a negative process, made Jim, and that is not acrimony. It was his clean deportment under these conditions which suddenly made the convention realize that the finest man in the party was being driven out of its councils.

It has been only a few years since the term "Farleyism" was used to describe the spoils system, because Jim was the jobmaster of the new administration, as though spoils were something which he had just invented. Farley took it without flinching, although he was just carrying the target for the entire party. And political prigs, calling themselves idealists, who made a show of holding their noses at the sordidness of Farleyism, later exploited the want of the destitute and the money power placed in their hands to create a spoils system much more dangerous and ruthless.

DEMOCRATS ON THE SIDE LINES

Disapproving flippant flouting of the third-term tradition by a totalitarianized Democratic National Convention, disgusted with the megalomaniacal complex "I am the only one," heartsick from the callous ingratitude of the man whose political creator he was, "Big Jim" Farley will resign the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee, of which he has been the backbone and mainstay for 8 years.

His refusal to be associated with the third-term campaign is typical of that of a host of sincere, patriotic big men of the party which has been "blitzkrieged" by political dictatorship.

They will have no part or parcel of the effort to obtain ratification at the polls of the Roosevelt junking of a national tradition made unwritten law by the approval and example of men whose statesmanship prevented them from playing greasy politics in alliance with corrupt State and municipal machines.

They, like "Big Jim," will retire to the side lines and watch the Rooseveltian revolutionaries plunge to the terrific rebuke which is formulating for expression at the polls in November.

It would be interesting to see how they mark their ballots.

MOSTLY ABOUT PEOPLE—FARLEY, STOPPED BY F. D., WON BY ACCLAMATION AS "SWELLEST GUY"

(By Karl B. Pauly)

Most popular and universally beloved person at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago last week was big, bald, smiling-eyed James Aloysius Farley, who for 8 years has been the party's national chairman. His was an acclamation from the heart of the convention.

Even the hard-boiled press broke down, after the convention, and gave Farley—of all things—a reception, bestowed gifts upon him, and with misty eyes sang When Irish Eyes Are Smiling.

Turner Catledge, the hard-facts political reporter of the New York Times, sounded the keynote of the reception when he said: "Many times we have heard prominent figures in our country tell us newspaper men and women that they never new us to break a confidence. Well, we're here today to honor a man in public life who never broke a confidence with a newspaperman."

Jim, the gallery of political newspaper men and women agree, is the ace of straight shooters.

Farley's technique with newspaper reporters has been perfect. He is frank and open with them. He has never misled them. If he feels he should not answer one of their gimletlike questions he says flatly, "I am not at liberty to say about that," or "I don't want to say anything about that," or "I don't think I had better answer that one just yet." If he said he would answer a question later he always would.

Such men are rare. Small wonder the gentlemen and the ladies of the press love Jim Farley.

Jim Farley has always cherished the hope—that divine right of American boys—that he might one day be President. He "made" a President once, and possibly Franklin D. Roosevelt has yet to learn just how much Farley's time, efforts, advice, and counsel meant to him in his two successful campaigns.

Farley wanted to be President. When people told him that his religion stood in the way, he would not believe it. He knew the Constitution guaranteed the right to worship God as a man pleases. He could defend that Constitution with every fiber of his soul. When he heard that the President—the one he had helped make—had said that Farley would not be acceptable even for the Vice Presidency on a ticket with Hull, because that would make Hull a "stalking horse for the Pope," it was a rude blow.

But Farley remained a gentleman. He didn't give out any ugly interviews. He just smiled—but there was a hurt look in his eyes.

As the time drew nearer for the 1940 campaign, he wondered what his role would be. If President Roosevelt had called Farley in and said: "Jim, you know I've got to have you running my campaign this year," it's a 10-to-1 bet Farley would have grasped the President's hand and accepted.

But the President was silent. Then Farley began to think again about the future of his family and how much salary he could probably draw as the head of some big enterprise. He decided it was time to step down as national chairman. So he went to see the President at Hyde Park and had a conference which he termed "satisfactory."

In other words, Farley read the President's mind. The President had no room for Jim any more. It was "satisfactory" to Jim because now nothing stood in his way of taking that big job and providing amply for the future of his wife and his three children.

Jim Farley wanted the Democratic National Convention of 1940 to remain free and open. He had no illusions about his being nominated for President. But he wanted his party, the one he had headed for 8 years, to meet in free assembly and by time-honored and time-tried methods reach a sober, solemn conclusion. He knew that there was dictatorship within his party, but he didn't want his party to yield without a sincere, firm protest.

So, as the New Deal strategists angled for a unanimous renomination for President Roosevelt, he reiterated daily that his own name would go before the convention as a candidate and that he would not release his delegates before the roll call started. He said he believed that in the end the nomination should be made unanimous for whoever had won, but that it shouldn't start out that way.

At the same time, he said he was not going to ask anyone to vote for him who didn't want to. "I have never asked anyone to do that and I never shall," he said.

It worked out just as Farley predicted. Once somebody at a press conference said: "Jim, Harry L. Hopkins says Farley will not get more than 65 or 70 votes. What do you say to that?" And Farley replied, "I think that's a lot of votes for Farley to get and I am very proud of the fact that he can get that many votes for President in the Democratic National Convention."

Farley got 72$^{27}/_{30}$ votes which, while it may show how nearly the New Deal crowd had his strength pegged, also shows how firmly his friends stood by him—how right they knew he was.

Then, in addition to all this, Farley was opposed to a third term. He felt the country would be departing from one of its soundest traditions—a tradition which transcended party and expediency, a tradition which the early great men of our country realized would keep us a republic as contrasted with the "divine right" rule which had blighted Europe.

So Jim Farley, the son of a poor widow, who worked hard and worked up, who had ascetic habits and attended church regularly and enjoyed dancing and a not-too-solemn life, climbed the ladder of success.

He was a member of the New York boxing commission under Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt and by that time was already a veteran county chairman in New York State. He went to work for Roosevelt for President in 1931 and sold him to the country. He covered the country first and sewed up the votes so that even a powerful coalition couldn't beat him down in the convention of 1932.

Since 1933 Farley has honorably and without a breath of scandal directed the affairs of the national party organization and those of the Post Office Department, as its chief.

He will stay in office as national chairman long enough to launch the 1940 campaign and then, a month from now, he will step down, making way for a man who will be the choice of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

TRIBUTE TO FARLEY PAID BY REPORTERS—RETIRING CHAIRMAN OF DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE IS GUEST AT FAREWELL RECEPTION BY PRESS; LEAVES POST ON AUGUST 17

(By James L. Kilgallen, International New Service staff correspondent)

CHICAGO, July 20.—"Good-bye and good luck, Jim," was the tenor of a farewell reception given by the press to James A. Farley, retiring chairman of the Democratic National Committee, before he returned today to New York to wind up his political affairs preparatory to entering private business.

It was an unusual, straight-from-the-heart tribute to Farley, who has grown in the esteem of the press during the convention, if that were possible. They gave him several presents, including a watch, a baseball, and a first baseman's mitt. But the big thing was the affection they showed toward Farley and the manner in which he showed his appreciation.

SINCERE FAREWELL

Many of the newspapermen and editors delayed their departure for home to be present at the farewell to Farley. It was a sincere farewell, too, and Jim knew it. No man in public life could have drawn such a reception from Washington correspondents, New York reporters, and the chief political writers of the newspapers of America.

They said nice things to Jim, and Jim made quite a speech himself, mostly off the record, but straight from the heart. Here was a man leaving the game of politics, which he admits he loves, but he left knowing the press was behind him 100 percent in their well wishes for his future.

Farley probably is soon to take over the job of heading the New York American League Baseball Club, but he didn't say much about that. He did say he always has been an "American League fan" and he made it clear the door would always be "wide open" for the newspapermen who, he said, never violated his confidence.

WILL CLEAN UP AFFAIRS

From now until August 17, Farley will devote his time to cleaning up affairs at the New York headquarters of the Democratic Party so that everything will be ready for his successor who will run Franklin D. Roosevelt's 1940 campaign for a third term.

Along about August 1, President Roosevelt and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, the Vice Presidential nominee, will meet with a subcommittee of the Democratic National Committee and choose a successor to the astute Farley, who in 1932 and 1936 successfully put over Roosevelt's campaigns.

Farley won't quit politics entirely. He will retain his job as head of the New York Democratic State Committee and he will support the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. Whether he will make any campaign speeches, however, has not been determined.

He will relinquish his Cabinet post as Postmaster General, but the announcement of this change will come from President Roosevelt.

Farley made it clear he will submerge his third-term convictions and work for the success of the Democratic Party in the November election. He is getting out without any rancor in his heart and apparently holds no ill will toward anybody.

The job of running the Yankees and its "farm" system will be a "cinch" for Farley, whose middle name is work. He confided to the press that he is one of those "saps" who get up every morning at 7:30 a. m. looking for something to do. He will be perfectly at home in a box back of third base and giving out interviews with the sports writers, with whom he previously had contact when he was chairman of the New York State Boxing Commission.

Farley jokingly expressed the hope that the Washington correspondents and political writers wouldn't lose contact with him, for he wants to "keep in touch," and said, he knows, from past experience, that they always know the low-down."

The press merely gave Farley casual assurance that they'd be around. He knew how they felt, from cub reporter to top-notch scribe. There was no necessity of putting anything in writing between Jim Farley and the press of America.

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Times of July 26, 1940]

WASHINGTON

(By Bulkley Griffin)

WASHINGTON.—It has become the fashion to write articles laudatory of Jim Farley. The practice has more warrant than most fashions. Jim Farley was the most popular man at Chicago; only the arrival of President Roosevelt could have taken that honor from him. The presence of so many newspapermen at the convention, a great many of whom did not know Farley or the esteem in which he has always been held by the Washington reporters, contributed to the current flow of pro-Farley articles.

One newspaperman on the scene put it this way: "They talk about George Washington and Babe Ruth and such being examples to the youth of the Nation; Jim Farley belongs in that group." The statement contains more than a germ of truth. It was a fine exhibition of sportsmanship that Jim Farley gave. It was a fine demonstration of human nature and politics and citizenship. The most dramatic moment of the convention came after the President's nomination when Jim stood on the stage and, smiling, joined in that lilting Irish song that Chairman BARKLEY, with good timing and discrimination, arranged for.

Farley, of course, wanted the nomination. He thought at least that a ticket of Hull and Farley stood an excellent chance of winning. But the White House turned thumbs down on Farley and he saw friends, who probably had promised him the world when he had done valuable favors and acts of friendship for them, pass by on the other side at Chicago. Some administration leaders even worked hard, and with some considerable success, to take the Massachusetts delegation away from him. Not even a consolation prize was intended.

Mrs. Farley naturally was not happy. People who talked with her—and these included Delegate Matthew Scully, of Naugatuck—discovered how badly she felt. Everyone was sympathetic with the man who lived down and made derision of the "Tammany grafter" label that some tacked on him 7 years ago, who constituted the most effective national chairman the party has had in long years, and whose word with newspapermen was better than the word of some more "respectable" members of the administration—and sympathy was all he got. Yet out of this situation, by his character and conduct, he fashioned a great tribute to himself.

A newspaperman was standing by the box in which Mrs. Farley was watching the convention—the moment when Senator CARTER GLASS was nominating Farley for President. Some wardheeler nearby started to boo. The reporter, a very peaceable person, instinctively turned and kicked the booer. That indicated how most folks felt toward Mr. and Mrs. Farley.

Philadelphia is a long way off, yet here is a story about that convention that is amusing Washington. Former Senator Jim Watson, of Indiana, that flowery relic of days gone by, who appears at every big occasion, was a Dewey man. Jim hoped to recoup his fallen political fortunes by hopping on the Dewey bandwagon, which, when he joined it, looked like the best bet. At the convention he was very tired and on the night of the balloting fell asleep. The chairman of the Indiana delegation took this opportunity to vote Jim Watson for Willkie. On the fifth ballot Jim awoke and, his veteran political mind sensing what was going to happen, called to the chairman to vote him for Willkie. "You have been voting for Willkie since the start of the balloting," the chairman informed him. So Jim now finds himself one of the early Willkieites and is expected to make the most of the situation.

[From the Richmond Times-Dispatch of July 20, 1940]

JIM FARLEY SAYS "NO"

Jim Farley's decision not to remain as chairman of the Democratic National Committee during the coming Presidential campaign is a bad blow to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. Nobody else can fill his shoes as a political prestidigitator, and there is no use hoping that such a person is available.

All the pressure put upon him by the party to remain in the chairmanship until November failed to produce the desired result. President Roosevelt not only tried to persuade him to stay, when they had their preconvention chat at Hyde Park, but both the President and Mrs. Roosevelt made open acknowledgment to the convention on Thursday night of their affection and regard for him.

But Mr. Farley is opposed to the third term on principle. Besides, for years he is said to have been treated with great lack of consideration by the inner New Deal circle, including Mr. Roosevelt—so much so that he and the President were on the verge of an open break at the time of the unsuccessful "purge" 2 years ago. Mr. Farley always was against the purge, and said it would fail. The Corcoran-Cohen inner circle talked Mr. Roosevelt into going counter to his wishes on the issue, with the result that the President received one of his worst set-backs.

The same level-headed political judgment which warned the President against the purge will be sorely needed when the campaign now under way springs into full stride. This isn't going to be the pushover for the Democrats that the campaign against Landon was in 1936. They must muster all their resources. The defection of Jim Farley, the most popular figure in the party, next to Mr. Roosevelt himself, and the ablest political strategist, certainly doesn't help. Moreover, many will say that if Jim had wanted to hang on until November, he could have done so. He has been a good sport about the treatment he has received, he emerged from the Chicago convention its most admired and popular figure, but he now says he can't carry on but a month longer. It is difficult to blame him under the circumstances.

This Democratic campaign didn't get off to too good a start, in view of the partly synthetic "draft" at Chicago, the strong opposition to Mr. Wallace for second place on the ticket, and the obvious soreness in many party quarters over the strong hand kept on the whole show by the White House. In view of the foregoing, Jim Farley's aid was needed more than ever before. The fact that it isn't to be forthcoming after August 17 is far from cause for Democratic jubilation.

SCRIBES HONORED FARLEY AS STRAIGHT SHOOTER—HUNDREDS AT GOOD-LUCK DINNER PAID TRIBUTE TO HIS FRANKNESS

(By John M. Cummings)

Chicago, July 20.—Now and then you hear it said the birds who make their living by stringing one word after another for the daily press in time become case-hardened and cynical. This condition has been ascribed to frequent contact with fakers, charlatans, and other species of publicity seekers. Maybe there is something to it. Certainly in this game you meet all sorts of main chancers and the last thing your good reporter does before retiring for the night is to pick off the fleas and other forms of vermin accumulated during the day.

Still, you find in the news of the day the names of men who are not fakers, sports who are on the level, who are neither demagogues nor quacks. The newspaper men who covered the Democratic National Convention took time out Friday to honor a fine example of this type of citizen. They had Jim Farley as their guest.

This scribe has been batting around with politicians of one sort or another for a full quarter of a century. You can meet a lot of fakers in 25 years. And you can meet a lot of straight shooters, too. Jim Farley is a straight shooter and that's why some 700 or 800 newspapermen gave him the old good-luck business in the grand ballroom of the Stevens Hotel.

Jim is about to retire as chairman of the Democratic National Committee after serving his part in that capacity well and honorably over a period of 8 years. They say Jim's going to head the Yankee baseball team. That's neither here nor there. The point is that Jim, on August 17, will cease to be grand marshal of the Democratic fighting forces. And the men who have been writing of Jim and associating with him either daily or infrequently simply tossed him a party.

These newspaper scribes wanted Jim to know they appreciated his frankness, liked his geniality, and admired him as a man.

And, believe it or not, there was some huskiness in throats and an extra beat to the pulse as these hard-hearted cynics of the newspaper world told Jim they were sorry to see him leaving the post of command.

The Republicans, of course, are glad that Jim is retiring from the chairmanship. They have no man to match Jim. The Democratic Party has no man to replace him. Perhaps that's why they're having so much trouble locating a new chairman. Each man approached knows that Jim Farley is the yardstick by which future chairmen will be measured. And each in turn shies away from the thought of being shown up as a pygmy.

The reporters who gathered around Jim yesterday were not necessarily Democrats. A count of noses probably would show a majority clinging to the Republican faith. They were not gathering around Jim because he is a Democrat and about as fine a specimen of the breed as you could find. These scribes were pump-handling Jim Farley, the man.

Jim stood at the entrance to the ballroom greeting the lads as they arrived. Beside him stood that old Roman of the stinging phrase and the crushing sentence—Charley Michelson. Eddie Roddin and Bill Bray of the Farley staff were on deck.

Afterwhile they had a little ceremony. Jim was called to a small platform where a gang of musicians had been knocking out My Wild Irish Rose, Mrs. McCloud's Reel, and The Giant That Jumped the Causeway.

A bird called Mike Flynn, of the Wall Street Journal (that's enough to prove it wasn't a Democratic meeting), hopped to the platform and beckoned to a sport known to the police as Walter Trohan, White House correspondent for Colonel McCormick's Chicago Tribune.

This fugitive called Trohan said that all and sundry were assembled to honor the greatest national chairman of any party in the history of the country. Everybody applauded that declaration, so there must be something to it.

When Trohan was howled down, a dame who represents a string of Michigan papers in Washington, a dame who has acquired the "nom-de-handle" of Esther Van Wagner Tufty, stepped up and took charge of the female end of the celebration.

Esther Van Wagner Tufty had a package—a store package all wrapped up in tissue paper. She gave Jim the come-hither and he stepped to the platform. And when Jim opened the package by golly there was a first baseman's mitt. Mike Flynn tossed a ball to Jim and the photographers, including one of the skirted variety, snapped and snapped. The ball was a little low and inside but Jim caught it.

All this reminded the crowd of the Yankees, but someone said everything was off the record, and nothing was said about baseball or the prospect of the Yanks rising above fourth place, which was where they were when we looked at the standing of the clubs 3 weeks ago.

Turner Catledge, of the New York Times, went in to relieve Esther Van Wagner Tufty after Esther Van Wagner Tufty had been knocked out of the box. And Turner, in behalf of the assembled patriots and taxpayers, gave Jim one of the finest watches we ever saw—hot or cold. And he got a silver stamp box, too, for some of these special stamps Jim puts out from time to time.

There was a kind of a catch in Jim's voice as he accepted the watch. It was a nice speech, entirely off the record, and none of it will be set down here because Jim said the newspaper reporters never betrayed a confidence and by cripes we're not going to let him down at this late stage of the game.

The newspapermen and gals of the press honored themselves when they honored Jim Farley. But the men of the corps ought to take a jump in the lake. The whole business was thought up by Esther Van Wagner Tufty, the lady from Michigan.

Personally, we were glad to join the gang in paying tribute to Jim Farley. The other day we heard it said that a prominent Republican was willing to offer 48 State chairmen, 6 Congressmen, and the whole "kit and kaboodle" of Republican Senators for one Jim Farley. For what they ought to do is draft Jim, just as the Democrats drafted Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Roosevelt drafted Mr. Wallace.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Gazette of July 20, 1940]

BASEBALL, POLITICS, AND JIM FARLEY

Even those who have been most severe in criticism of some of his political methods (but who now can understand that he may not have been responsible for many of them) will readily admit that in the case of James A. Farley, the Democratic Party's loss is major-league baseball's gain.

In a couple of months now, Mr. Farley becomes administrative boss of the New York Yankees, a job that will give him plenty of prominence; he will have fewer headaches and several times more income than was his lot with the Roosevelt administration. There is no question of his ability to handle the job, nor is there any question of his liking and aptitude for bigtime sports. He may not be as expert at predicting pennant races and the World Series as he has been in predicting national elections, but he will know what's what, and why.

The Yankees, we should think, will take a nice boost in popular esteem as a result of Mr. Farley's connection with the club. The deal he was handed by the New Deal, amounting to the old heave-ho, has made the light of public opinion shine more favorably upon him. He will find that baseball is a business not a political party, and that the better job he does as head of the Yankees the more secure that job will be.

[From the Woonsocket (R. I.) Call and Evening Reporter of July 18, 1940]

THE FORGOTTEN MAN

Amid the whoops and whistles and chants and cheers of parading delegates the other night at the Democratic Convention when their first demonstration at mention of the President's name made your radio tubes howl, did you get a sense of a lonely figure standing wistfully aloof?

Did the air-wave description of that scene leave you—not stirred, not carried away with enthusiasm by a dynamic personality whatever your party affiliations—but instead, feeling like an adult watching the antics of exuberant but undirected children? Did you miss the husky catch in the announcer's voice; miss his efforts to find effective words with which to picture the emotion-building hero of other convention days? And wonder at the loss?—until it was recaptured for you by the prosaic statement that: "Jim Farley is standing on the platform with his two daughters, smiling down at the crowd."

That was it. A Democratic convention was demonstrating without James A. Farley functioning as the fountain head of enthusiasm. It seemed hollow; it failed to ring true. What memories of other days coursed through the mind of smiling "genial Jim" as he stood and watched, we can only conjecture. We venture, though, that the temptation to cast aside this 1940 aloofness, the wistful wish to bridge the schism between the watcher on the platform and the electric, omnipotent leader of yesteryear were strong. That he repulsed them is a measure of the political depths of the chasm that yawns today between the Post Office Damon and the White House Pythias.

[From the Winston-Salem (N. C.) Journal and Sentinel of July 21, 1940]

A GREAT LEADER

Democrats in every section of the Nation learn with deep regret mingled with sympathetic understanding of the decision of James A. Farley to retire on August 17 from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee.

As we see it, James A. Farley has proved himself to be the greatest national-committee chairman in the history of any American political party.

It was his superb organizing ability, his capacity to cement divided elements, and to make friends and keep them, that played a large part in the defeat of the "stop-Roosevelt" movement in 1932.

These same qualities, coupled with an almost uncanny political foresight, enabled Mr. Farley to make his remarkable prediction in 1936 that the President would carry 46 of the 48 States—a prediction that was exactly correct.

But Mr. Farley is not only a great political maestro. He is an excellent administrator, as the progress of the Post Office Department under his direction shows. And he is not only the greatest political campaign manager and one of the ablest executives of his time, Jim Farley is a sterling patriot and Democratic statesman whose loyalty to his party and to his country has never once wavered.

Mr. Farley, we are told, opposed any infringement upon the third-term tradition. He was himself a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. But when he was defeated in the Democratic convention he proved himself too much of the sound party man, too much of the American patriot, to place his own ambitions in the path of the majority's desire to meet a great national crisis by renominating Mr. Roosevelt. And it was Jim Farley who made the motion to make the nomination of the President unianimous.

His retirement as national chairman and later as Postmaster General is occasioned, according to his statement, not by political but by personal reasons. It is an open secret that Mr. Farley's finances are low, and he hopes to recuperate them as the operator of the New York Yankees baseball club. He is not "taking a walk." He will support the Democratic ticket and will continue as chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee.

"I have said repeatedly that the American people want the Democratic Party to remain in power," Mr. Farley declared. "My opinion has not changed, and again I pledge my full support to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket."

As Mr. Farley retires he will carry with him the gratitude of his party and that of many outside his party for his masterly achievements and his superb patriotic leadership of the past few years. To him much of the social gains credited to the administration in general is due, for he it was who laid the groundwork for the political success necessary to the institution of the policies which netted these gains. As he goes into private life, it is with the knowledge that an entire Nation wishes him the utmost success in his new undertaking.

[From the Sun (Williamsport, Pa.) of July 20, 1940]

MR. FARLEY WILL RETIRE

James A. Farley must have worn a wry smile as he listened to the lavish words of praise for "Dear Jim" which were heaped upon him at Chicago. Compliments, accompanied by words of endearment, were laid on thickly—but they didn't change Mr. Farley's decision to retire as national chairman of the Democratic Party. He will stick to the job for a month, which will let him out long before the real responsibility for conduct of the party's campaign develops.

Mr. Farley has the excuse of pending private responsibilities which will monopolize his time and energies as reason for his retirement. Who can believe, however, that his major motive is other than a desire to divorce himself from the obligation to direct a third-term effort of which he disapproves?

For all the compliments showered upon him, the one real compliment was withheld. He was not paid the honor of having his opinions and advice accepted. It is a hollow thing to be praised as an astute, adroit, loyal, hard-working political leader while one's judgment is being dismissed as of no consequence.

[From the Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Times-Leader of July 20, 1940]

JAMES A. FARLEY RESIGNS

Decision of James A. Farley to retire next month as national chairman, although expected, is a staggering blow to the Democratic Party. Capable, shrewd, loyal, he has been a tower of strength. He has been accurately described as a political genius.

Under his leadership, Democrats rose to their greatest heights. To him President Roosevelt owed his overwhelming victories at the polls in 1932 and 1936. His talents for organization made him invaluable.

Yet, despite the eminence of his position, it has been no secret that Mr. Farley has not been satisfied. Between him and the President there has been a growing coolness. Many have believed that Mr. Farley was treated shabbily by the party to which he rendered so great a service. It has been clear to all for a long time that others enjoyed the confidence of the White House rather than the Postmaster General.

It was Mr. Farley's opposition to a third term that really brought the show-down. In becoming a candidate himself and refusing to withdraw, he showed his hand plainly, although he must have known that the cards were stacked. Characteristically, he accepted defeat without any bitterness and pledged his support to the ticket, although efforts to have him conduct the campaign failed.

There is considerable speculation about the identity of his successor, but it is safe to say that the party will have to comb the country thoroughly to find a man who combines so many qualities of leadership. His resignation, especially at this time, is a loss, the full significance of which it is difficult to gage.

[From the Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Record of July 22, 1940]

MR. FARLEY QUITS

Reelection of James A. Farley as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, with Mr. Farley specifying that he will retire on August 17, is a gesture intended to suggest the continued existence of a state of good will and cordiality between the Postmaster General and his Chief.

As far as Mr. Farley is concerned, his loyalty has been tried and found not wanting under extremely trying circumstances. His aversion to a third term for a President was well known long before the Chicago convention met. The proceedings soon took a direction which pointed to only one outcome. Mr. Farley could have caused a serious rift. This he was too regular to do, and his high regard for what he must have believed were the proprieties in view of his Cabinet position and relations with the administration commanded the silent admiration of political friend and foe alike.

He is now showing the courage of his conviction against a third term by declining to remain as national chairman beyond the time necessary to break in his successor. Mr. Farley has been a shrewd leader. It is not unlikely tht he has his doubts as to the probable outcome of the third-term bid.

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) News-Register of July 23, 1940]

JIM FARLEY STEPS DOWN

For ability and unswerving loyalty, the Democratic Party is in heavy debt to James A. Farley, who has announced his retirement for August 17. His agreeing to stay on the job for another month when he would like to quit right now to accept a position as head of the New York Yankee baseball club is an understandable gesture for party harmony, for it is no secret that Farley was deeply hurt by the treatment received at Chicago, where Harry Hopkins ran the show from the wings.

It may be suspected, also, that Farley is not in sympathy with the third-term campaign. There have been signs for some time that he has been in the bad graces of the inner circles of administration leaders, but, regardless of rebuffs, he went quietly and effectively about his work.

At Chicago it was obvious that his job was deliberately usurped, but not once by word or deed did Farley depart from his dignified loyalty to the President, his hero. It required a big man to stand up for his principles under the pressure that he has been under during recent months.

On the day that genial Jim Farley hands over his keys to the office of national chairman the Democratic Party will lose one of the most valuable leaders it ever possessed.

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer of July 19, 1940]

EXIT MR. FARLEY

Termination of the Chicago convention marks the end of the road, we suspect, for James A. Farley as a national political figure.

And, yet, Mr. Farley emerged from the convention with perhaps more prestige, more genuine public regard, than attaches to any other man in the party.

His was a case of victory in defeat. He didn't win the Democratic nomination. But he did win public esteem. He played the game to the end. He played it squarely. Although he didn't like what was going on around him, he played his part stanchly. The American people respect a man like that, whether or not they believe as he believes.

That Mr. Farley has come to the conclusion that the game isn't worth the candle is suggested by Editor Smith, of the Fairmont Times, who has had some opportunity to study the game of politics, its rewards and disappointments. Writing from Chicago, Mr. Smith said of Farley's passing:

"Jim Farley, friend of every Democrat in West Virginia, tonight tasted the bitter dregs from the cup his political genius filled to overflowing in the same hall 8 years ago, and the cup was handed him by those who have drunk deep of its heady wine. * * * His example and his fate should be a lesson to all political geniuses to stay out of politics."

This is, we suspect, sound advice. But whether or not Jim Farley stays out of politics, he will take with him the admiration of those to whom the term "square shooter" still means something.

[From the Washington Post of July 21, 1940]

MR. FARLEY WALKS OUT

President Roosevelt won almost everything he sought at Chicago—except the continued service of James A. Farley as his campaign manager. A majority of the delegates grudgingly bowed to his wish to have Secretary of Agriculture Wallace as a running mate. But the man who directed the successful Democratic campaigns of 1932 and 1936 has resigned his post in spite of protests from both the President and the delegates at Chicago.

Mr. Farley offers a thoroughly reasonable explanation of his desire to retire to private life. He has had to make financial sacrifices to remain Postmaster General and chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Undoubtedly he is eager to accept the attractive offer in business which, he says, is open to him. But that eagerness has become dominant in his mind only because of his unwillingness to conduct a third-term campaign for Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Farley probably could have increased his income by entering private business several years ago. Yet he remained in office. His candidacy for both the Presidency and the Vice Presidency before the Chicago convention is ample evidence that he was willing to make further financial sacrifice to remain in public life. His failure to obtain either nomination greatly influenced his decision to retire from party and public office. But the fact that he is stepping out before the Presidential campaign gets under way, instead of waiting until November, can be interpreted in only one way.

Mr. Farley has pledged his support to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. This pledge apparently means, however, only that the political wizard will not bolt his party on the third-term issue, as Senator BURKE and a number of other influential Democrats have already done.

It would be useless to pretend that this resignation is not a severe blow to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. Mr. Farley's opposition to the third-term movement is common knowledge. Yet, if he had submerged that opposition after the convention was over, his example would doubtless have encouraged many other Democratic leaders to do likewise. For Mr. Farley has an ardent following within the party he has faithfully served. His continued hostility to Mr. Roosevelts third-term effort can only strengthen the hand of the bolters.

The November election may thus be a more clear-cut test of the New Deal than the country has yet seen. In both 1932 and 1936 a vast number of Jeffersonian Democrats followed Mr. Roosevelt, despite misgivings, because of their party affiliations. Now an ardent new dealer has replaced conservative Vice President Garner in second place on the ticket, and the President must rely more heavily upon the politically inexperienced inner circle of his administration for the conduct of his campaign.

No one realizes more keenly than Mr. Farley the fact that he has put the administration under a real handicap at the beginning of the Presidential race. Yet he has calmly and deliberately washed his hands of the 1940 campaign because of convictions that he shares with many other Democrats.

[From the Waseca (Minn.) Herald of July 25, 1940]

The retirement next month of James A. Farley, Democratic national chairman, will remove one of the most colorful figures in the history of American politics. His successful management of the Roosevelt Presidential campaigns of 1932 and 1936 brought him Nation-wide acclaim and demonstrated the working of a master mind in the political arena. But success never turned his head. He always played the game on the square, and when the contests were over he enjoyed the respect and esteem of both friends and foes. An outstanding tribute to his honesty and integrity is the fact that he is giving up political leadership in order to enter business and provide for his family. Had he been of the mold of many other prominent politicians, he could have accumulated a fortune through devious political routes. But there is no dishonesty or deceit in Jim Farley's make-up. He demonstrated the fact that politics can be conducted successfully on honest businesslike lines, and his name will go down in history as a model master politician and a model American citizen.

[From the Watertown (N. Y.) Daily Times of July 19, 1940]

WHAT ABOUT JIM FARLEY?

There are many people who believe that the Democratic political convention which ended its sessions early this morning signalized the end of the political career of one of the most colorful political leaders of modern times, James A. Farley.

For the first time in 8 years Farley attended a political convention which he could not control. For 8 years he had appeared at political conventions and other political gatherings as the personal representative of Franklin D. Roosevelt, yet in the Chicago convention he was powerless. Other men made the decisions. Other leaders lined up the votes. Farley received many demonstrations of affections—even the President had a word of praise—but it was the kind of tribute extended to a departed brother whose memory will always be green.

One wonders at the thoughts that must have passed through Farley's mind as he sat on the platform at Chicago and watched other men in command. It was in this same hall that 8 years before Farley's generalship had resulted in Franklin D. Roosevelt first being nominated for President. Probably he remembered with a wry smile of the opposition he faced then from men who were now whooping it up for Roosevelt. Perhaps he thought of his long fight to win Tammany Hall for the President, a fight finally crowned with success and with Alfred E. Smith one of the casualties. Perhaps, too, he thought how he had sold Roosevelt to the Democratic organizations of Massachusetts and New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Now he could not even hold his own delegates from Massachusetts.

A famous political partnership is at an end. Roosevelt and Farley go their separate ways. It was a powerful combination in its day, Roosevelt with his flaming idealism, his radio personality, his sense of the dramatic, and Farley with his flair for organization, his mastery of the mechanics of politics, his realism, and his practicality.

Farley says he is through. He has no desire to remain in the public eye longer and he will devote his time to private business. A saddened man, Jim Farley, and no doubt that is his sincere intention at the present time. But suppose Roosevelt is defeated. Suppose the new dealers fall and a new element arises to control the Democratic Party. We predict that Farley will then be back in the harness. Politics is in his blood. It is his business and his recreation. An old partnership has been dissolved. Another may be in the offing. It will depend upon the outcome of the Presidential election.

[From the Walla Walla (Wash.) Union Bulletin of July 21, 1940]

FARLEY STEPS DOWN

In a few weeks the national Democratic Party will swap horses in the middle of the stream.

James Aloysius Farley, national chairman and one of the Nation's most astute political leaders, has resigned to go into private business. To all appearances that private business has to do with change of ownership of the New York Yankees baseball club of the American League.

Farley is an out and out foe of the third term. He has played the good sport by issuing statements that he will support the ticket of the party of which he has long been a member. Whether that support will consist of Jim Farley's cross on his own ballot, or will be of the type that means influencing of huge numbers of votes each reader may decide for himself.

It is possible that Farley's support will be somewhat passive, particularly since the President went out of his way not long ago and commented pointedly on what he termed Farley's lack of availability as a candidate for the Presidency. The national chairman did not like that rebuff from Mr. Roosevelt. If he does nothing for the ticket beyond marking his own ballot for the sake of remaining "regular" no one would be greatly surprised.

Taking Jim Farley out of the New Deal lineup may have the same effect on Roosevelt's November chances as Connie Mack's sale of his wonder teams did to Philadelphia Athletics pennant chances in bygone years. The opposition has been given a decided break in the decision of this talented politico to go to the sidelines.

[From the Waterloo (Iowa) Courier of July 17, 1940]

FARLEY—FROM POLITICS TO BASEBALL

James A. Farley has earned the reputation of being a President maker. When Roosevelt was first nominated in 1932, those wise in politics looked behind the scenes and saw Farley. When Roosevelt was renominated and elected in 1936, the genial New York Irishman was again behind the scenes, pulling wires, making contracts, giving advice, making friends, and saying little. When there was political work to be done, the new dealers called on Farley.

From all indications, that situation is changed now. Farley, a half-hearted candidate for President, is making plans to assume ownership of the New York Yankee baseball team.

Roosevelt, doubtless, can get along without him. There are other smart politicians in the Democratic Party.

But it must worry the President a little to have Jim breaking away. Jim was the one who knew every major politician in America by his first name. Jim always knew which way the wind was blowing. Jim exuded confidence.

But now he is going to retire as national chairman. He opposes a third term. He thinks a third term is a mistake.

James A. Farley is a smart politician. Even his opponents give him that much praise.

[From the Waco (Tex.) News-Tribune of July 25, 1940]

GOOD-BYE, JIM FARLEY

Jim Farley has resigned the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee. Committee and party members receive the news with regret, though for months they have known that the affable Jim would not long outlast the Chicago convention. It was his destiny to see a legitimate ambition thwarted by the rapid stride of world events.

His brief address at the convention was genuine drama. It expressed his gratitude for the votes he had received. His motion for a unanimous ballot for Mr. Roosevelt, his expression of devotion to the party, all these added up to the ultimate in good sportsmanship.

Mr. Farley couldn't be a winner, but he was a superlatively good loser. The delegates responded with an ovation that was as sorrowful as it was sincere.

James Whitcomb Riley expressed it in the phrase, "Well, goodbye, Jim, take keer of yourse'f." It is a regretful farewell now, with best wishes. However, the 8 adventurous years may add up, history will provide a niche for Jim Farley, the man whose word was his bond, who never reneged on a promise, who made good in a very big way.

JIM FARLEY'S WISE LEADERSHIP

James A. Farley can be proud of one fact. He relinquishes the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee with the party out of debt for the first time in its history. More than this, Mr. Farley says there is money in the treasury.

Jim Farley has done a good job as chairman of the Democratic committee for 8 years. He deserves the everlasting gratitude of the rank and file of the party. He has carried on in the face of much discouragement and at times he had to submerge his own views for the sake of harmony and the welfare of the party.

It is well known that Mr. Farley is not in accord with the left-wingers who have had so much influence with the President, but at no time did Mr. Farley refuse to go along with the President, even if he did so in silence.

It is reported that Mr. Farley is the head of a syndicate who will purchase soon the New York Yankee baseball club at a price of $4,000,000. Baseball was Farley's first love and no doubt he will welcome getting away from the worries of a campaign manager, though the manager of a great baseball club is no bed of roses.

James A. Farley has made a fine record as Postmaster General. Under his guidance the Postal Department has been reorganized and placed on a most efficient business basis. No longer does the Department roll up the huge deficits year after year, as it did under Republican rule.

Undoubtedly James A. Farley has proven himself Presidential timber. If President Roosevelt should refuse the nomination, which it seems now is certain to be given him in spite of the fact that he has said he is not a candidate, it will not be surprising that Mr. Farley will show much strength in the convention, as he has said his name will go before the convention for the Presidency.

Within a few hours the history of the Democratic convention will be completed, and it goes without saying whoever is chosen on the Democratic ticket, James A. Farley has played a dominant part in this convention and the success of the Democrats for the past 8 years.

[From the Woodford (Versailles, Ky.) Sun of July 25, 1940]

JIM FARLEY

Postmaster General James A. Farley, strongly opposed to a third term for anyone, and a candidate himself for the Democratic Presidential nomination, showed his magnanimity and his loyalty to his friend, "the boss"—his name for the President—by moving that the Roosevelt nomination by the Democratic convention be made by acclamation when it was apparent that President Roosevelt had received an overwhelming majority of the votes of the delegates.

Mr. Farley on Friday resigned as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, but agreed to serve until August 17. It is understood that he will resign in September as Postmaster General to become owner of the New York Yankees baseball team, in an effort to recoup his personal finances.

Jim Farley has made a great Postmaster General and a great national committee chairman. He is one of the ablest, squarest, frankest men in public life. Some of the highest tributes to Farley's character have been paid by "the boss," who has known him intimately for many years.

[From the Utica (N. Y.) Daily Press of July 18, 1940]

FATE OF JIM FARLEY

The strangest development in the Chicago convention which has already shown its disregard for political precedents, is the fate of James A. Farley, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee. The one thing about Farley upon which both his friends and his critics agree, is his skill as a political leader. He has excellent judgment, a genius for organization and extensive experience in a field where they don't do it with mirrors.

Furthermore, Farley has acquired a reputation for personal integrity and loyalty to the party principles which he has espoused as convictions. Under such circumstances, it might be assumed that a party having such a man at the head of its working organization, would value him highly. But the contrary is the case. Farley has not left the Democratic Party but the New Deal has taken its management away from him.

All accounts from Chicago agree that he is no longer the leader to whom delegates would naturally turn for information or ideas about convention procedure and campaign strategy. That function has been taken over by Commerce Secretary Hopkins, who is now represented to be the President's closest adviser.

Whatever other qualifications Secretary Hopkins possess, and they are numerous, there is nothing in his record to suggest ability as a political strategist or leader. On the contrary, he has shown something of a gift for making indiscreet statements which fly back in his face and he would not ordinarily be regarded as the type of man to whom local political leaders would turn for campaign advice.

But there it is. So far as the visible evidence goes, it shows that Farley is through as a national figure in the party and that he is being superseded by others whose abilities are untried in the field of national politics. That procedure seems to be putting the party pretty far out on a limb.

[From the Tucson (Ariz.) Citizen of July 18, 1940]

NO CLOVER FOR "OLD FAITHFUL"

At the conclusion of Jim Farley's speech before the Democratic National Convention Monday night, it was clear he had tied the reins of party chairmanship to the dashboard and was ready to vacate the driver's seat to a successor. There was still a possibility, it was said, that he might be drafted for further service—that he might even get a "command" under a cachet that few would ignore or flout—for a third performance, but barring the success of that approach to his blind side Farley's speech was his hail and his farewell.

He would be callous, indeed, who did not sense the pathos of the moment, for interdiction of all mention of the cause which brought the severance could not obscure the fact that 8 years of loyal service had brought him to the end of a dead alley. There was one cardinal of 1940 republicanism to which he would give shouting approval did not loyalty to a partyism that does not deserve such devotion seal his lips, and that is the venerated principle and precedent that American rulership shall be determinate, not indeterminate.

Farley could stay and collect profuse but selfish thanks—of which he has a plethora and little else but obligations as souvenirs of his service—if he would pocket his convictions and his principles, but at the moment to which we refer he had spurned the proposal that he wink at the ravishment of tradition.

But there would be no fields of clover for "Old Faithful" Farley now that his working days for the party were ending. He had learned that the favors of the mighty are not given for reward but to bind the beneficiary to future service, the nature of which is not to be questioned. Like many who have depended on "prince's favors," he was to be on his own—again dependent on his wits.

SAMSON AGONISTES

In one of Milton's greatest poems we have the picture of Samson, the strong man of Hebrew legend, blinded and bound by his enemies, yet triumphant. Brought to a great feast of Dagon, he was made a feature of the program to amuse the multitude. Finally, with his arms around the two great pillars, he bent forward and pulled the edifice down, burying in its ruins hundreds of his enemies and perishing himself.

At Chicago last week James A. Farley, Postmaster General of the United States, played the role of Samson Agonistes. His record is well known. Chairman of National and State party committees, member of the Cabinet, adviser and confidant of the President, he has been for 8 years the strong man of democracy. The successes of the New Deal have been possible only because of his admirable leadership.

More than this, he carried on his activities with so deft and kindly a hand that he made friends by it. There are few, if any, Americans who know so many people in the United States and who have so few enemies. He has a remarkable personality and a gift for friendship.

But Mr. Farley has more than popularity, power, and genius behind him. He has conscience. He is willing to play the political game for a party in which he believes; he is willing to advise and assist a political leader whose program may differ, in many points, from his own. But when that party or that politician departs definitely and intentionally from the decencies upon which characters must be built, Mr. Farley cannot go along.

And so the Postmaster General played his final role in Chicago with all the charm of a finished actor but with the grim intensity of a martyr—or a Samson Agonistes. He had been in many ways the most powerful man in the land. But the new dealers and the municipal bosses had combined with the President to put his eyes out and bind him. Hopkins, Ickes, Perkins, and Wallace—the Pharisaic purists of the Roosevelt inner circle—locked arms with the slippery gang from the big cities—Hague, Kelly, Guffey, the Louisiana crowd, the Pendergast remaindermen, and the underlings of the late lamented Jimmy Hines—and decided to make a monkey of Jim Farley. They resented him because he refused to be low down.

But Jim Farley outplayed them. At the convention he smiled and talked with his friends. He remained a candidate for the Presidency although he knew Roosevelt had given him a Judas kiss. He went his way, too big to be disconcerted, too strong to be troubled by the insects of the New Deal.

The convention sensed the situation. In spite of all the machinery laid in for the various demonstrations, the convention was a Farley affair. Every mention of his name brought cheers, and they were real ones. Roosevelt cheers came, but they were bought cheers and meant far less. It was essentially Farley's week, the time of his triumph. He had turned sadly away from a life task because he could not honestly continue in it; but his head, though bloody, was unbowed. He stepped out of the picture like the gentleman he is, too much of a man to notice the dirty tricks of dirty schemers.

It was said of Samson that he destroyed more of his enemies in his death than in his life. Of Jim Farley it can be asserted that he made more friends by his final act in the political tragedy than in all his tours about the country, his conferences with partisans, and his achievements in organization. He emerges as the only hero of the convention, the only one of the erstwhile leaders who, with a spring in his walk and a smile on his face, walks out, knowing he played the game to the end as he ought to play it, and refused to play it only when he felt its objectives and its principles were crooked.

We have criticized Mr. Farley at times. If he remains in public life, we may criticize him again. But at this moment we wish to express our unbounded admiration for him. He is the only figure which emerges from the convention in Chicago bigger than he went in. Samson Agonistes, perhaps—with the things he worked for broken. But Samson, true to his convictions and his people to the end.

JIM FARLEY

One of the outstanding highlights of the Democratic Convention in Chicago was the humiliating treatment handed to Jim Farley by the Hopkins-Ickes crowd of new dealers. Here was a man who as much as any one man was responsible for the nomination of President Roosevelt in 1932, who organized and directed the preconvention of 1932, who again in 1936 organized and directed the most astonishingly successful campaign in all the history of elections, now being cold shouldered, brushed aside, and discarded because he would not bow down to Hopkins, Ickes, Cohen, and Corcoran.

As those Democrats know, who first became interested in the candidacy of President Roosevelt, when he was still Governor of New York, Jim Farley began his organizing work in 1931. From that date on no one man ever gave his chief more unselfish, more able, and more loyal service. Time after time Jim Farley "took the rap" for his chief. Time after time he was the "fall guy," faithfully assuming the blame for someone else's mistakes.

Yet when the time came for Mr. Farley to aspire higher, he was like a servant, who after years of faithful service sought to step up on a par with his master. In so many words he was told he was impudent and must keep within his servant class or get out. Only as a hired hand could he be considered.

Democrats throughout the Nation will lament the passing, temporarily we hope, of Jim Farley, because they have grown to love him. To these many friends he is still bound by ties of true and everlasting affection, the affection that all men have for loyalty and faithfulness. That these friends could not do more to reward him was due to circumstances beyond their control. If there was any man who ever deserved a reward, who deserved to have his work recognized by promotion, it is Jim Farley.

[From the Troy (N. Y.) Observer of July 21, 1940]

BIG JIM FARLEY

The imminent retirement of James A. Farley from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee is a great handicap to be overcome by the party at the outset of what promises to be one of the most vigorous Presidential campaigns in the history of the country. Farley was the dynamo which electrified the party organization in 1932 and 1936 and brought about the great victories of those years.

The Roosevelt Presidential victories, however, were not the result of mere quadrennial preelection campaigns. Farley started his man toward the White House as soon as he took over the chairmanship of the New York State Democratic Committee in 1930, after he was satisfied that former Governor Smith was out of the political picture. He was as much surprised as anyone when Smith decided to contest for the nomination in 1932.

The smashing victory that Roosevelt scored over Charles H. Tuttle in the gubernatorial election of 1930 convinced Farley that he was managing a winner, and from that time on Farley did a great selling job which did not end until election night in 1932. His management of the party's affairs during the first Roosevelt administration accounted for the greater victory which was won in 1936.

The committee appointed to name a successor to Mr. Farley has been given a most perplexing job. "Big Jim" is big, not only physically, but morally, and politically. They will have a tough job finding another of his stature.

[From the Trenton (N. J.) State Gazette of July 23, 1940]

MR. FARLEY WON'T TAKE A WALK

It is quite possible that the long and brilliant political career of Jim Farley is drawing to a close. Convention developments have indicated that he is about to retire from active party leadership and also from the Cabinet, in order that he may enter private business.

Mr. Farley has said many times that it is necessary for him to rehabilitate his financial position. He has never been in politics for profit. A man of rigid integrity, as well as of many other virtues, he has never capitalized his high position in Government or his influence in political life. Insofar as his own financial interests are concerned, he has never had his eye trained upon the main chance. In consequence, his personal fortunes have suffered.

It is undoubtedly true, as he has so often maintained, that he feels under an obligation to improve his financial position and that his decision to retire is traceable primarily to this factor. It is also true that his resolve has been strengthened by the feeling that he has not been treated with proper consideration by the President, that there is an estrangement in an old and close friendship.

Regardless of circumstances, however, it was hardly necessary for him to declare that he is not going to "do an Al Smith"—that is, "take a walk." There is nothing small about Farley. He is a big man in all that the term implies, and perhaps his dominant attribute is that of loyalty. He may not like the way things are going but he will not desert and move into the camp of the enemy.

[From the Tampa Morning Tribune of July 18, 1940]

FARLEY'S ADVICE

The address of James A. Farley before the Democratic National Convention may have had a farewell ring, but it also contained some mighty words of wisdom which every Democratic standard bearer can well afford to heed.

In many respects it was the same Jim Farley. His was a loyal and fighting Democratic speech. It was filled with evidence to support the administration record that is one of unmatched achievement. Yet, constantly running through it, was a strong warning against overconfidence.

Here was Jim Farley, the loyal keeper of an important secret, the real sage of the Democratic Party, gently reminding members that "unless we give the country a ticket and a platform that will satisfy the majority, we have no certainty of victory."

Remember, it was in 1936 that the same Jim Farley, checking his records carefully, calmly predicted that the Democratic Party would carry the entire country with the exception of Maine and Vermont. Now in 1940, he as good as told his party to prepare for a hard fight.

We are confident that his party will follow that advice. Jim Farley has been too strong, too loyal a leader to be permanently ignored. His own political dreams may have been smashed by this convention, he may not approve of President Roosevelt running again, but he won't bolt his party. We rather imagine that he will be in there fighting along with fellow Democrats to assure victory in November.

[From the Topeka (Kans.) Capital of July 24, 1940]

FARLEY TO AMERICAN LEAGUE

Genial Jim Farley is turning his back on a third term in the Cabinet and going in for baseball as owner of the New York Yankees. If he manages that one-time unbeatable club as well as he did the Democratic Party for 7 years, sports fans are sure to quit belitting the champions.

Farley's friends feel that he got a raw deal at the hands of the new dealers. His popularity never was higher than at the Chicago convention, which was taken out of his hands by the White House fixers. Every time he appeared in the stadium the applause came from every corner, and more vociferously from the delegates than anywhere else.

Had Roosevelt declined to run again, Jim could have had the nomination, but his feelings went far beyond the personal glory he might have gained, but lost. He foresaw the rupture in the party, which already is doing serious damage to the organization he formed in 1932 and held together up to 1940.

As mentor of the New York Yankees, Farley will be back in his old vocation. A sportsman at heart, the Irish-American politician now takes hold of a great club that has been slipping all year. His many friends hope he rehabilitates the Yanks and makes a mint of money.

[From the Tampa Morning Tribune, of July 23, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S FUTURE

Undoubtedly the outstanding personality of the late Democratic pow-wow was James A. Farley. This was best attested by the uniformly favorable response given every mention of his name, either before the convention or in individual groups. Unanimous was the sentiment of party leaders and members that the party loses a powerful asset in his retirement from its campaign management.

Aside from any disaffection Mr. Farley may feel with the President or some of his high advisers, or with the convention results, his explanation of the reasons for his relinquishment of party leadership is amply convincing. For 8 years he has given his time and his ability to the service of the party and of the Nation, for compensation which, for a man of his ability, has been merely nominal. In that devotion to the President and the party, the chairman has actually gone into debt. Four years more of it would mean going in deeper. He feels that the time has come for him to earn something worth while for himself and his dependents. No one can fairly quarrel with that decision or charge him with a lack of loyalty or a disposition to quit under fire.

In private association and employment Jim Farley will continue to be an element of strength in the Democratic Party. His services will not be forgotten by the great mass of Democrats the Nation over, whatever may prove to be the attitude of the chief beneficiaries of that service. We believe that Mr. Roosevelt himself keenly desired that Mr. Farley continue at the head of the party's campaign organization, but that he would not insist knowing the state of the chairman's personal fortunes. Into whatever field of action Jim Farley may go, he will have always the esteem and appreciation and best wishes of millions of Americans, including all parties, classes, and creeds.

[From the Tacoma (Wash.) News-Tribune of July 18, 1940]

AN OUTSTANDING FIGURE

The outstanding personage of Wednesday night's Democratic convention at Chicago was not the nominee chosen at the midnight hour, but Jim Farley, Postmaster General and chairman of the Democratic National Committee. He was a sturdy and courageous figure, sticking resolutely by his principles and refusing to yield to the hysteria of a convention determined to nominate the President for a third term.

The New Deal generals who are running the show had decided to have Roosevelt renominated by acclamation, to give the impression that a reluctant President was being drafted for a third term by a country which demanded that he override the third-term tradition. They wanted it to appear that he was the unanimous choice of the convention.

Although Farley knew he was hopelessly outnumbered and that opposition to the Presidential machine would get nowhere, he stood resolutely to his course. His name was presented and a vote was taken, as he himself later explained, "in accordance with Democratic principles." He received only 72 and a fraction votes, with 61 for Garner, 9 and a fraction for Tydings, and 5½ and a fraction for Hull, and with the President getting 946 and a fraction votes. Later Farley moved that the nomination be made by acclamation, which was done.

CARTER GLASS, veteran Senator from Virginia, rose from a sick bed to nominate Farley. He paid the Postmaster General a tribute of which the latter may well be proud when he said of him: "He is a man on whose word every human being can always rely, a man who never in all his lifetime ever violated a pledge, once given."

Incidentally, for the first time in a Democratic convention the name of Thomas Jefferson was "booed" when GLASS referred to the founder of the party, "who less than 3 years before his death appealed to that party never to nominate a man for a third term."

The record is very nearly written at Chicago. The convention Thursday will select as a running mate to the President a Vice Presidential candidate whom the White House has approved. The outcome is exactly as forecast weeks ago. Delegates had been selected, pledged to Roosevelt. They drafted him exactly as they were supposed to do, while the convention was run by Harry Hopkins and other New Deal leaders in the background.

What history will write of this convention and its proceedings remains to be revealed, but one thing is certain: Out of the affair the name of James A. Farley will stand with increased prestige and luster.

[From the Syracuse (N. Y.) Herald-Journal of July 8, 1940]

DEMOCRATS WOULD MISS FARLEY'S GUIDING HAND

Postmaster General Farley's reported decision to give up his post as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and his place as head of the Post Office Department would have far-reaching repercussions on national politics if carried out.

Mr. Farley's genius as political manager was given a large share of the credit for the sweeping victories of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936. Of late their intimacy has faded somewhat. Farley has been opposed on principle to a third term for any President, and cherished some hope that he himself might win the Presidency.

Now he is said to believe that the nomination of Roosevelt is inevitable because it is too late to build up anyone else into a winning candidate, but he is resolved not to manage another national campaign.

The President's pledge to secrecy veiled his Sunday revelation to Farley as to his third-term intentions.

It need hardly be said that Jim Farley's guiding hand would be sorely missed, especially when the Democratic nominee must combat so popular and magnetic a candidate as Wendell Willkie. Farley's wide acquaintanceship with political leaders throughout the country is proverbial. It is said no one else in public life can call so many persons by their first names.

It has long been known that Mr. Farley's continuance in office was at a personal sacrifice, since his salary of $15,000 was not equal to the demands upon him and he felt it desirable to lay up something for the future.

Heading of the Yankee baseball club in the American League sounds at first anticlimactic for one who was talked of for the Presidency of the United States, but big-league baseball is big business and there will be opportunity for large earnings. According to reports, he would be associated with James M. Cox as principal backer. Mr. Cox was the Democratic candidate for President in 1920, losing to Warren Harding.

If Mr. Farley retains his post as chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee to aid in renominating and reelecting United States Senator JAMES M. MEAD, his withdrawal from politics will be less abrupt. Though he never reached the shining goal of the Presidency he has had a notable career.

ADMIRAL GIVES MORE CLOSE-UP VIEWS OF GREAT MEN AND OTHERS AT DEMOCRATIC FETE

CHICAGO.—(Smile-o-gram written during sessions of Democratic National Convention)—Little wonder that James A. Farley, retiring national chairman, proved the most popular man at this mammoth, smiling, laughing, shouting, singing, fighting, thoroughly Democratic battle of words, wits, and nerves.

Jim's intimate friends knew that his heart was broken when his consuming desire to be the Presidential nominee was snuffed out by the Roosevelt high command. Close friends and oldtime supporters rushed to him, some of them actually in tears, when they were compelled to choose between following Roosevelt or following Farley—two who had been as one—two who will remain as one so far as fundamental affections are concerned, but both of them could not be President.

Here is an intimate personal story characteristic of Jim Farley, which came to me through one of Jim's intimate personal friends, United States District Attorney Claude N. Sapp, of Columbia, S. C.

A year or so ago Mr. Sapp's wife was killed in an automobile accident while on a tender-hearted, charitable mission. She was carrying food and good cheer to a poor old colored mammy who had helped to take care of Mr. and Mrs. Sapp's 11-year-old boy, Joe, when the latter was a baby.

Giant Jim Farley's tender heart was deeply sorrowed by this tragedy. It was like a death in his own family. His attachment for little Joe Sapp was most beautiful, sincere, and profound. He went to him to comfort him when his mother was killed and exchanged visits with little Joe. They were like boys together—two hearts beating as one.

This great Democratic National Convention came on. Jim Farley arranged to have little Joe come to Chicago with the latter's father so they could be close together. He took little Joe to the speaker's platform where he could see and know everything that was going on. The night before the convention, when a preview was staged for the movies with Jim as a central figure, little Joe was on hand with authority to exercise unreserved censorship. When it was all over, big Jim leaned over and said to smiling, bright-eyed little Joe:

"Joe, if there is anything you don't like about this, we'll change it or cut it out."

Little Joe approved and the show went on.

Tender little human-interest stories like this flowed from the lips of many of Jim Farley's close personal friends with whom I visited in Jim's national headquarters in the Stevens Hotel, where—and this is significant—the central figure on the outer wall was a great lifelike portrait of Jim's friend, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

[From the Springfield (Ill.) State Register of July 20, 1940]

FARLEY A "GOOD SPORT"

Jim Farley is going to play ball with both the New York Yankees and the Democratic Party, of which he is a great, living symbol.

Unanimously reelected national chairman yesterday, he will retain that position long enough to help coach his successor. Then he will assume his new responsibilities as head of the New York American League baseball organization.

The most significant thing which Jim Farley said in his statement was that he wishes to see the Democratic Party remain in power, and that he will support the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. His words synchronize in happy accord with the compliments paid to him by President Roosevelt by radio, and by Mrs. Roosevelt in person to the Democratic National Convention, and to the Nation.

That the retiring national chairman will retain his position as chairman of the State Central Committee of New York means that thoroughly democratic Jim Farley will not only be in there pitching for the New York Yanks, but for the New York democracy, which has the highest batting average in the National Electoral College.

This remarkable drama in politics again emphasizes the chivalry of Jim Farley, who has done exactly what was anticipated in these columns—be a "good sport," go along with the Roosevelt ticket, avoid anything that would savor of the memorable "walk-out" in 1932, and be entitled to share the joys and responsibilities of another Democratic victory.

This means more friends for Jim Farley. It strengthens him with his party and appeals to men and women everywhere because of its unmistakable element of good sportsmanship. It means that the future will bring its "Draft Farley" demand for this great Democrat, to whom everybody hopes financial success comes through the great national game, and who is indispensable to the greatest national game of them all in which he is a past master—politics and government.

[From the Spartanburg (S. C.) Herald of July 10, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S PLAN

Oppositionists have tried hard to make it appear that James Aloysius Farley and Franklin Delano Roosevelt had come to the parting of the ways, but pictures taken at Hyde Park during Mr. Farley's recent visit showed two men who seemed to be the best of friends and in the best of humor. If their laughing faces were assumed it must be said that Frank and Jim are actors par excellence. Judging by the comment of Mr. Farley after the meeting the pictures told a true story.

No one knows what Mr. Roosevelt will do if the Democratic Convention asks him to be a candidate for a third term. No one knows what plans Mr. Farley has in mind. A few years ago those who busied themselves to map out a future for the Postmaster General picked out a job as president of a tottering automobile manufacturing concern. Nothing came of the assignment. Jim stayed on as a member of the Cabinet, went about the country dedicating new post-office buildings, and signed stacks of letters with green ink. The guessers were in error.

Now comes the news that Mr. Farley and Mr. Cox, a former Democratic nominee for President, may take over the Yankee baseball franchise and that Jim will have charge of the team. There may be something to the rumor and many fans hope it may prove true. The Yankees have not been doing so well this year. They lack pep, and the fans believe that James Aloysius is the one man who can put pep into any project he tackles. He put more of it into two national campaigns than any man in political history. Why not trust him to inject an abundance of the same stuff into the Yankee baseball team which seems to be much in need of it?

JIM MAY BE A PRESIDENT, ANYWAY

Jim Farley appears to be the only leader at Chicago whose loyalty to his party and its traditions is greater than his subserviency to its titular head. He has all along been described as opposed to the elaborately organized third-term movement as a violation of his party's as well as of a national principle. And he is the only Democratic leader who has had the courage to stand up against the pressure of White House janizaries and submit his one rival candidacy for his party's nomination for President.

It is obvious that Mr. Farley has persisted with little, if any, hope of winning, but rather with determination to make a showing of a contest in a convention organized for submission to administration dictation. He has managed to do this and retain his dignity and the respect of his fellow partisans. Now it appears that in the end he is not going to fail entirely to realize his laudable ambition to be a president, for, if rumors and reports in baseball circles are dependable, he will become the president of the Yankees, even if he is denied, as he clearly will be, the Presidency of Yankeedom.

FARLEY DISCARDED

Jim Farley, the organizing genius of the Democratic Party, is to retire from his position as chairman of the party's national committee, and director of the campaign, on August 17, sacrificed along with the historic principles of the party to the ambition of the man he has served with an almost doglike loyalty since 1932.

A more shabby return for faithfulness has seldom been recorded even in the selfish and ruthless game of politics.

It was Farley who won the presidential nomination for Mr. Roosevelt in 1932, and it was Farley who organized the forces that made Mr. Roosevelt's reelection victory in 1936 so overwhelming. But this year Farley, because he believed Mr. Roosevelt meant it when he said he did not want to serve another term and proceeded on the assumption that he would not violate the third-term principle, incurred the displeasure of the friend to whom he has given such devoted service.

Mr. Roosevelt turned against Farley when he found that, great as was Farley's personal allegiance to him, his fidelity to a principle of the party was greater and he would not stultify himself, as others did, by abandoning his announced determination to force a contest in the convention on the third-term issue by presenting his own candidacy for nomination.

Though Farley thus is discarded and superseded by more obsequious aides, he does not thereby become an object of commiseration. He retires with his self-respect intact, indulging neither in self-pity nor recrimination. Brought up in the Tammany tradition that regularity is the first great principle of professional politics, he makes formal announcement that he will support the ticket. But, henceforth, his preoccupation will be baseball and not party organization.

His divorcement from the Cabinet and party leadership breaks about the last link binding Mr. Roosevelt's administration machine to traditional democracy, as he has repudiated practically every Jeffersonian principle of that historic party.

[From the South Bend Tribune of July 17, 1940]

FARLEY'S FAREWELL

The tone and the content of National Chairman James A. Farley's address to the Democratic National Committee indicated his formal retirement from that position in the near future, perhaps within the next week. Mr. Farley has been national chairman for 8 years, and in his regime the Democratic Party achieved two sweeping national victories. Nobody in the party has more political acumen and relatively few can be credited with as much. Certainly Mr. Farley's political skill has been of inestimable benefit to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Why, then, is Mr. Farley on the way out even while it looks as if "his man" will be the Presidential nominee again? Of course, a first rate national chairman could have some practical incentive, apart from internal party conditions, to retire after 8 years of service. Private economic conditions could be a potent force for retirement because the national chairmanship and the Cabinet position held by Mr. Farley do not have financial returns commensurate with what might be attainable for him in private activity.

It seems settled, however, that Mr. Farley is about to retire primarily because the Democratic Party has become the tool of the New Deal group that is contemptuous of Democratic Party principles. That group operates on a "rule or ruin" basis; and Mr. Farley is not disposed to be cooperative with it. He is one of the ablest Democrats; but ability does not count for much with the new dealers who have acquired tremendous power by control of the patronage system, if it is not attended by subservience to them.

If the Democratic Party is to enter the 1940 campaign with a nominee symbolizing violation of the third-term tradition, it will need consummate skill in campaign direction. It is already destined, before the nomination is made, to carry the handicaps of wildcat Government financing, failure to solve vital economic problems, and vigorous liberal opposition in the person of the Republican Presidential nominee, Wendell L. Willkie. It apparently will need a Farley more than it did in 1932 and 1936.

The rumor that Harry L. Hopkins will succeed Mr. Farley in the chairmanship is exceedingly interesting. That, of course, would be a logical development. Indeed, Republican strategists and genuine Democrats, made resentful by the new dealers' arrogance, might classify it as proof that the law of retribution has not been suspended. Mr. Hopkins, the social worker who became a New Deal dignitary in the first place because he attracted Mrs. Roosevelt's attention and who is now living in the White House, may be even better qualified, at least in principle, than the ineffable Ickes or Tommy Corcoran to direct a third-term campaign designed to keep the New Deal "experimentalists" in power. Certainly James A. Farley would be an incongruous campaign director under the existent circumstances.

Mr. Farley is not likely to announce that he intends to "take a walk" into the Republican ranks this year. He is still a thorough Democrat; and, besides, he is not devoid of friendship for Mr. Roosevelt although their relationship is not what it used to be. The treatment meted out to him by the Democratic Party in recent years and particularly in this 1940 national convention, however, remains highly significant. It is concrete proof that the Democratic Party is no longer controlled by Democrats.

"GENTLEMAN JIM"

As the smoke screens of hypocrisy fade away from the Chicago "draft" session it becomes increasingly clear that the biggest man at the proceedings, the man who came away with his colors of personal integrity, self-respect, and loyalty gloriously flying was James Aloysius Farley, the top flight political leader of America, whom the New Deal's tactics has forced to the sidelines.

Never once in all the trying moments of his stay in the Windy City, a period which saw his prerogatives usurped by the inner guard of the New Deal, saw him left out in the cold while the self-appointed high command spared neither Mr. Farley's pride nor privileges, did the genial, poised national chairman show the slightest irritation or go back on what had been his party, the Democratic Party.

With equal equanimity, Mr. Farley endured indifference, slights, affronts, and shameful neglect from the Hopkins brigade, which kept the wires hot from a smoke-filled room in the Blackstone Hotel to the White House.

Throughout the trying days in Chicago, Mr. Farley carried himself with urbanity, good humor, dignity, and showed himself a man of admirable character and sportsmanship.

The cruelest blow of all to the man who made Roosevelt President in 1932 by his prodigious campaign efforts, and saw 46 of the 48 States flock to the Democratic standard in 1936, reelecting Mr. Roosevelt, was the one in which the White House crowd tried to deny Mr. Farley the realization of a dream he has pursued for 28 years—having his name placed in nomination for the Presidency.

Political realist that he is, Mr. Farley knew better than anyone else at the convention that he stood no chance of winning the nomination. He never really had any serious thoughts that the prize would fall to him, but for nearly three decades he has nursed in his heart the hope that one day he might achieve a status in American life where he could, with consistency, have his name presented to the Democratic Party as a candidate for the nomination.

The party that owed so much to him nearly succeeded in denying Mr. Farley this legitimate joy. The Hopkins roughriders sought to balk the move to have Mr. Farley's name placed in nomination. They tried to talk Senator Glass out of nominating Mr. Farley but they failed. The one thing that Mr. Farley asked from his party after years of faithful service, he got only with sullen reluctance and begrudgingly from the Roosevelt administration.

Senator GLASS made the nominating speech. It was a valiant effort from a great American who places principle before political expediency. It was a speech of which Mr. Farley has every right to be proud, and proud of it he was. "I have pursued a course that has been dictated by the deepest conviction, and when a man fails to follow his convictions he is false to himself, false to his party, and false to his country. I wanted this convention to proceed as a democratic body should proceed to nominate its standard bearers in keeping with the highest traditions of the Democratic Party. That is the democratic method and that has been observed. My name was placed in nomination by a great and noble American. As long as I live I shall be grateful to Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia."

It was one of the biggest moments in Mr. Farley's life. It was an hour of triumph which he had well earned. Fortunately for the good name of the American people it was not the last big moment Mr. Farley had in Chicago. Another came to him on last Friday afternoon, and more expressive than volumes of praise, it bespoke the high, personal qualities of the man the Hopkins roughriders have caused to retire from politics, the game he loved so absorbingly. It came in the form of a spontaneous reception from the American press, which with all its faults, has a way of determining the true value of man. From reporters who have covered the great and the near great for many years, Mr. Farley was presented with a handsome gold watch. It was an eloquent testimonial to his fairness, good sportsmanship, and fine citizenship. It was a natural demonstration of affection which the press would feel moved to give to few men. It was not without significance that they gave it to a man who placed his political head on the block to preserve his integrity, his honor, and to protest the violation of the third-term tradition.

LOSS TO DEMOCRATIC PARTY

James A. Farley said 3 months ago that his name would be offered to the Democratic National Convention as a candidate for the Presidency. Wednesday night his name was presented. Farley kept his word, even though he knew the third-term enthusiasts would reject him ignominiously.

Several times the same Farley has let it be known that he would turn down any opportunity to continue longer as national chairman of his party. When the national committee meets Saturday to select a chairman and otherwise organize for the 1940 campaign, it likely will be found that Farley has kept his word again.

In the passing of Farley from the political picture the Democrats will lose an outstanding figure. A lovable character in the eyes of his friends within the party, by his own personality, astuteness, and organizing ability he contributed immensely to two sweeping Democratic victories.

Although he has differed with the President on the third-term issue, and was replaced as confidential advisor by Hopkins, Ickes, Corcoran, Cohen, and others, it is not likely that Farley will take a walk in the 1940 election. He has a record of party loyalty not approached in modern days. Farley realizes he has had his day, and is not so thin-skinned as to be insulted by being replaced as Presidential advisor.

If Farley merely sits on the bench during the 1940 campaign, that alone will damage the Democratic cause because the genuineness of his loyalty in previous elections has been a great inspiration to his friends and party workers.

[From the Sioux City (Iowa) Journal of July 22, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S EXIT

James A. Farley finally came to a parting of the ways with Franklin D. Roosevelt. For the man he made President of the United States turned against him in a demonstration of ingratitude that has no equal in the political history of the United States. So now "Big Jim," who achieved alone the task of putting Mr. Roosevelt in the White House, leaves politics, resigning as chairman of the Democratic National Committee at the beginning of a new Presidential-election campaign.

Mr. Farley had known for months, even years, that the man he made had less use for him than formerly. There had been a time when Franklin D. Roosevelt eagerly sought the advice and counsel of Jim Farley. He leaned heavily upon him for he had recognized in Mr. Farley a gifted politician, an organizing genius, a man whose personality attracted to his side Democrats of all types, even the New Deal radicals, as long as they could see the way clear to use his talents in their behalf.

As chairman of the Democratic National Committee Mr. Farley was impeccable in his honest treatment of all elements in the party. The soul of honor, he never deceived anyone, and he kept his pledges. His word was his bond. He did not know how to double deal or double cross. He knows now, however, what the double cross and double dealing are.

Just what it was that caused the rift between Mr. Farley and Mr. Roosevelt in the first place may be obscure for some time. It may have been because Mr. Roosevelt preferred the counsel of his "brain trust," the group of yes men he gathered around him. It definitely become known that Mr. Farley himself was not a new dealer but a Democrat of the old school. That did not help the situation, and the rift widened. At last the two men saw each other very little, although one was the President and the other a Cabinet officer.

Once Mr. Farley went to Mr. Roosevelt to ask what his intentions were for 1940. He frankly told the President that he would like to try for the Presidential nomination for himself. The President cut Jim Farley to the bone with what he said and did on that occasion. Characteristically he threw back his head and laughed uproariously. But he laughed alone. Jim Farley did not laugh. Then the President said, "Why, Jim, you couldn't be elected."

So Jim Farley is out as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, a sadder but a far wiser man than before. One wonders how many loyal Democrats who did not like the way the Chicago convention was run by the new dealers but who still are devoted to "Big Jim" Farley will vote when they go into the secret booths in November.

[From the Shreveport (La.) Times of July 23, 1940]

THE NATION ACCLAIMS MR. FARLEY

The real winner in the Democratic National Convention was James A. Farley. He alone came out of that grumbling gathering with the love and loyalty, the admiration and respect of everyone. Today, in the hearts of the vast bulk of the Democratic Party, he is its outstanding figure.

The widespread admiration for Mr. Farley within his party is reflected by those outside of it. Before and during the convention he followed the course on which his conscience and his judgment as to the welfare of his party and his country guided him. He followed it gently, so as not to harm others, but his steps were firm. To the most humble of workers, and to the highest leader, he kept his word. He never evaded, never delayed a decision, and never permitted any situation to arise that might give a false impression of his plans, or lead to embarrassment in the plans of others.

Mr. Farley has ascended from the top pedestal of his own party to a high point of national respect and approval. He well deserves every bit of the respect and acclaim he is receiving.

WINGS AT CHICAGO

The New Deal is getting its wings as a political party in Chicago this week. Like a chicken heart in a laboratory, it has been beating for more than 7 years as the result of injections of plain old-fashioned politics administered by such shrewd and capable doctors as James A. Farley. The decision has now been made to shut off the supply lines, furnish the heart with a body, and send it forth into the wide world.

There is doubt about the strength of the new wings, not only among Republicans who have been disgruntled by the phenomenon of artificial life during the Roosevelt tenure, but among the old-line Democrats who fear the consequences of scuttling an established party and replacing it with an organization whose very foundation is the heady liberalism that has been successful politically only as it has been kept in check. Supplying the brakes were the minority opposition and that section of the Democratic Party which still adheres to the democracy of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. Farley has been stripped of his chevrons. Harry Hopkins has replaced him as the political Moses for the third New Deal. The Hopkins-Corcoran-Cohen circle of palace pets has at last won its long-drawn-out fight with the Democratic regulars; Roosevelt has dropped the pilot.

In the convention excitement, in the certainty of Roosevelt's nomination in spite of his cryptic message of Tuesday night, there is no doubt but that the new general staff has won its initial victory. The frantic efforts to reclaim Jim Farley for the actual election campaign are a demonstration of weakness, however. Even the omniscient inner circle probably realizes this.

It was one thing to shove the political brains of the election organization aside for convention purposes; it will be another thing to convince the people of the United States that those brains are outmoded and worthless; it will be another thing to replace the discarded parts of a political machine that has functioned with the most efficient, if most ruthless, power in the modern era of American politics.

Attempts to butter Jim Farley are being made now, after the glove has been thrown in his face. The New Deal party banks on his traditional loyalty to avert a schism that is daily becoming more imminent. Perhaps Mr. Farley will give in, for the sake of appearances and because of that loyalty, which is deep-rooted.

Farley as an acquiescent follower is different than Farley as an active leader, however. His antipathy to a third term is no secret. The insult of permitting Senator Barkley to disclose the third-term decision, rather than leaving the announcement to the national chairman, rankles in Mr. Farley's breast, according to word from Chicago. Further, the ascendant star of the superliberals, whom Farley has long detested and kept in check, must supply a backlog of bitterness for the Postmaster General's present state of mind. He may go along, but his company will not implement the New Deal cause as it did in 1932 and again in 1936.

The New York Post is probably the most ardent pro-New Deal newspaper in the country today. One of its columnists at Chicago is Samuel Grafton, who has vigorously supported Mr. Roosevelt's policies all along. If this analysis of the outlook for the coming campaign seems like Republican propaganda, read Mr. Grafton in Tuesday night's Post. He says:

"Mr. Farley is perhaps the most gifted campaign manager in the country's history, and some of the liberals, who want to run the party, also want Farley to stay as chairman. That is what they are fighting for today. Perhaps he will stay. His loyalty goes deep. But it is now going to be a new kind of party. Mr. Farley knows it, and does not like it. He knows how to run a party, and he was willing to carry liberalism along. Now it is a little uncertain who is carrying whom, and a new crystallization is taking place deep down in the oldest American political organization."

[From the Shelby (N. C.) Daily Star of July 13, 1940]

HE'LL BE MISSED

The rumor persists that after the Chicago Democratic National Convention James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee and Postmaster General in the Roosevelt Cabinet, will resign.

That will be a great loss to the Democratic Party.

The organizing genius of Farley is unsurpassed in the political annals of the Nation. Furthermore, he has done a good job as Postmaster General. Giving credit where due, it must be acknowledged that much of the Democratic gains in the United States during the past 8 years has been due to the efforts of Farley.

The Democratic Party without Farley to direct the campaign this year, following the convention in Chicago, will be at a distinct disadvantage. To him more than any other man must go the credit of the Democratic majorities in 1932 and in 1936. His ability is conceded by his opponents and he would be an exceedingly useful man to the party this year, particularly in view of the imposing set-up contemplated by the Republican Party.

The reported resignation of Farley is taken by some to mean that he is convinced that President Roosevelt will be offered a third-term nomination by the Democrats. Further, some hold that he is convinced the President will run again.

There is little doubt but what President Roosevelt is the strongest man the Democrats can offer at this time. But, likewise, there is no question that the absence of the ability of Farley in the active campaign will take some of the Roosevelt strength from him.

Some months ago it appeared that Farley's name would be placed before the convention for President irrespective of the President's intentions. Even if this should be done, if the President's name goes before the convention, in the face of pledges he has received, neither Farley nor any other candidate will have a chance to win the nomination.

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press of July 20, 1940]

A GREAT LEADER—A GRAND MAN

(By C. E. Broughton, national committeeman)

James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee for 8 years, the man whose organization work laid the foundation for Roosevelt's first nomination, is to retire next month to reengage in business.

While it was known among his intimate friends that he had remained in public life at great financial sacrifice and that he was to retire, still the bold announcement made at the meeting of the Democratic National Committee yesterday caused keen regret.

A little over 8 years ago Mr. Farley was little known beyond the confines of New York State, but his aggressive leadership over a period of 8 years has made him a national figure and one of the most beloved men in the Democratic Party.

As Postmaster General and a member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet he has endeared himself to both Republicans and Democrats alike. As Postmaster General he has inaugurated many new business ethics that have brought the system to the highest point in all history. To every employee in the Department he is plain Jim, and when he leaves every member of the force, from the highest to those in the more humble positions, will miss him.

In political parties men come and go. Some are not even mentioned when they retire, but this was not the case with Mr. Farley. Every member of the national committee holds him in high esteem because he has never broken his word, and he is a leader others are proud to follow.

In the Chicago convention no man received greater recognition. The "boys of the press," the delegates, the men who make up the official family at Washington, all paid deserved tribute to his leadership. A number of newspapers endeavored to create the impression that there had been a break between the President and Mr. Farley, all of which was disproved in the convention.

Throughout the entire proceedings there were just two men who stood out most prominently, the President and Mr. Farley. Mr. Farley is not only a leader, but he has guided the destinies of the national committee through an 8-year period to a point where efficiency is the last word. He has built up an organization and retires with the gratifying knowledge that there is a surplus of more than $100,000 in the treasury and that all convention expenses are paid. That is a compliment for the organization under Mr. Farley.

The President paid a tribute to "Jim" in his address to the convention Thursday night. While it is only natural that two great leaders might differ at times upon public questions, that difference at no time affected the cordial relations between the two.

The Democratic Party and Mr. Roosevelt owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Farley for the outstanding leadership he has displayed, his loyalty to the New Deal and the many financial sacrifices that he has made.

If "Jim" Farley had lived in any other State but New York, he would have been named the candidate for vice president, for all the delegates in that convention wanted to do something in recognition. They passed resolutions, they applauded, they honored him in every respect they could.

As one who has served under Jim Farley for 8 years, let me say that he is one of the grandest leaders, one of the "squarest shooters" in public life, and our friendship cannot be shattered by his retirement.

[From the Seattle (Wash.) Times of July 26, 1940]

CHAIRMAN WANTED

Messrs. Roosevelt and Wallace, holding first conference as candidates for President and Vice President, seek somebody to serve as chairman of their party's national committee. Mr. Wallace is to make a speaking tour of the country. Mr. Roosevelt, pleading pressure of business, will keep off the road and hang around the radio. There must be a chairman to run the organization and round up votes.

No doubt many persons would be willing to take the chairmanship, but there will be difficulty in getting a Democrat on the job. Democrats whose names have been mentioned in this connection quickly shy away. Southern Democratic leaders will not soon recover from the humiliation inflicted upon them in the Chicago "putsch." Northern Democratic leaders are not likely to forget the treatment of Mr. Jim Farley. And, anyway, what the new party really needs is a chairman of the same bent as the candidates.

SPURNED AND SUGARED

No matter whom they choose, Messrs. Roosevelt and Wallace will not find a chairman of such all-round qualifications as Mr. Farley has demonstrated. Big Jim goes out in an aura of mingled heroism and martyrdom; publicly spurned by the man he made President, yet as publicly smothered with sugary words of endearment. Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt vied with each other in telling the world of their love for Mr. Farley. Some folks may swallow this; not "Big Jim."

Despite all cut and dried arrangements for the glorification of Roosevelt, Farley was easily the star of the Chicago show. We hark back to this for brief consideration of reasons for his popularity with Democrats. Even new dealers who don't like him concede Farley's political genius.

PRACTICAL POLITICS

Farley won favor with Democrats because he gave them the first taste of victory they'd had in 16 years. No one has ever given Roosevelt credit for more than a talking part in the 1932 campaign. Farley procured his nomination and put him over with the voters. Farley lined up the biggest industrial magnates of the country, later to be denounced by Roosevelt as tories, reactionaries, and crooks, to furnish money for the campaign. Farley extended the methods Tammany had taught him to induce harmonious action by every corrupt State and city political machine. Practical politics is unconcerned with any moral or social issue.

And again in 1936, it was practical politics that moved Mr. Farley to compel abandonment of the Democratic requirement of the two-thirds convention vote to nominate a candidate for President. That was shrewd preparedness for easy control of this year's convention. No doubt Farley expected to be at the controls. Roosevelt crowded him out.

HALO ASLANT

And so, as Mr. Farley moves on to take prominent part in that other national game—baseball—a Nation that wishes him well need not be blind to his share in creating a situation which has become intolerable to many and distasteful to all Democrats. The halo of virtue which seemed to surmount his cranium during the painful processes at Chicago, appears somewhat aslant in retrospect.

People cannot help but think of the well-rewarded cooperation of Tammany's Flynn, Jersey City's Hague, Chicago's Ed Kelly; the Pendergast machine in Missouri up to the time its boss was put in jail; the Guffey Pennsylvania machine, and the racketeers of every big city in the land. The New Deal has done well by all these. They may miss Farley's leadership, but they'll go along.

[From the New York World-Telegram of July 20, 1940]

JIM FARLEY

The Democratic National Convention closed not to the swing of Happy Days Are Here Again, but to that melodious tune, When Irish Eyes Are Smiling.

No greater tribute has been paid to a politician than was given freely to Jim Farley in Chicago. The delegates gave him everything but their votes; it was too much to expect that men in politics for what they can get out of it would let sentiment or conviction stand in the way of self-interest.

And cynical newspaper correspondents, who had seen many national chairmen come and go, gave Jim a farewell testimonial party that brought mist to eyes long dry.

Remember 8 years ago, when Mr. Roosevelt and the bright young men around him were hailed as white-plumed idealists and there was much shaking of heads at the thought that they were handicapped by the grubby materialism of "Jobmaster" Farley?

With the suns that have risen and set and the water that has flowed down the river, skeptics have learned more and more about the smart young men who talked idealism while reaching out for more personal power and have learned more and more about unpretentious gum-chewing Jim Farley, who never boasted a doctor's degree nor presumed that his code of ethics was higher than that of any other honorable man.

Jim has scarcely any hair on his head, but the bright young boys got into it. They poached on his preserve, undermined his chief's confidence in him, and finally left Jim on the outside of the White House looking in.

By the time the curtain fell the Ph. D.'s of high and noble purpose had been revealed as men of greedy ambitions, and Jim Farley was no longer called "jobmaster," but "Mr. Postmaster General," the most efficient head of the postal service since Benjamin Franklin, and Jim, the politician, who never broke his word, who never failed a friend. And he made his last stand on the simple democratic principle that in a nation of free men and in a party dedicated to liberalism, delegates should vote each according to his own conscience.

[From the Schenectady (N. Y.) Union-Star of July 18, 1940]

"VAULTING AMBITION WHICH O'ERLEAPS ITSELF"

In a convention which was far from unanimous, a third-term nomination was voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt in the small hours of the morning at Chicago.

The Democratic Party allowed itself to be dominated by influences which were not in accord with either the judgment of many of its leaders or with the unwritten law of the land against conferring the Presidency of the Nation more than twice on any man. Not even Washington or Jefferson was great enough for a third term.

The big man of the convention was James A. Farley, national chairman, who stood for the orderly processes of democracy regardless of the ambition of any man, and would not permit even the President of the United States and the head of the party to dictate to him when he stood for a principle, the principle of no third term. Greater than Mr. Roosevelt himself loomed the man who largely had made him President.

It was ill-requited service which Farley gave his one-time hero. For 16 years he had done the hard, toilsome work of directing and forwarding Mr. Roosevelt's political fortunes. Roosevelt's two terms as Governor and two terms as President would have been impossible without him. The man who had been lightly—perhaps too lightly—considered merely a vote-getting politician stands revealed before the Nation, in the crucial test, the greater man of the two.

As compared with the petty equivocations and evasions which marked Mr. Roosevelt's approach to the question of the third term, the forthright statement of his faithful right-hand man, Farley, shines in contrast: "I have pursued a course here that has been directed by deepest convictions. When a man fails to follow his convictions, no matter what the consequences, he's false to himself, he's false to his party, and he's false to his country."

Thus rebuked in open convention, Mr. Roosevelt may gaze today upon the political wreckage he has caused. The party which sponsored his two elections to the highest office in the land is split wide apart. Wounded are the friends who, with shining-eyed devotion, elevated him to the heights. Ambition and the worship of power have led to political ingratitude. The idol of men's devotion turns out to have feet of clay.

[From the Scranton (Pa.) Times of July 20, 1940]

ALL SAY "GOOD LUCK, JIM"

James A. Farley, Postmaster General—Jim Farley, as President Roosevelt himself says he likes to call him—is quitting his post as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, which carries with it responsibility of directing the campaign. On Thursday night both President and Mrs. Roosevelt spoke words of praise of Farley. Jim had been voted on in the convention for both the Presidential and Vice Presidential nominations. Not only in the convention, but wherever he went in Chicago during the week, he was received like a champion and a hero. He deserved it all.

It is a bit strange how men grow in public esteem. Eight years ago Farley was looked upon by many within the Democratic Party as well as without as just another Tammany politician adept in winning friends and organizing. It is generally conceded he had as much if not more to do than any other man in bringing about Mr. Roosevelt's nomination in 1932. Four years ago when he made his prediction that Mr. Landon would carry only two States, which developed to be the exact number the Republican nominee did carry, he was scoffed at. When he was appointed Postmaster General it was agreed he was entitled to the reward from a political or purely party standpoint.

A lot of Republican newspapers and orators praising him today were certain in 1933 he had no capacity for business, that he would mismanage the postal department. Even when he was able to report the post office had been operated without a deficit they scoffed, and efforts were made to show he was thimblerigging the reports. In the face of these early suspicions and antipathies Mr. Farley continued to make friends and to force on the country the fact that he is a genuine leader, some even say a statesman, and conceivably might have been the candidate of the convention if Mr. Roosevelt had not decided to run again.

He emerges now one of the big figures of the convention more beloved by Democrats than ever and it can be said, too, more respected by Republicans. Mr. Farley is going to get into business. He feels it is time he made a little something for himself. No one can blame him for that. He has a family responsibility. Some say that Mr. Farley is not in accord with the President's seeking a third term. Be that as it may, there are few so rash as to believe or declare that Jim will ever be a bolter or take a walk.

[From the Abingtonian, Clarks Summit, Pa., of July 26, 1940]

JAMES A. FARLEY

James A. Farley, plain Jim to the thousands who know him well, is back in New York cleaning out his desk preliminary to his giving over the reins and stepping down from the driver's seat of the Democratic band wagon. He made a great national chairman of his party during those 8 years that he has been at the head of the parade.

Jim Farley has had many honors heaped upon him in his public career but none, we gather, touched him more than the little surprise party tendered him by the newspapermen and newspaperwomen of the country after the curtain rang down in Chicago. The scribes, who know and appreciate Jim's worth to his party and to the country, gave him a dinner and presented him with a fine timepiece.

"There was some huskiness in throats and an extra beat of pulse as these hard-hearted cynics of the newspaper world told Jim they were sorry to see him leaving the spot of command," Capt. John M. Cummings wired back to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

"The Republicans, of course, are glad that Jim is retiring from the chairmanship," again quoting Cummings. "They have no man to match Jim. The Democratic Party has no man to replace him. Perhaps that's why they're having so much trouble locating a new chairman.

"Each man approached knows that Jim Farley is the yardstick by which future chairmen will be measured. And each, in turn, shies away from the thought of being shown up as a pygmy," is the way Cummings expressed it. He was echoing the sentiments, the feelings, of everyone in the newspaper game who have been privileged to call Jim Farley their friend. So, best of luck in your new field of endeavor, Jim.

[From the Savannah (Ga.) Morning News of July 21, 1940]

A MATTER OF PRINCIPLE

It was a matter of principle, a question of deep-rooted Americanism, which caused Postmaster General James A. Farley to terminate his political partnership with President Roosevelt. When it came to the third-term issue, Mr. Farley could no longer go along with the President, whose determination to seek continuance in this high office, in disregard of American tradition, is even more repugnant to thousands of Democrats and Republicans alike than the President's Supreme Court packing plan.

Mr. Farley, astute politician that he is, readily sensed the fact that, in engineering a plan to have himself "drafted," the President was pursuing the wrong course just as he was pursuing the wrong course when he attempted to "purge" such opponents of some of the New Deal policies as Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, and Senator "Cotton Ed" SMITH, of South Carolina. Mr. Roosevelt, in his acceptance speech, spoke truthfully, yet perhaps more prophetically than he realized, when he said that only the people can "draft a President."

Mr. Farley emerged from the Chicago convention a bigger and stronger man even than when he went in. In a speech a few months ago he declared in unmistakable terms that if it ever came to a choice between his party and his country, America must come first. Mr. Farley has lived up to his convictions. He has been against the third term from the beginning and it has long been apparent that he would never manage the campaign of a third-term candidate. The whole Nation applauds his decision and his courage in refusing to break the third-term tradition which for nearly 150 years has been considered an unwritten law.

Many who watched the Chicago convention carefully do not look upon Mr. Roosevelt's nomination as a "draft" by the people. It had been carefully engineered by the Hopkins-Corcoran-Ickes group who had been preparing it for many months and went to Chicago to manage and direct it. There was nothing spontaneous about it and hundreds of delegates left the convention in sadness because of the violation of the great American tradition and in fear of the results of this violation. It is a precedent which may bring about an effort to break further precedents. Many loyal Americans feel it more acutely because of a growing fear of the encroachments of the idea of the dictatorship state.

"Jim" Farley had more to do with making Mr. Roosevelt President than any other man. He was the political generalissimo of the battle of 1932. F. D. R. owes a great personal debt to his triggerman. Yet in recent years Mr. Farley has not enjoyed the President's confidence. "Dear Jim" has been shunted aside for newer friends and more polished advisers. The confidential whisper at Hyde Park as to the President's intention to run again may have been intended to make up for previous tendencies to ignore Mr. Farley. Now that the third-term nomination has actually taken place, the country unquestionably has been profoundly shocked. Such action would have been unfortunate at any time in our history. It is doubly so in these critical days when democracy is so acutely and so definitely on trial. Thousands of Democrats are firmly convinced that history will disclose that, in the recent shaping of the party's course, Mr. Farley was right and Mr. Roosevelt was wrong.

[From the Santa Barbara (Calif.) News-Press, evening of July 27, 1940]

A NEW NATIONAL APPRECIATION OF JAMES A. FARLEY—POLITICIAN

The victors in the recent Democratic National Convention at Chicago have reaped the first fruits of their victories—on front pages and in endless radio programs. They have settled down to consolidate their gains for the great battle of ballots to come. In the lull between the battle of the convention and the battle of the ballot box it is not only fitting and just, but also a real pleasure, to recognize the one man who came out of that Chicago convention a bigger and more respected man than he went in—James A. Farley.

Jim Farley went into that convention knowing that his major contributions to an important phase of national life—to which he had given the greater part of his working life—were about to end. The results of that convention were too generally anticipated to have been hidden from a man of Farley's unprecedented knowledge of politics. Yet Farley met the situation with a smile and—when the time came—he said, for the good of his party, the words that announced the death of his great and warranted ambition—to be President of the United States.

That act and those words made plain to the whole Nation that Farley's entire conduct throughout that convention was equally admirable. And, almost suddenly, the vast majority of Americans saw Jim Farley, the politician, in a new and sincerely friendly light. The millions who read about the convention and listened to its proceedings over the radio could not escape the evidences that—on the basis of friendly feeling and aside from expediency and interest—Jim Farley was the most popular man there. The genuineness of the tribute paid him—in word and song and applause—were convincing and contagious.

It is an old saying that "A man is judged by the company he keeps." It is much more true to say that a man should be judged by the fine things he preserves in himself despite the company he keeps.

Jim Farley was in practical politics. He had a job to do with the tools and materials that were available and according to the rules and regulations that custom—not he—had provided. For whatever unselfish objectives he had he was forced, to a large extent, to use the selfish motives of others. That, unfortunately, is a large part of politics. That, until the Chicago convention, was the basis of mass American evaluation of Jim Farley.

To have rounded out 30 years of outstanding political activity to such a climax of friendly national appreciation Jim Farley must have something very clean and human on the inside that would have been crushed and embittered long ago if it had not been sterling. It is to be regretted that, when Jim Farley heard the cheers in Chicago's convention hall, he could not have heard also the mental cheers of the millions listening in.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 18, 1940]

GOOD-BYE, JIM

It was good-bye, Jim, on many a tongue when Mr. Farley arrived in Washington in March 1933, to become a member of the President's official family as Postmaster General. True, the place was his under the aegis of political custom. It was the traditional reward for the important merit of having successfully managed a Presidential campaign.

A vague notion of propriety, however, had heretofore prompted the recipient of the postal portfolio to resign his party office. Not so with Mr. Farley. He retained a firm grip on the national chairmanship and also stayed on as chairman of New York's Democratic Central Committee. His defiance of established usage got on a lot of people's nerves.

Nobody has ever computed the number of times that wishful Washington gossip had Farley on the eve of quitting, but brain trusters flamed and faded, unofficial favorites bloomed and withered, yet Farley went amiably and happily on.

In '36 Mr. Farley reprinted the old adage that nothing succeeds like success. Washington developed a different quota of emotions toward him. Life wasn't an unbroken series of ovations, but Farley came into a wide and cordial esteem.

An exception may be noted. The smiling candidate who, on the triumphant election night of 1932, acknowledged to his campaign manager, "You're the man who did it, Jim," reputedly frowned on Farley's own legitimate ambition to be his successor, and was unappreciatively remote throughout the tension of the third-term speculation.

Early today came the climax of Farley's career, to brighten the stage play at Chicago with a bit of genuine drama. His brief address of gratitude for the votes he had received, his motion for a unanimous ballot for Roosevelt, his expression of devotion to the party, added up to the ultimate in good sportsmanship. The son of Grassy Point couldn't be a winner, but he could be a superlatively good loser. The delegates, even fanatical third-termers, responded with an ovation that seemed to outdo in sincere enthusiasm that for the President himself.

So again, according to all the omens, it is as James Whitcomb Riley put it, "Well, good-bye, Jim, take keer of yourse'f." It is a regretful farewell now, with best wishes. And however the 8 adventurous years may ultimately be summed up, history will provide a niche for Jim Farley as one of the New Deal's cast who personally made good.

FARLEY VETOES THE DRAFT

At least one member of the New Deal's official family has a deaf ear for third-term drafts. James A. Farley was reelected chairman of the Democratic National Committee but refused to remain in the saddle. He has resigned, effective August 17, and the Democratic Party loses the services of one of the greatest organization geniuses in the history of American politics.

"Big Jim," the urbane, genial, shrewd master of political technic, was more beloved by the rank and file of party workers than any man on the Washington scene. He knew an utterly unbelievable number of good Democrats by their front names. He never forgot or failed to appreciate the efforts of the lowliest laborer in democracy's vineyard. Often he wrote them personal notes of thanks. The general regard in which he was held was reflected in the complimentary vote he received for the Presidential nomination.

His departure from the committee was due partially to personal reasons. He has long felt the need for building up an income for his family, which he was unable to do in politics. His service in electing President Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936 was ill-rewarded when his advice and council were ignored by the White House and he was ostracized from the inner circle. But the predominant reason for his departure from active politics is undoubtedly a deep-rooted, patriotic aversion to a third term for any President of the United States.

He will return to private life with the best wishes of Republicans and Democrats alike. And if G. O. P. faithful are loudest in their well wishing at his departure, they can hardly be blamed. The Democrats will hunt far and long before they find a man to fill the Farley boots.

[From the Rockford (Ill.) Star of July 19, 1940]

The Chicago convention was not of a character to elevate the stature generally of politicians, but one man came out of it with heightened respect and affection; we are not sure that we did not see the politician metamorphosed into a statesman before our eyes. It is assumed that since he has reached that state the Democratic Party will have no further use for Jim Farley.

Farley, the genius of two Presidential campaigns, the honest politician who leaves high political position a poor man, the friendly soul who always attributed to his friends purer motives than his sagacity should have advised, went down for a principle. He believed that the third term was against the grain of American tradition and wisdom. He did not quote Jefferson against violation of tradition; he simply held that it would be bad for the party. Farley spoke in party terms; he was ingenuous enough to believe that the wisdom and principles and political morals of Democratic statesmen spoke in the aggregate of party. Party to him meant collective ideals, collective moralities, to be used for the glory of the Republic. He is not a complex character; party meant to him statesmanship.

His disillusionment began some time ago. The new dealers had to use the car against a number of people who thought to climb into the boat. Farley was made no exception. But he clung to his principle and took it to Chicago to make a fight for it. He found that party meant the statesmanship of booing the 82-year-old Virginian who put his name into nomination. He found it meant the reward of gleaning 72 votes; the payoff for 8 years of toil. He has only the comfort of knowing that if Thomas Jefferson had appeared in the flesh to declare himself against a third term, he likewise would have been booed.

Farley knew what was coming, as did CARTER GLASS. But principle stood like a stone wall against the discomfiture of the moment. Then, hiding his wounds, he stood before the convention that booed him and moved acclamation. We trust the more abundant life awaits Jim Farley as he returns to private affairs.

[From the Roanoke (Va.) Times of July 21, 1940]

JIM FARLEY STEPS ASIDE

Once again Jim Farley has demonstrated that he is a man who keeps his word. He had said that, regardless of the President's decision, his name would go before the Democratic convention in Chicago as a candidate for the Presidential nomination. And it was so done, even though Mr. Farley knew perfectly well that he didn't stand a Chinaman's chance of being nominated.

Farley had also said that he would not manage President Roosevelt's campaign for reelection and would retire as national chairman. Tremendous pressure was brought to bear in an effort to persuade him to reconsider and stay on as head of the national committee. The President himself, it is understood, asked Farley to stay and the party leaders did everything in their power at Chicago to make him change his mind and remain at the helm.

All of their efforts came to naught. Farley had made up his mind to quit. And he did. On August 17 he will retire as national chairman, and shortly thereafter, will resign as Postmaster-General, his resignation to take effect at the President's convenience. His plans for the future have not been announced, but it is generally believed that he has acquired the necessary financial backing to purchase the New York Yankees and affiliated minor league clubs, and is going to transfer his interests from politics to baseball by stepping into the shoes of the late Jake Ruppert, owner of the Yankees until his death more than a year ago.

If this report is true, Farley will be returning to his first love—the realm of sport. He was chairman of the New York State Boxing Commission when Al Smith persuaded him to enter politics as New York State Democratic chairman—a post he still holds, and which he has indicated he will not relinquish for the present. In 1932 Farley threw in his political fortunes with those of Franklin D. Roosevelt—and the rest is history.

Farley was largely responsible for Roosevelt's nomination for the Presidency at the Democratic convention of 1932 in Chicago and subsequently, at Mr. Roosevelt's invitation, became the party's national chairman. He is generally acknowledged to be the outstanding political genius of his time, and his refusal to manage the President's campaign for a third term is a serious loss to the party and an equally serious blow to the President's prospects for reelection.

Asked by a reporter in Chicago, "Who's going to win in November?" Farley answered, "I think I should leave comment on that point to my successor." However, he made it clear that he intended to support the Democratic ticket.

Choice of Farley's successor will be made by a subcommittee appointed by the Democratic National Committee to confer with President Roosevelt and his running mate, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, on the matter. The committee undoubtedly will be guided by the President's wishes. Frank C. Walker, New York businessman and former treasurer of the national committee, is understood to be in line for the chairmanship, although he is reluctant to take it. In the event that Walker does not accept, it is believed that Senator JAMES F. BYRNES, of South Carolina, is next in line. In that connection it is interesting to note that BYRNES' colleague, Senator E. D. (Cotton Ed) SMITH, has announced that he will "take a walk" and will not support President Roosevelt for reelection.

[From the Roanoke Times of July 19, 1940]

JIM FARLEY

James A. Farley knew perfectly well, of course, that he was not going to be nominated for President at Chicago. And since he knew in advance what the result of the balloting would be, he can hardly have been greatly disappointed at the outcome. As far as the nomination was concerned, it just wasn't Jim Farley's night.

But in another sense it most decidedly was Jim Farley's night. The convention cheered every mention of his name, and more than one delegate, in announcing his vote for Roosevelt, digressed long enough to give expression to his liking and regard for the party's able and efficient national chairman, who has twice guided the Democratic ticket to impressive victories at the polls.

Whether Farley stays on or retires as national chairman, he knows now how highly he is thought of by the party. He has worked long and unselfishly to promote its success, and he richly merited the encomiums so lavishly heaped upon him Wednesday night.

'Tis said that Farley and the President are no longer on the close and intimate terms that once marked their relationship. If that is so, it is the President's loss, and it is no light one. Other men have come to enjoy the President's confidence, and it was to other men, unmistakably, that he entrusted the guidance of his political fortunes at Chicago. But a dozen such men as Walker, Hopkins, and Byrnes cannot take the place of Jim Farley, as the President will find out later, if he does not already realize it.

Jim Farley has proved himself not only a loyal and zealous Democrat, but a square shooter through and through. If he has reached the decision, as is reported, to retire from politics in the near future, that is not only the President's loss but the Democratic Party's loss as well. Never an ardent new dealer, he has shown himself to be a great Democrat and a loyal American. His party ought to be, and undoubtedly is, proud of him—proud and grateful. It owes him a great deal.

OUR SYMPATHY GOES OUT TO JAMES A. FARLEY

Differing from him in many ways politically, we have, however, always admired the many good qualities of James A. Farley, which have brought him the respect of others also not in political agreement with him but who join in sympathizing with this famous Democratic leader in the predicament in which he finds himself. He has been overwhelmed by a bunch of new dealers, with the full knowledge and consent of the man he made Governor of New York and President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Balked in his aspirations for the nomination for President after having evidently been assured by Mr. Roosevelt that he would not be a candidate, and again balked in his backing to be Vice Presidential candidate also by the same bunch of new dealers, we don't blame Jim Farley for throwing up the sponge, although we hate to see a man of his standing and of his integrity and loyalty so humiliated as to cause him to quiver like a leaf behind a huge fan while sitting on the stage during the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt and his understudy, Mr. Wallace.

Yes; Jim Farley will be loyal. He'll go along with the party because loyalty is one of his cardinal principles, but there will be a sad difference between the Jim Farley of yesteryears and the Jim Farley of today when it comes to piloting the destiny of a great political party which, in the opinion of thousands of people, is digging its own political grave upon orders from high up in its organization.

[From the Providence Journal of July 21, 1940]

NOT EVEN VENGEANCE

After all is said and done, it was James A. Farley and not Franklin D. Roosevelt who emerged as the really dramatic figure of the Democratic National Convention.

It may be that history will concern itself more with Roosevelt, since his action, in having his personal lieutenants direct the course of the convention toward securing a third nomination for him, brought the United States to a turning point in its political history, the full significance of which no man can know until after the people have rendered their verdict next November.

If Roosevelt wins then, what he maneuvered to have this national convention do, may well mark the beginning of the end of limited tenure of office for our future Presidents, and may see the American democracy start down the same road which the Roman Republic traveled when Julius Caesar took power and which led the French Republic to the first empire when Napoleon became Consul for life.

If Roosevelt is overwhelmingly defeated, the American electorate may close that road to the ambitious of future Presidents for all time to come, and may make inviolate Thomas Jefferson's democratic principle that ours must be a government of laws and not of men, a government of limited powers in order that government shall always be the servant of the people, and therefore a government with a limited tenure of office for its Chief Executive.

It will be with such matters that historians will concern themselves when they come to write the record of the Democratic National Convention just held and of the election to come in November.

But they will write history with a dead hand indeed if they overlook the role played in this drama by James A. Farley. We are free to confess that it revealed the chairman of the Democratic National Committee to us in a new light. We had always thought of him as the genial and very able political organizer who was probably not much concerned with the philosophy of government of the administration which his organizing genius did so much to bring to power and to keep in office. Then, too, we thought of him as naturally and properly ambitious for high elective office; if not for the Presidency, then for the Vice Presidency as the tail of any acceptable Presidential candidate's kite, Mr. Roosevelt's or another's.

We underestimated Mr. Farley. To understand him, it is perhaps necessary first to accept Senator CARTER GLASS' characterization of him as a "great partisan." Now Senator GLASS, as a politician—we use the term in this instance with the deepest respect—doubtless can understand that term "great partisan" better than can the journalistic mind. The newspaper man finds his measure of greatness at the other end of the scale—to be great is to be liberal in the sense of being free from bias and therefore free from partisanship. But the "great partisan" is another character altogether. He has accepted honors at the hands of the party. He owes an allegiance.

So Jim Farley was an intense partisan, a dyed-in-the-wool Democrat, but a great partisan withal. It was to the principles of the Democratic Party as the champion of the democratic process that he gave his extraordinary loyalty. The way he conducted himself throughout one of the most difficult personal experiences that a man in public life could undergo showed James Farley to be a very unusual man of principle.

As we read the record, Farley had probably never had a very deep conviction that he would ever win the Presidential nomination. He thought himself entitled to it and was rightfully proud of the caliber of men who supported him in that position. So he was quite ready to go before a Democratic National Convention on that basis and could find his satisfaction in such a candidacy alone. He did not have to win the nomination to be satisfied for himself. If to be elected President was the greatest of all honors, it was nevertheless an honor in Jim Farley's eyes to be a candidate of a great party, and honor enough to be a proper candidate before a proper Democratic convention for that nomination.

If anyone thinks this was because Farley was a man of small aspiration, he utterly misunderstands the man. Within the strict limits of party organization, to Farley every play of the game was an honor and the whole should lead to the fulfillment of the great democratic process of which he believed his party was the true champion. He would give his loyalty to that, body and soul, without its being necessary that the prize should be his alone.

But as Farley entered this contest, he saw—and we know now that he saw very clearly and quite early in the game—that it was to be played this time to destroy a great democratic principle, to end the free selection of candidates by the convention of his party, and that he would be humiliatingly shut out in this process. He had to choose then between enduring the humiliating experience of having his constituted authority as national chairman flouted by the White House janizary and of having his candidacy reduced to complete impotency, or throwing in the sponge, taking the cash, and letting the credit go.

Farley decided that it was worth while to go through with his candidacy and endure what might come. But the remarkable thing is that he decided to do this in his natural character as a "great partisan." Not once did Farley show the slightest vindictiveness. And when a man can be hurt as deeply as Jim Farley was throughout that period and not flinch, put him down for a man of character.

And for whom or for what was this struggle so doomed to defeat worth while? Surely it was not worth while for Farley. It could get him nothing but humiliation. There was no material reward whatsoever for him at the end of it. Had he played it for vengeance, that might have been one reward. But we never saw vengeance stay out of a man's heart as it did out of Farley's. He urged Senator CARTER GLASS in his nominating speech to stick to the task of properly nominating him and not try to take vengeance on Roosevelt. He even refused to allow his close friend and stanch supporter, former Governor Ely, of Massachusetts, to second his nomination, after Farley had asked him to come to Chicago for that purpose, because Mr. Ely said frankly that he could not do so without saying that he thought Roosevelt had perpetrated a fraud upon the convention in saying that he was not a candidate and that Roosevelt was a self-seeking demagogue threatening a vital principle of democracy in seeking a third term.

No. Farley asked nothing for himself—not even vengeance. But what he did was the one thing essential to force that convention to follow the democratic process or at least the democratic form, even if it be for the last time. Because Farley would not withdraw, and because he said that American public opinion would not tolerate a nomination by acclamation and the abandonment of the form of free assemblies, in allowing all candidates to go before the convention and allowing all delegates to record their votes if they so desired, that convention at least had to function in the open and Roosevelt had to reveal that he was a candidate like any other candidate, a self-seeker after the nomination.

It was Farley who made the record straight and clear for history and for his contemporaries, if we have the sense to see it. He did it without reward for himself. He did it without the slightest show of rancor. He did it as the "great partisan" and at the end, true to that character, moved that Roosevelt's nomination be made by acclamation. His friend, Governor Ely, surrendered his credentials and left the convention rather than give his approval to a candidacy that threatens to fasten the curse of empire upon this democracy. The two men parted ways there. Both men acted from conscience. We believe Ely took the necessary course. Farley remains "the great partisan." But in that role he has earned our admiration and our deep respect. His partisanship was a loyalty to principle. Still saying he is opposed to a third term from deep conviction, Farley may be keeping to the fold to save the party from itself.

Think of the candidates who withdrew. Which of them, think you, did more for the democratic principle of limited power in our Government: Wheeler, who withdrew his name but who not very candidly attacked the President's candidacy in his first statement after the nomination, or Jim Farley who stuck, took it on the chin, and moved that the nomination be made by acclamation? Farley alone made that convention stand and deliver in the open. He paid the price to do that. The delegates thought they were honoring Jim Farley at the end of their loud applause. But rather, we think, they were taking back a little honor to themselves, of which they were in sore need after their exhibition of supine surrender to the ambition of a Chief Executive who thinks nothing of the sanctity of the principles our founding fathers gave us as the basis of free government.

"SUNNY JIM" RETIRES

Nothing more becoming than James A. Farley's manner of leaving the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee and politics could be imagined. He had received cruel treatment from the President whom he had maneuvered twice into election. He had been roughly ignored at the convention; the management of affairs had been taken from him and thrust into the hands of the inept Harry Hopkins. Farley himself had had again and again to tell reporters that he did not know what was being planned. Yet in spite of this ingratitude in the White House and in spite of the disappointment in being defeated in his ambition, "Sunny Jim" never forgot to smile; he never once voiced his proper resentment; he even comes out wholeheartedly in full support of ticket and platform. He and his conduct remain the only bright spot in the whole sordid affair at Chicago.

Yet Mr. Roosevelt, after having abused the man who made him, had the temerity to plead with "Sunny Jim" to manage the campaign. No dice. Mr. Farley is adamant. He will stay on the job 4 weeks and no more. Then he will kiss politics goodbye, throw up his Cabinet post, and go to work with the Yankees, back in the world of sport where he first became known.

That is a bitter, perhaps unrecognized, blow to the President and to the Democratic Party. Farley will be missed—terribly missed. He will be missed in the direction of the campaign, in the powerful influence upon the workers of whom he knew more than any other man in the country. And he will be missed when the votes are counted. Increasingly, Mr. Roosevelt will come to realize what his ambition for a third term has done to his party. Meanwhile Republicans will be sorry for Mr. Farley who has had just a new, not a square, deal, and glad for themselves who will profit vastly from Mr. Farley's retirement.

[From the Pontiac (Mich.) Press of July 24, 1940]

A PROPHET DECLINES TO TALK

"Come on, Jim, tell us what you think about it." Thus have the newspapermen been coaxing the resigning chairman of the Democratic National Committee to make a prediction. The smiling Postmaster General has a reputation as a political guesser par excellence. To be sure, he had the benefit of the ponderous machinery of the Federal Government in finding out what was going on and what cross sections were thinking and what politicians were concluding in every little hamlet in the land. It was a Gallup poll and then some, with the costs, at least in 1936, coming out of the taxpayers. But even so, "Sunny Jim" knew how to interpret what he heard. He made estimates that were startling in their uncanny character.

But not a word will the retiring man of the mails say as to what he thinks is going to happen. It is likely that in spite of the manner in which he was tossed into the discard by the ambitious politician who used his abilities and led him to believe he might have a chance at the Presidency, Farley will not talk until he is out and away from the Washington connections. When he has put the whole experience back of him and when he is again in New York and in the congenial atmosphere of a baseball diamond, he may spill more beans than one farmer can raise. If and when he does, he will be listened to with respect. He might guess correctly again. When the New Deal was getting under motion in 1933, Farley predicted that Mr. Roosevelt would go down in history as "either the greatest or the worst President in the Nation's history." As the third-term campaign starts, Jim is getting out from under, and it is not impossible that he already has a decided opinion about how the thing is going to end.

[From the Pontiac Daily Press of July 23, 1940]

BEST WISHES AND GOOD LUCK, JIM

There was one man who walked out of the Chicago convention with credit to himself and honor to his party. He had an ambition to run for the Presidency. During the first term there was no opposition in the White House to that aspiration. His loyalty to the Chief Executive arose superior to irritations and to legislation of regimentation with which he was in opposition. But when the time came to dump James Farley into the discard in order to further the ambitions for a third term, the President had no hesitancy.

Filled, as he must have been, with resentment and animosity, the Postmaster General let no hint of it reach the floor of the convention. He kept smiling and he made the sacrifice without complaint. And it was significant that the delegates, bossed and controlled as they were from the White House, cheered the national chairman with a vigor and a spontaneity that was not in evidence when others were given a hand.

Farley did a wonderful job for Franklin Roosevelt and in return he received what many other men have received at his hand when they were in the way of his ambitions. "Sunny Jim" kept his word scrupulously. When he has told the newspaper men something, they have believed it, as they found he was not given to dissembling nor to misleading statements. And truth to say newsmen grow terribly cynical, they are lied to so frequently and so blandly.

Farley is quitting his job with the respect of not only the Democrats, but of large numbers of members of the opposition party. Such patience as Farley has shown is rarely discovered along the political highways and byways. Jim played the game, but he backed a horse that disappointed him in the end, and went counter to the rules and to tradition. However, the Postmaster General is retiring with honors and that is better than all the successful elections that can be rolled up in any man's lifetime.

[From the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer-Press of July 20, 1940]

MR. FARLEY RETIRES

When James A. Farley retires from chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee August 17, the Democratic Party will lose the services of the political genius who steered it through two important victories and who did a good job during the past 4 years of trying to maintain harmony in a household battle where no rules were recognized.

A practical chairman of a national political committee cannot be too select in his political company if he wants to be successful. But, while the Democratic political organizations of Louisiana, Kansas City, Chicago, New Jersey, and some other points have been a stench in the nostrils of decency in recent years, no hint of this odor touched the Democratic National Chairman. He finished up remarkably clean, despite these unlovely associates.

As Postmaster General he is regarded as one of the most able administrators in the President's cabinet. This is not surprising for he is a successful businessman and is retiring as chairman to take over the rather important business enterprise of managing the affairs of the New York Yankees.

The President and the Postmaster General disagreed over the question of the third term. This was not the first time they disagreed, for Mr. Farley was never a member of the current brain trust. He was the practical politician who had to keep the organization in line even though purges were attempted and important local cogs were read out of the party.

Despite what some people regard as his shabby treatment by the President, Mr. Farley will remain a good Democrat and will give what time and assistance his new duties will permit. In leaving his post as chairman of the Democratic National Committee he carries the respect and admiration of most persons who realize what a tough job he has handled.

[From the Arizona Republic of July 27, 1940]

THE FORGOTTEN MAN, JAMES A. FARLEY

The whipping boy of the New Deal administration has taken another birching. It was a harder one than even he, though long experienced in this role, has been accustomed to taking without even a little squirming.

To say that "Big Jim" Farley took it like a man would be to do him an injustice.

Few men of whatever caliber in this Nation could or would have taken the whipping that he accepted smilingly in Chicago.

He could have avoided most of it by pulling out a week before the Democratic convention opened.

He had been forewarned a week ahead, by none other than the chief himself, what to expect.

In reportedly blunt words Franklin D. Roosevelt told the man whose political sagacity had steered him—the President—to safe and triumphant anchorage through two smashing campaigns, just how far his fresh-air taxi was going to carry him.

Jim Farley knew where he was going to get off—without doubt he knew it long before that historic conversation, as to the purport of which he allowed himself to be pledged to secrecy.

But the genial Postmaster General had other loyalties, too—for one, to the folk who had pledged themselves to him for the nomination which his chief all too apparently was destined to get.

He stuck by his guns on both fronts. It was Farley who insisted there must be at least one ballot—that no nominee of the Democratic Party should be acclaimed by totally unrecorded voice vote Managers of the third-term juggernaut sought to beat him down—no vote at all under the circumstances seemed fair enough to them—but "Big Jim" held stubbornly to his line.

Through it all he divulged no iota of what the President had said to him.

When his purpose had been achieved, the vote recorded, the die cast—the convention had resounding cheers for him, but few votes—he was the first to make the courtly gesture of nomination by acclamation.

Farley kept the record clear. Few delegates to the Chicago convention at any future date can say: "I didn't believe in this third-term business, but I never got a chance to vote against it."

Political friend and foe alike must admit:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of July 20, 1940]

JIM FARLEY'S CAPABLE AND LOYAL SERVICE

For ability, forbearance, steadfastness, patience and unswerving loyalty, the Democratic Party owes a distinguished political service award to James Aloysius Farley, who, having just been reelected chairman of the Democratic National Committee, has announced his retirement on August 17.

Although this means that Farley will not direct the major part of the Democratic campaign, which will not get under way in earnest until September, his staying on the job for another month—when it is conceivable he would like to quit right now and start his presumably new career as head of the New York Yankees baseball club—is an obvious but understandable gesture for party harmony.

Loyal and uncomplaining to the last, Farley has pledged his full support to a Democratic ticket with which, it may be suspected, he is not in complete sympathy.

It has been no secret that Farley opposed a third-term nomination. But certainly there is no reason for believing that, because his name figured in the Chicago balloting, his opposition to a third-term campaign was related to personal political hopes or ambitions he may at any time have harbored.

As a true Democrat and a loyal friend and admirer of the President, Jim Farley would not be guilty of political double-dealing. His candidacy at Chicago undoubtedly represented, as he plainly implies, a declaration of his views and convictions on the third-term nomination.

For months there had been signs that Farley was the victim of many rebuffs by administration leaders. But he went quietly and effectively about his task of strengthening and consolidating Democratic ranks.

At Chicago it was apparent that his party directorship was to a degree usurped, in part by those who had had little experience with the actual workings of political machinery. But Farley went straight ahead, without anger, without resentment, with total loyalty to the President, his hero.

On the day that the capable and genial Jim Farley leaves the office of national chairman the Democratic Party will lose one of the most invaluable assets it ever possessed.

[From the Pawtucket (R. I.) Times of July 16, 1940]

"BIG JIM"—THE BIGGEST

Politics is a filthy game. One of the wonders of the world is the survival of our democratic system while politicians undermine the foundations of liberty, sell out the freedom of the people to gangsters or selfish minorities so that the political cutpurses may increase their riches.

Of one thing we are certain—politicians do not exist for the benefit of the Nation as a whole. There are too many examples of men, past and contemporary, who owe financial independence to their scheming minds and lack of morals which empower them to make a mockery of the ballot box and rob the gullible citizens of their franchise.

We believe, on the face of things which are superficial—that there are few exceptions to the rule of dirty politics and dirtier politicians. The single exception is Jim Farley.

In his younger days Jim Farley may have packed caucuses, helped to throw ballots in the river, and saw to it that "objectionable persons" did not have their way over the politicians. But we don't know it as a fact, so Mr. Farley is entitled to the benefit of the doubt.

We can say one thing for Farley and say it without fear of contradiction, Farley is loyal. It was he who sent Roosevelt to the White House. But Mr. Roosevelt has not paid off that friendship outside of making Mr. Farley a Cabinet member, dictated by tradition, a job which has cost Farley a personal competence.

Yet Farley has "gone down the line" for the boss, swallowing with great distaste the janizaries who led Mr. Roosevelt into so many political mistakes.

Jim has survived many of the Roosevelt entourage who walked the plank at the bidding of political tyros and economic experimenters.

Only Mr. Roosevelt can say why Farley has survived, although practical considerations would indicate that Jim, with the friendship of so many political leaders at his back, could, if he so desired, cut the political legs from the New Deal.

Farley is one of the old political school which put party above self. Loyalty is a lost quality in the new politics. Suspicion has taken the place of loyalty.

No one can accuse Jim Farley of being disloyal and when he steps out of political life he will carry with him the respect of friend and foe. He has taken many severe blows from the man he made President, but he has never complained.

Jim Farley comes out as the biggest man in the New Deal.

"It is not given to every man," as Westbrook Pegler puts it, "to listen to the eulogies of his own wake," as James A. Farley did at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago last week.

That's just what it was—a political funeral. The eulogies were beautiful, including the one spoken in person from the platform by the First Lady, and the expression the President himself broadcast later from the White House, and most of these expressions, perhaps all of them, were heartfelt.

Jim Farley listened with a smile on his face, and courage, and we trust not too much resentment, in his heart. He had fought the good fight, had stood for principle in a cause which he knew well was lost, and now—within a few days—was to give up the controls of the Democratic Party organization.

There should be a place, a big place, in the Democratic picture for Jim Farley. He did great deeds for Franklin Delano Roosevelt. He all but made him in 1932. What was done for Farley? He was given the wheelhorse job of National Chairman, which he loved with every fiber of him, and with it a Cabinet post which paid him a salary insufficient to meet his bills, so that he is going out of office owing money. That's not so bad. He will recoup, whether it be in managing the Yankees and their baseball club chain, or in some other field, and he will be no longer under the restraint that caused him to forbid a contracting company, his sole business interest, to take advantage of the possibilities to make money on Government work—so that that concern, too, has operated in the red.

The sad thing about the situation is that he is obliged, for the sake of principle, to abandon the work for which he is best fitted—that of a great political leader.

Farley crossed the Rooseveltian ambition. So he is through, and he knows why he is through. But you'll hear no recriminations from him. He will stand pat, as a good general does, even when relieved of command.

But he'll make no predictions as to the result of this third-term election. No! That's the job of his successor.

Eight years ago Jim Farley came pretty close to the truth in predicting what would happen. Four years ago he hit the result squarely on the nose.

It would be highly interesting now to know his private prediction of the result on November 5, 1940.

He retires from the fight a greater man than when he went into it. He was by all odds the finest figure of the Convention. He will be heard from again.

[From the Daily Palo Alto (Calif.) Times of July 19, 1940]

JAMES A. FARLEY

James A. Farley has been defrauded of his rightful possibility of any practical chance of being nominated as his party's candidate for the Presidency. The robbery was achieved by machinations that reek of political cruelty, selfishness, and ingratitude. But Mr. Farley emerges from the party convention and heads toward the exit of political office with something more precious than political reward. He takes with him the high respect of citizens everywhere in all parties.

Throughout his years of party and governmental service he has hewed to the line of impeccable principle, and when unfairly treated by his partisan associates he has provided the perfect example of "turning the other cheek." The cruelty that has been visited upon him he has borne in silence and repaid with persistence in following his path of duty. He has met unselfishness with continued devotion, and has exchanged unswerving loyalty for the ingratitude that has been shown him.

Mr. Farley's character as revealed by his conduct in public life was summed up in that brief line in the convention nominating speech saying, "The name of James A. Farley is synonymous with straight shooting."

We do not agree with Mr. Farley in his political ideas, and if he had been nominated for the Presidency would still have supported the opposition candidate. But all parties would be better off if they had more men in them of Mr. Farley's character.

WHO'LL FOLLOW FARLEY?

We cannot allow James Farley to pass out of the political picture without acknowledging his great services to the Democratic Party.

Genial and likable, with an organizing ability above the extraordinary, he guided the party expertly through two major campaigns and handled his duties so expertly that he was able to say positively beforehand that only Maine and Vermont would go to Landon.

On his retirement he again says the people want the Democrats to continue in office, and there is no doubt he has accurately represented the present sentiment.

It is regretted he will not remain to give the wise administration to make his words continue true to the end of the campaign.

But there are other able men; leaders who are astute in handling political affairs, who can take up the burden where he lays it down, and the important thing is to make a wise choice among them.

Of these, Senator BYRNES stands out as the most promising, because of his success in leadership in Washington, and his ability also to appeal to popular regard.

But he dislikes to give up his promising Senatorial career, a sentiment that does him credit, for the Senate also needs able men.

DOWN GOES FARLEY

The long-expected has happened. Jim Farley has resigned as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and his resignation as Postmaster General is expected within a matter of days.

About 9 years ago Jim Farley went out on the road to sell the Democrats of America a bill of goods. He went into virtually every State, every important county, to talk to his friends, the Democratic leaders. He pleaded long and eloquently. He wrote letters by the thousands. He pulled strings as only a political genius knows how to pull them.

When time for the Chicago convention of 1932 rolled around, Jim Farley had done his job. He had sold Franklin D. Roosevelt to his party and, as it later developed, to the Nation.

Farley later said that Mr. Roosevelt had never thanked him for his services in 1931-32, or in 1936.

But it would be wrong to assume that the President was not grateful. He allowed Farley to stay in his Cabinet long after most of the other old Democrats had fallen from grace. Homer Cummings, Arthur Mullen, Bruce Kramer, Al Smith, Harry Woodring—they and dozens of others walked the Last Mile ahead of "Big Jim."

One of the Roosevelt-before-Chicago Democrats remains in Washington—aging Cordell Hull. We wonder what he is thinking about.

[From the Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Advance News of July 21, 1940]

JIM FARLEY RETIRES

The retirement of James A. Farley from active participation in national politics will be regretted by millions of Democrats, and countless others who came to admire his attractive personal qualities. His leadership has been a tower of strength to the administration since the first Roosevelt campaign in 1932, and he received a well-deserved tribue in the roll call on Presidential nominations at Chicago last Wednesday night. It is said Farley is leaving his post because he disapproves a third-term candidacy but we prefer to believe that after 7 years of public life he finds it necessary to recoup his private fortunes.

Unless a man possesses independent means he must sooner or later leave the Government service.

Jim Farley has made a name for himself as national chairman and Postmaster General, which will endure through the years. We hope to see him emerge from his retirement in 1942 and in the meantime he can be counted upon to give his full support to the Democratic cause in State and Nation.

DROPPING THE PILOT

Many years ago at the time when a then young and headstrong man was solidifying his personal position as ruler of an empire, a rather famous cartoon was published called "Dropping the Pilot." It showed Emperor William II of Germany standing on the bridge of the ship of state with the form of Bismarck on his way out.

The friends here of National Chairman James A. Farley, and they are legion, have the very strong impression that the man who directed the successful campaigns of 1932 and 1936 is being sidetracked. He will keep his job only until August 17. He and Bismarck both found themselves in the position of being dropped by headstrong rulers after having served faithfully and well.

The natural resentment to Presidential humiliation of the man whom many consider most responsible for the initial Roosevelt success may help explain the lack of real enthusiasm among the delegates. Like good soldiers, they did their job but their hearts were not in it.

Delegates to this convention felt some of the futility that must exist among members of the Reichstag in the Germany of Adolf Hitler. The form of the democratic process remained, but the substance was that of ratifying the Executive will in an obedient and unquestioning manner.

In this new order, with Hopkins, Ickes, et al. having the Presidential ear, there hardly seems a place any more for Farley, Garner, Glass, Byrd, Clark, and the host of others who were old-fashioned enough to believe that they belonged to a political party and not a revolutionary movement.

Many old-line Democrats began to question the new order of things when the attempt was made by the President to subordinate the Supreme Court to the Executive will. Later came the attempted "purge" of members of the President's own party who had the courage to disagree with him. Now we witness that which many Democrats hoped against hope would not be: A President of the United States of America seeking a third Presidential term. Already Tammany delegates from New York have endorsed a fourth term.

A great political party has advertised to the Nation that out of 130,000,000 people only one man is qualified to hold the office of President. Four years ago Roosevelt said that the American people were approaching a "rendezvous with destiny." Now the rendezvous may turn out to be a blind date where the Democracy of Jefferson met its Waterloo.

TRIBUTE TOO LATE

It is heartening to see the multitude of praise both by newspapers and individuals throughout the country which is heaped upon Jim Farley as he prepares to step out of the national picture. The paeans follow the formidable demonstration of esteem given Farley at the Democratic National Convention, but to many it will seem that the tribute came too late.

As one correspondent put it, the convention delegates gave Farley everything but their votes. It appears that the Democratic Party came to realize Jim's full worth when it suddenly struck them that he was about to leave their midst.

Probably a good bit of the emotional sentiment on behalf of Jim was aroused by a feeling of remorse, just as folks returning from a funeral wonder if they couldn't have treated the deceased in better fashion before he had departed. "He was a swell guy, and the things he did were fine," they are wont to say, the while recalling that they couldn't remember complimenting him while he still was alive. A well-known columnist, following this parallel, aptly recorded the demise of Farley as national chairman by writing that "It is not given to every man to listen to the eulogies of his own wake * * *."

So it was, that although his colleagues boarded the bandwagon in rendering gushing praise of his leadership, the kind words were emitted after Farley's current career had been precluded by the delegates' determination to renominate Mr. Roosevelt, a move entirely counter to Farley convictions.

There was a realization among the delegates, too, that finding another chairman with the sagacity and truthfulness of Jim would not be easy.

But despite the fact that he got little support as an actual candidate for the Presidential nomination, and finis has been written to his role as national chairman, Jim must feel content inside himself that he did a good job well. He had the courage of his convictions, and saw the day when he knew that, no matter how shabbily he may have been treated otherwise, his efforts and capabilities were highly appreciated.

With what has come to pass there still is no basis for believing Farley is through with politics. Legion are those who fully expect even greater efforts by Jim on behalf of his country when future opportunity offers itself.

CREDIT TO COUNTY

The Democratic convention is past and gone. Of it there remain two things that are stand-outs—the third-term aspirations of President Roosevelt and the withdrawal of James A. Farley from the picture—and of these two the latter event far transcends the former in importance to Rockland County. Franklin D. Roosevelt may be the President but he's not a Rockland County boy who made good. Jim Farley started in Grassy Point and his career has thus far carried him into nomination for the Presidency, a place in the Cabinet, and the national chairmanship of the Democratic Party.

It is seldom that so much honor falls to the lot of one man, but he carries the burden lightly and the hat he wore when he was Stony Point's town clerk still fits him. He is still a man of the people to whom the friendship of men and women in Rockland County means much. That he is the country's leading politician now just as he was 8 years ago when he elected Roosevelt is admitted without question.

Back in 1932 a chance remark was dropped in an unguarded moment to the effect that "6 people out of 10 in Rockland County had never heard of Jim Farley." The remark brought retort as rapid as emphatic and was about as sensible as a statement today that "6 people out of 10 in the United States have never heard of Jim Farley."

But Rockland County was doubly honored at the Democratic convention in that not one but two native sons served with distinction. Seldom can any small county political organization boast that a former chairman has seconded the nomination of another former chairman for the Presidency of the United States. Yet that is the honor which came to Rockland County.

Farley and Fisher are the county's two best advertisements, and neither is reluctant to own his native heath. They are both proud of Rockland County, as the county may well be proud of them.

Both men started at the bottom and worked up through the ranks, Farley in Stony Point and Fisher in Clarkstown. Both served as committeemen, reaching out to contact the average voter, and both men served their party as county chairman with distinction. They made their enemies during their rise, as must every man who aspires to public office, but their friends far outnumber their enemies.

The 1940 convention will be remembered by Rockland County as its own, so prominent has Farley become. Senator CARTER GLASS may have had the honor of nominating Farley, but it is a purely Rockland County assertion that "Pat" did just as good a job in his brief speech as did the distinguished Virginia Senator.

[From the Norfolk (Va.) Virginian-Pilot of July 20, 1940]

"SUNNY JIM" SAYS GOOD-BYE

Those who were aware of what was going on behind the scenes at Chicago knew that the strenuously warm compliments paid Chairman Farley in the speeches of both the President and his wife were something more than sincere tributes to a personal friend and to the architect in chief of the political House of Roosevelt. They were also, as every informed person knew, salutes to a political manager who was quitting his job in circumstances less than happy—salutes designed to preserve a face of outward felicity on a political partnership which, inwardly, was in an advanced state of collapse.

The parting of Frankie and Jimmie received its final papers yesterday. It was all managed decorously. The National Committee unanimously reelected Farley as chairman, but to serve only to August 17—a stipulation laid down at his request. After that he will accept an "attractive" business offer, the management of the New York Yankees, as has already been reported, and his interest in President Roosevelt's fortunes will be limited to that of a loyal Democrat giving his "full support" to the party's ticket.

Thus ends a political partnership even more famous and effective in its day than the earlier political partnership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Alfred E. Smith. The President will find no successor possessed of Jim Farley's ability, for managerial geniuses of his type occur only once in a blue moon. All the President's blandishments failed to induce Farley to put aside his dislike of a third term—a distaste which he registered as publicly as possible when he insisted upon having his name put before the convention as a candidate for the Presidency, and when he picked as his nominator Senator GLASS who, with Farley's full approval, made the nominating speech a vehicle for a pointed defense of the two-term tradition.

President Roosevelt's campaign will suffer for the absence of Farley from the post of field command. But it would have suffered almost as much had Farley consented to lend his presence to the leadership of the 1940 campaign but not his heart or his conscience. Which is another way of saying that, given the situation created by the "draft," the break-up of the remarkable Roosevelt-Farley team was inevitable.

[From the New York Times of July 20, 1940]

A FINE PUBLIC SERVANT

At the Chicago convention James A. Farley commanded the sympathies of the public and enhanced a reputation already high and secure. In the last few years we have all come to know, and most of us to like, him. The strong wrestler with iron fortune, the patient, shrewd, subtle, but always honorable, political manager, the winner of uncounted friends, the capable administrator, we all know. We know the scrupulous keeper of his word, in whom even the reporters, a suspicious tribe, have perfect confidence.

Having had a hand in President making and shown his talent for public affairs, he used the privilege and right of every citizen to become a candidate for the nomination for President. His long loyalty to Mr. Roosevelt is proof enough that his ambition was not at first discouraged in that quarter. In regard to the third term, Mr. Farley, no matter how much of a new dealer in other respects, is a traditionalist. As the "draft" movement went on he was urged to take himself out of the running and permit the renaming of the President by acclamation.

With certain other candidates he stuck to the ritual and insisted on independent nominations. Motions on behalf of the defeated candidates to make the nomination unanimous were also a part of the ritual. Mr. Farley was received with "tremendous" cheering. Who deserved it more? Both his past services and his present sacrifices must have been in every mind. It was a great occasion for Mr. Farley. It was a glory to be nominated by CARTER GLASS, no easy praiser. What strikes the distant hearer or reader is Mr. Farley's generosity of feeling, the magnanimity that rises above complaint and resentment. "A wise and constant man," said Bacon, "will never grieve so long as he plays, as one may say, his own part truly." Mr. Farley has so played his. His behavior at Chicago has strengthened his hold upon the general esteem.

FARLEY PARTY'S TRAGIC MASTER—NEW DEALERS NOW APPEAL TO CHIEF THEY SNUBBED—IN PANIC AT WILLKIE THREAT—REALIZE THAT BEST MAN IS NEEDED FOR ORGANIZATION IN CRISIS

(By Glen Perry)

CHICAGO, July 17.—By far the best-loved man in this town today is Postmaster General James A. Farley, who from all indications is about to give up the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee and devote himself to building up financial security for his family as president of the New York Yankees. The gap he will leave in the world of politics can be filled by no one else in the Democratic Party.

Were genial Jim a different sort of man, he would be extracting great satisfaction from what is happening here this week, for if ever the stage was set for a personal triumph, it is now, as the inept new dealers who shouldered him to the side lines employ every artifice their minds can suggest to bring him back to the center of the stage. It is strange, in a way, that the creation of this situation is directly traceable to Wendell L. Willkie, the Republican candidate. Yet it is a fact.

Jim Farley emerged in the political big league in 1932, when he won the Presidential nomination for Franklin D. Roosevelt through extraordinarily capable management, and went on to direct the landslide victory over President Hoover. As Postmaster General he went to Washington with as many friends as any politician ever had in the country's history. Even the Republicans whom he had beaten liked him, for he played square, and his genial Irish nature made it impossible for anyone to feel anything but friendship and affection for him.

HAS PHENOMENAL MEMORY

With newspaper men he stood very high. Tales of his phenomenal memory for names, of the faith with which one could bank on what he said, of the unaffected simplicity with which he met all comers, made him a beloved and unusual figure in politics. Even the bitterest foes of the New Deal had no animosity for this particular member of it.

In 1936 he took command again and saw Mr. Roosevelt renominated and reelected by landslide majorities. But even then the young men in the New Deal viewed him as someone who had to be tolerated because of his ability to do the election job and as someone to be ignored on matters of policy affecting the New Deal. From that time on he was pushed into the background. His visits to the White House became fewer. Patronage which one might have expected to be handled by him was taken out of his hands and run by a little group who were interested in building up "our side," by which they did not mean the Democratic Party, but the New Deal.

The attempt to pack the Supreme Court would never have been undertaken had Mr. Farley had anything to say about it. He had nothing to say and the ill-starred fight was made. The attempted purge of Democratic Senators who dared oppose the President in that fight would never have been made had Farley's ideas been followed. They were not. Mistake after mistake was made, change after change was effected in the American system, and Jim Farley and those who felt as he did were alternately ignored and derided by the high-riding new dealers.

CONCEALED HIS WOUNDS

Reports were that he was going to get out of national politics to head an automobile company. But a renewal of the business recession put the company out of business before he could make any effort to save it.

He stayed on in Washington, keeping his own counsel, hiding the hurt he felt at the way he had been treated by the men he had put in power.

Then the campaign of 1940 loomed on the horizon and it appeared that Jim Farley had no place in the plans of the new dealers. They figured they could do all right without him. They had to figure that way because Jim had no use for the third term, and said so. He was himself a candidate for the Presidency, and that alone was enough to make him the target for the same sniping with which they had knocked off every potential Democratic candidate.

The bright young men looked the situation over, and figured they could defeat any one the Republicans could possibly name without Farley's help. He was too conservative for them, and he believed in the American political system the way it had always been run. They didn't.

BEST MEN NEEDED

Last month things began to happen. The Republicans nominated Willkie, the one thing upon which the new dealers had not figured. Here was a rough-and-tumble champion who had already licked two of their own brightest stars in controversy. Attorney General Jackson and Secretary of the Interior Ickes. Here was a man who could and would trade wallops with the President and ask no odds. And, above all, here was a man who could not be defeated by the second string. The best was none too good, and might be not good enough.

As the time for the Democratic convention neared, the new dealers bethought themselves of Mr. Farley. They suddenly realized that, after all their scoffing and veiled attacks, they needed him badly. There was an instant change of front, where he had been ignored, he was courted. Pressure of every sort was brought to bear to dissuade him from resigning his chairmanship, to make him direct the campaign. They, who had marooned him in the handsome marble post office building in Washington, begged him to lead them once more. They came to him with their hats in their hands.

RAW DEAL BY NEW DEAL

Nobody but Mr. Farley knows what his final answer will be, although the indications in his press conferences have been that he is through. If he yields to their importunities, he will disappoint a lot of people who think he has had a raw deal, and he will please a group who will relegate him to his exile again once he has won the election for them—if even his skill can do that job.

It is a position that would be pleasing to one who holds a grievance, to one whose loyalty to his party is not binding. But Jim doesn't hold grievances, and his loyalty is beyond all question. The situation is painful for him, and the choice has been hard for him to make. Announcement of that choice will come Saturday, after the meeting of the Democratic National Committee that follows adjournment of the convention.

If he does what his friends believe he will do, it will not be a case of Achilles sulking in his tent. It will be a man who has weighed his loyalties in bitter inner struggle, making good on his statement that he is an American before he is a Democrat. To those who know him and his feeling for the system under which American politics have operated, it is difficult, almost impossible, to visualize him as making any other choice.

FARLEY LOYAL TO THE LAST

Eight years ago James A. Farley was the conquering hero at the Democratic National Convention. He had found his man, named him, and put him across. Four years ago at the Democratic National Convention he was the successful manager. Everybody looked to him for orders and carried them out eagerly. He was not so much conqueror as boss. Today at the Democratic National Convention he will be messenger boy—unless, that is, the master magician has a white rabbit of which even faithful Jim has not been told. This time Mr. Farley will neither plot nor direct. He will merely notify—and the decision, be it clearly noted, will not be his but that of his former friend whom he had made President.

Conqueror, manager, messenger—it sounds like the reverse of the home-town boy who made good. But in fairness to Mr. Farley it must be pointed out that the very fact that he is willing to go through with it without a murmur of complaint is a tribute to his loyalty. Everyone knows that he does not favor the third term. But Mr. Farley is still chairman of his party and Mr. Roosevelt the choice of the majority of the delegates. As chairman, Mr. Farley can and should keep himself above factions. He helped make Mr. Roosevelt. He cannot now unmake him. That's not in the code. All that he can do is, when his message has been delivered and the convention has ratified the party leader's orders, to throw himself vigorously into baseball or some other nonpolitical activity. Can he be blamed if, in seeking a new occupation, he makes as a condition the proviso that he does not have to deal with anyone who fancies himself as a quarterback, captain, manager, coach of the team, and umpire, all rolled into one?

If and when Mr. Farley steps out of political life he will carry with him the respect of opponents as well as friends and the good wishes of those who believe that unbreakable loyalty together with a capacity for taking it on the chin time after time without a squawk are qualities as admirable as they are rare. Mr. Farley comes out of this political partnership a bigger man, even though he may be a sadder and a disillusioned one.

[From the New Orleans Item of July 19, 1940]

FARLEY TRIUMPHED TOO

Aside from its remarkable upsurge for the renomination of President Roosevelt, one of the most notable things about the Chicago convention was the whole-hearted fashion in which it testified its admiration, confidence, and affection for Chairman Farley.

He stood against the third term on principle. The convention nominated Mr. Roosevelt for a third term with a riotous demonstration. It gave Mr. Roosevelt 947 votes and Mr. Farley only 73. Yet the personal acclaim that the speakers and the whole assembly bestowed on the bald, pink, party chairman, compared most favorably with that received by its President and nominee.

They refused him their votes but they gave him their hearts. It was an odd and unsual phenomenon. The aged Carter Glass received scant respect when he spoke for Farley's candidacy against a third term, but roused gusts of enthusiasm when he spoke for Farley as a man. A resolution against the third term was howled down by overwhelming roars and boos. But Farley himself received the most distinguished consideration from everybody.

It takes exceptional character, fellowship, talent, and ability to win that sort of standing in a national assembly of cagey, cynical, and skeptical politicians. If we know the temperament of the Farley type of Irishman, "Jim" came out of the convention highly pleased with himself, even though he had left his little 6 percent of its votes behind for another man.

He deserves to feel that way. For, while some of good will bestowed on him by his fellow Democrats was doubtless inspired by their desire to keep his skill and energy "in line" for their ticket, a great, great deal of it expressed a genuine regard that they have come to feel for him.

[From the New London (Conn.) Evening Day of July 21, 1940]

The comment of a number of New York delegates to the Chicago convention of the Democratic Party, to the effect that the "New Deal has become a raw deal" for James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee and Postmaster General, about agrees with the estimate of many a political observer in the matter. The belief grows that Farley, early in the present term of the President, was practically assured that Mr. Roosevelt would not run again, and encouraged by the Chief Executive to be a candidate himself. That, at least, is the story that some New York Democrats have heard, and it is supposed to come indirectly from Farley himself. Then, however, Farley was left out on the end of a limb, going ahead on the theory that it was all right to seek the nomination himself while head of the national committee, yet growing increasingly aware of the President's odd silence about his plans. In the end Farley, of course, was left in the position of appearing to be pushing his own candidacy against that of the President—"disloyal," in other words, to "the chief."

The loss of Farley in the campaign, it is believed, will mean far more in the outcome of the election than any other factor bearing upon its operation. This doesn't mean, of course, that one or the other of the major party candidates could not do or say something of more significance than the Farley resignation, expected tomorrow. It does mean that, of all the routine factors in the operation of a campaign, the presence of Farley's organizing ability on the New Deal side is by far the most outstandingly important.

From the standpoint of fair play to Farley, the fact seems to be that he has, in many respects, received about the worst possible deal under the banner of the New Deal in other respects, also. Whenever he has had an opportunity to go out into the business world and recoup his fortunes—Farley is a long ways from a rich man—there has always been some appeal made to him to stand by the party. He has stood by, at great personal sacrifice, his friends say. In return the party, through the President, has treated him about as shabbily as it possibly could. The President long ago turned to the Corcorans, Cohens, Harry Hopkins, etc., for political counsel. Farley was crowded further and further off the scene. Yet, he was expected to continue to line up the party for the New Deal, no matter how coldly treated, and apparently never lifted his finger to knife the President, as he might have done.

[From the Newark Evening News of July 20, 1940]

GONE BUT NOT FORGOTTEN

Distracted as we have been by the noise of breaking traditions at Chicago, we confess he has escaped our attention up to now. We mean democracy's forgotten man. No, not Jim Farley. As all are aware, Jim didn't get the convention's votes. But he did get a lot of cheers. Mr. Roosevelt pulled all the stops for Good Old Pal Jim—on a coast-to-coast hook-up. Thus fortified, Jim is about the business of taking over the New York Yankees, who, to inject an alien note, have been taken over by most of the American League this season.

As we say, we didn't refer to Jim. We had in mind that vanishing American, that forgotten man of Pennsylvania Avenue and the Panhandle, "Cactus JACK" GARNER. The gentleman from Texas, who once uttered wise words about letting the cattle put on fat, has yielded to the gentleman from Iowa. He will now find more time for Texas trout. Certainly the happy hunting grounds about Uvalde will see more of him. In any event, if Mr. GARNER is not the forgotten man, he will do until the November election makes a new "ex" for us.

[From the Nashville Tennesseean of July 19, 1940]

GOOD LUCK, JIM

Democrats of the Nation should always be glad that James A. Farley's name was presented to the national convention as a candidate for the Presidency, and that the man who has done so much for the party received a flattering vote despite the fact that the honor was destined to go to another.

Jim Farley is entitled to carry away that memory as he yields the national chairmanship to retire to private life. He knows, we trust, that the vote was no true yardstick of the esteem in which he is held, and that the party will not forget his magnificent service.

From the beginning of the convention, it now appears, the Postmaster General had resigned himself to severing the official ties between himself and the membership. His opening address was in itself a valedictory.

Throughout the sessions he was beset with uncertainty, but never did he lose his smile nor speak a word that might have caused party disunity.

Because he had promised those pledged to him that his name would go before the convention, he saw that it was done—by such an old war horse as Senator CARTER GLASS. But when his highest hopes were extinguished, he welcomed the chance to call for suspension of the rules so that the convention's choice might be made unanimous. And it was on that occasion that he must have been overwhelmed by the gathering's spontaneous tribute to unfailing courage and sportsmanship.

As he leaves politics for more fruitful fields, Jim Farley can look back upon a record that is unsullied by any unworthy act. Above all else, he has been loyal to causes and individuals. He has kept the faith and honored his convictions. No man in the land can claim more personal friends among people of all classes and creeds.

Jim Farley has come far since his early days in a small New York town. His place in history has been written as one who was instrumental in making a President and launching an administration that has done much for the country. He has been the organizing genius of his party and he has served with ability in the national Cabinet.

Although his surrender of party leadership will be regretted, there can be no misunderstanding of the natural desire to turn his talents to other fields at this time. Nashville and Middle Tennessee, which he has frequently visited, join with other cities and communities the land over in expressing the confident hope that the success which has been his in the past will further reward him in the future.

To the man whose heart harbors no rancor and whose code permits no disloyalty to his party under any circumstances, democracy cannot adequately express its thanks and gratitude.

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner of July 20, 1940]

CHAIRMAN FARLEY

Genial Jim Farley, as had been anticipated for some time, has announced his retirement from the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee, to become effective August 17. The brief delay was, doubtless, designed to relieve his action of the appearance of precipitancy, and to enable him, as evidence of his continued loyalty to the party that he has served with conspicuous ability, to assist his successor in setting up the machinery for the campaign.

The reason which Mr. Farley gives as leading him to the conclusion of his official position—that he desires to pay attention to long-neglected personal affairs, and to accept a highly lucrative financial offer—is doubtless valid; but, had not political differences of a positive character arisen between him and the President, and especially as to a third term, it is more than probable that he would have continued to serve him and his party in the responsible post which for so many years he had occupied.

The retirement, in its broad and essential aspect, represents what will be naturally regarded as being the parting of the ways between two men who had traveled side by side in intimate fellowship, though Mr. Farley is careful to emphatically assert that he will support the Democratic national ticket, hopes for its success, and predicts it.

The campaign will be scarcely begun when Mr. Farley retires. As it is not probable that the formal speeches of acceptance by the Presidential nominees will have been made before August 17; and, as has been indicated from the White House, Mr. Roosevelt will not make his formal acceptance until after that of Mr. Willkie, it may be that these addresses, which are accepted as marking the formal opening of a campaign, may not be before the country before Mr. Farley retires.

Two names, and only two, are prominently connected with the succession. One is that of Frank Walker of New York, wealthy manufacturer, who for a brief season was officially connected with the New Deal; the other is that of JAMES F. BYRNES. The South Carolina Senator was the real, if not titular, manager of President Roosevelt's interests at the recent Chicago convention, though Secretary Hopkins was on the scene a week before the convention met to see that the third-term machinery worked smoothly.

Mr. BYRNES has repeatedly done effective work in the Senate when proposals close to the White House were encountering obstacles. He is popular with his associates, adroit, and a man of real ability. He is said to much prefer giving his entire time to senatorial matters to responsible engagement in the management of a national campaign.

The prevailing opinion is that Mr. Walker will be named by the President to the special group from the national committee that has been designated to ascertain his preference.

Perhaps public opinion would accord the position of primacy among national chairmen of both parties in the last half century to Mr. Farley on the Democratic side and Mark Hanna on the Republican. Hanna is remembered as having been the Warwick of McKinley's fortunes, just as, in a substantial sense, Mr. Farley was to Mr. Roosevelt. Though Mr. Hanna did effective work to secure the nomination for McKinley, his service was by no means comparable to that which Mr. Farley rendered for Mr. Roosevelt.

Looking back at the situation throughout the country preceding the national convention of 1932, and in the convention itself, grave doubt arises, in fact, as to whether Mr. Roosevelt could have been nominated 8 years ago had it not been for the untiring, skillful, and huge amount of work done in his behalf by the man who is now to sever his connection with the national committee. It was recognized at the time that the vote-corralling cross-country tour made by Mr. Farley months before the convention, when he launched an organized Roosevelt movement, gave to it both strength and impetus; and his direction of the contest for the nomination in the convention was undoubtedly strongly contributory to the nomination.

Hanna's conspicuous service to McKinley was rather in managing and financing the campaign against Bryan than in obtaining the nomination for his choice. McKinley was the foremost representative of the doctrine of protection, then at its zenith. The tariff measure bore his name, but it was the millions that Hanna, exerting all possible pressure and means of approach, obtained from the protection interests of the country that enabled him to defeat the Commoner.

Hanna's war chest has been variously estimated at from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000, while Bryan had less than $1,000,000. Even at that, the change of a few hundred thousand votes, if made in a comparatively small group of States, would have made Bryan President.

Though Mr. Farley's direction of both the campaigns of 1932 and 1936 was notably skillful, it was not, as the results showed, as vital a factor in the November decisions as were Hanna's tactics and methods in McKinley's campaign.

JIM FARLEY

The people in the great convention hall at Chicago gave Jim Farley thunderous applause upon all appropriate occasions. He didn't have a chance to obtain many votes for President, in the circumstances, but if Mr. Roosevelt had been out of the way and there had been a free-for-all, "Old Jim" would have made a great race. As it was, many of his delegates stuck doggedly to him to the end and did not switch until he personally released them and asked that Mr. Roosevelt be nominated by acclamation. This final speech by Farley showed his spirit of generosity and sportsmanship at its best. The convention recognized this and gave him a great hand.

[From the Montgomery Advertiser of July 13, 1940]

JIM FARLEY

American politics has not before produced a personality quite like James A. Farley, Postmaster General and chairman of the Democratic National Committee, who at the moment is by way of taking leave of politics to enter upon a profitable private business career.

Mr. Farley suffers from the cumulative hurts of political experience. Men do not remain long in office before the scars begin to form. There is no other bitterness, except defeat of the heart in a great love, which runs so deep as political disappointment. Few men are temperamentally prepared to absorb these hurts in good grace, except outwardly. Mr. Farley's temperament is buoyant, he is a sport and a take-it-or-leave-it man of affairs. He knows the political facts of this life. Nevertheless he has been hurt, perhaps unavoidably. He once wanted to be the Presidential nominee, failing that he wanted to be the Vice Presidential nominee, he was opposed to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt, he wanted to get into the ring and slug it out with other candidates below the rank of F. D. R.

But inexorable circumstances made this dream futile if not fantastic. Public opinion in the Democratic Party, conditioned as it is by the first world revolution ever known, left Farley and his dream stranded. A year ago he was aggrieved at his chief, feeling that he had been let down out of a cold spirit of ingratitude. Now he must realize that events beyond the control of any American leader or group of leaders are picking the American team. Mr. Farley is no match for the first world revolution.

The newspaper writers at the convention gave Jim Farley a dinner, a watch, a baseball, a catcher's mitt, and assurances of their personal affection—a great tribute to him by a hard-boiled, cynical lot. His reply to the tribute is a lesson to other biggies who have frequent contacts with representatives of the press. For 8 turbulent years Jim has been a member of the President's Cabinet. He was at the same time chairman of the Democratic National Committee

Newspapermen encountered him daily. They questioned him frankly, he answered them frankly. He withheld nothing from them that he was privileged to release. He talked expansively to them, saying at the end of the interview, "Boys, don't let me down." He knew that he could trust them to write discreetly of what he said in his honest Irish candor. He wasn't afraid of them, they weren't afraid of him—nearly all of them were on his side and wanted to help him just because he was "Old Jim." He never heckled the press, he never reneged on an interview, he never quarreled with the reporters. And so after the pleasant incident in Chicago when the newspaper writers honored "Old Jim" he said: "You boys never let me down." Mr. Farley is beyond all question better loved by newspaper writers than any other man (or woman) who has sat in a Presidential Cabinet within the life of his generation.

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal of July 18, 1940]

THE TRIBUTE TO FARLEY

Though he live for many years, and we hope that he will, we doubt that Jim Farley will ever know a prouder moment than when he and the Democratic Convention of 1940 and listening millions of his fellow Americans heard Senator GLASS, of Virginia, proclaim him:

"A man on whose word every human being can rely."

No man needs a finer tribute. No man living could buy or wring or shoot from CARTER GLASS a tribute he did not mean.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Register of July 23, 1940]

FARLEY'S RETIREMENT SHOULD BE DAY OF SADNESS FOR DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The National Democratic Convention produced a number of popular heroes, but lord of them all was the genial gentleman responsible for the party's successes in 1932 and 1936, National Chairman James A. Farley.

He dared actively at Chicago to oppose a third term for President Roosevelt as an expression of his personal conviction against establishment of the precedent; and, as was entirely expected, he received only a few votes as a Presidential candidate. Nevertheless, after the final convention note had died away, Postmaster Farley probably stood more popular and influential than at any time during his political career. He found strength in defeat, vastly increasing his popularity through courageous opposition to the President's renomination and because of the sportsmanlike manner in which he accepted his political fate and disappointment over Mr. Roosevelt's historic decision.

When Chairman Farley steps down this week, as is expected, as active head of the Democratic Party, it should be a day of mourning for the party that is being led further and further away from the political ideals and personal integrity championed by Mr. Farley. His valuable guidance was obviously missing from the recent convention and his loss will be more keenly felt during the campaign ahead.

Jim Farley was no cheap politician, and his word was respected by all. There is a pressing need today for party affairs to be conducted on the same high plane. If Mr. Roosevelt and the national Democratic executive committee name a political boss of Mayor Kelly's type as Mr. Farley's successor, they will materially weaken the party and create another handicap for the President to carry to the polls in November. Nomination of Mayor Kelly as chairman of the national Democratic executive committee would be a heavier millstone about the neck of the Democratic Party than selection of Secretary Wallace as its Vice Presidential candidate.

In choosing a successor to Mr. Farley, President Roosevelt has the timeliest of opportunities to decide whether "bossism" will or will not be allowed to control the Democratic Party. America eagerly awaits his decision.

[From the Minneapolis Tribune of July 20, 1940]

FARLEY RETIRES

The third term campaign will miss the firm, deft, directing hand of James A. Farley. His retirement as national chairman on August 17 means that the campaign strategy and executive management will be taken over by others. No one can blame him for retiring from politics to take an alluring business offer, and no associate of his can begrudge him success in the future of his chosen field.

It is no exaggeration to say that Jim Farley made Franklin Roosevelt President the first time. It was Farley who toured the States a year ahead, selling his candidate and preparing the delegations that were to meet in Chicago in 1932. Ever since that time he has carried the load of party management in addition to the labors of the Postmaster General. Though, out of sympathy with what Hugh Johnson calls the "fourth New Deal," Farley never disowned his chief, and he never became a candidate for President until he had tried in vain to learn Mr. Roosevelt's intentions.

When Farley told the correspondents that his name would go before the convention, he made them a promise to that effect. As Senator GLASS said in his nominating speech, Farley is a man "on whose word every human being can rely." He did not break the promise. He received 72$^{27}/_{90}$ votes on the roll call, but there was nothing small or fractional about the esteem in which he was held by his fellow Democrats. He was by all odds the most popular man, had the most real friends, of anyone in that Chicago stadium. As he prepares to leave political life, Mr. Farley has nothing for which to reproach himself, unless it is that he carried his loyalty too far.

Addison's Cato said: "'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it." That might well serve as Farley's political farewell.

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Times-Tribune of July 22, 1940]

EXIT FARLEY

The passing from the political scene of James A. Farley will be regretted not only by members of his own party, but by Republicans as well, for in this genial gentleman are those human qualities which are so generally loved, and so frequently taken advantage of—loyalty, fidelity, honesty and kindliness. That he suffered the fate of so many king and president makers from Wolsey to Colonel House, adds more than a touch of feeling to his departure, in which there is an appreciable measure of resentment, not greatly lessened by the last-minute avowals of affection from the White House.

It has been demonstrated innumerable times that loyalty is a virtue that is its own reward, and the case of Farley can hardly add to the proof that gratitude diminishes in proportion to the quality and quantity of service rendered.

Whether President Roosevelt would have attained the governorship of New York and the Presidency of the United States without the talents and devotion of Farley, is a debatable question, but there can be no question that Farley's assistance was of the greatest value, once frankly recognized and proclaimed but eventually depreciated to the vanishing point with the ascendancy of Hopkins, Ickes, and the other starry-eyed adulatory members of the palace guard.

That the rank and file of the Democratic Party has affection and respect for Mr. Farley was manifest by the thunderous applause that followed Senator GLASS' nominating speech on the night that the President was drafted. They knew what he had done over the years for the party and they were aware of his recompense. They evinced their disapproval of his cavalier treatment by the only method available, to show him that the party appreciated his services.

The reaction from the White House to this demonstration was prompt. Overnight there was a galvanic resumption of the "old pal" attitude. The demonstrations against Wallace no doubt suggested that there might be a serious need for the tranquilizing technique of the master politician, whose self-effacing industry has kept the Democratic machine running with a minimum of friction.

It is by no means a certainty that the party cannot attain success in November without the actual assistance of Farley. He has done his work so well that the organization may function without his direction. He will not "take a walk." He is too big a man for that. He will not sulk or give expression to the disappointment which he must, being human, feel. Loyalty is ingrained in him, and no matter what comes he will still be a Democrat, though never a believer in the third term.

The country will wish him well, regardless of party ties, with the hope that Jim will get more lasting satisfaction out of pennants than he has out of Presidents.

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Star-Journal of July 20, 1940]

A GOOD SOLDIER'S FAREWELL

Out of national politics, as the new campaign begins, goes Jim Farley, operating manager of Roosevelt's political fortunes since the President became Governor of New York.

He can hardly be said to be returning to private life, for the presidency of the New York Yankees merely moves him into the sports spotlight from the political spotlight. But the greatest political team of our times—Roosevelt and Farley—is about to be broken up.

Nobody knows better than Farley the disappointments and slender rewards, as well as the high satifactions, of political life. He has had to endure a good deal of abuse, both from inside and outside his party, and to subordinate his own ambitions repeatedly to those of his chief. But he has been a good fighter, a square-shooting victor, a sportsmanlike loser.

"I've been in politics 31 years," he said the other day, "and there isn't one man I've met during that time with whom I'm not still on speaking terms."

Good-bye, Jim, take keer of yourse'f.

Sorry we can't go so far as to wish your Yankees a fifth term in the World series.

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Evening Post of July 23, 1940]

THE CASE OF JIM FARLEY

Almost everyone likes Jim Farley and has a twinge of regret on account of his break with Roosevelt.

Up to the time of the Democratic National Convention, the cause of the break was not well understood. It was not explained there, either; that is, not in words. However, one only has to piece a few things together in order to reveal the apparent cause.

His selection of Senator CARTER GLASS to make his nomination speech seems in itself to reveal the whole trouble.

The Senator is an enemy of the New Deal. Mr. Farley would hardly have selected him to make the nominating speech if he had not been in agreement with the Senator's attitude toward the Roosevelt policies.

This indicates rather clearly where the trouble lies. Those who have been blaming the President for cold-shouldering Farley and ceasing to make him one of the confidential White House advisers probably will have to alter their viewpoint in that matter. If Farley did not believe in the New Deal, the President could do no other than to cease to accept his advice, even though he may have keenly regretted the necessity of doing so.

Farley virtually made Roosevelt President in the first place. While serving as Governor of New York, previous to 1932, Mr. Roosevelt had not yet shown any especially striking ability; neither had he developed the glamour that came later; neither had he become a radio favorite. He was apparently just another Governor, except that he was Governor of the pivotal State of New York, which is a great advantage to any person who wants to run for President.

With that advantage in his favor, Jim Farley undertook to make him a Presidential candidate—and succeeded.

This strenuous and brilliant work by Farley was done before the Democratic National Convention in 1932. After the convention no particular brilliance was necessary in order to win the election. It was much like rolling off a log, for the Hoover ineptness had handed the Presidency in advance to whomsoever the Democratic candidate might be. Nevertheless, Farley did a good job of managing the campaign.

He did a still better job in 1936, when about 80 or 90 percent of the press was in favor of Alf Landon, the Kansas sunflower. Farley actually forecast the outcome of that election correctly, conceding only two States to Landon. He sure is a wizard in managing political campaigns.

But when Roosevelt began the purge of tory Democrats in 1938, Farley refused to go along. It was thought merely that he was such a strong organization man that he did not want to oppose any Democrat. It was not thought that he agreed with the tories.

Now it seems that he kept out of the purge because he really did agree with them. What else can the selection of GLASS mean?

In any event, practically all onlookers at the political scene in the last dozen years will regret to see him make his bow and disappear through the wings. That is, all onlookers except Wendell Willkie and his supporters. They have reason to be jubilant over Farley's exit.

Futility of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled, "Nations Do Not Fulfill Their Destiny in War," written by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and appearing in the July-August number of the China Monthly.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONS DO NOT FULFILL THEIR DESTINY IN WAR

(By Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS)

The problems facing China, like those facing the western world, are not simple, but exceedingly complex. China has now had many decades of great problems, yet through them all she has evolved a form of nationalism which in its spirit and idealistic state bears all of the characteristics of ultimate success. We may say, in fact, that the turmoil which faces China today, compared with China's condition three or four decades ago, bids fair to be a heartening influence in the world, the like of which mankind has seldom seen.

This is a day of great revolutions. There are probably similar factors which have produced those great revolutions. When we think of India, of Russia, and of China, we see both differences and similarities. The problem facing each of these great cultural centers of the world is not merely a political one; it is economic, it is spiritual, it is educational. Above all, the ultimate unifying idea behind these three great revolutions is that each of these populous culture centers must provide a condition which will make life itself more enduring and more secure for most of the people in these vast areas.

Perhaps I am thinking the way I am because the real interest in China today centers around how to win the present war with Japan; and likely because that problem is so acute our minds naturally turn toward it rather than toward the chronic conditions underlying the great revolution of which the war is an incident. The solving of the acute problem of the present war will not correct these chronic, underlying conditions which are responsible for the great revolutions.

China's struggle for independence and stable nationalism has arrived at that stage which some of us pointed out years ago would have to come; that is, the stage wherein some one nation assumes the brunt of all the antagonisms aroused against the many. To illustrate, at the time of the Boxer Rebellion China's actions united many nations against her and these nations each exacted its individual toll. The first movements within China against the unilateral treaties and the foreign controls were movements against many nations. Japan, having taken the place of one after another of these nations, now assumes alone the brunt of the whole attack; and China's actions, which were in the beginning primarily against the west, are today actions primarily against a sister eastern neighbor. Thus Japan has inherited or assumed "responsibilities and rights" which others asserted. Whether or not those responsibilities and rights are worth maintaining is a question which Japan must decide. She, like China, is probably too busy in attempting to solve a single problem of winning a war to be conscious of the greater problems.

These thoughts come to the minds of those persons in the world who genuinely admire both the cultures of Japan and China. Never can either of those two cultures go forward in such a way as to contribute to the advancement of human well-being until they go hand in hand. If China were to build her new nationalism upon hatred due to her war with Japan, it would be a fatal mistake. Were Japan to build her concept of a new Asia based upon the theory of Japan's right to exploit China, that would be fatal to both China and Japan. Some way or other, in order that both these great nations may contribute properly to world welfare, they must be brought together in cooperative endeavor. Probably there could be a no more inexpedient time than the present to make such a suggestion, even for a well-wisher. Still, it is in the time of strife and turmoil that the most constructive plans for a better world are generally evolved. No thoughtful Chinese can ever think of a defeated, crushed, worn-out Japan as contributing to the betterment of Far Eastern affairs. No thoughtful Japanese can conceive of an exploited, harassed, war-torn, poverty-stricken China as contributing anything to the welfare of a better Asia. Poverty begets poverty. It does not make for higher standards. If, then, the distress which the present war is causing brings ills which are mutual, the overcoming of that stress may, if it is done in a constructive way, bring benefits which, too, may be mutual.

These ideas are not foreign to the thinking of the Chinese, well grounded as they are in their own history and literature. I have always felt that nations which become victims of their own aggressive ambitions, nations which attempt to have their own way by force, ultimately hurt themselves. That, I believe, is the history of national strife. China is the "long-lived empire" because her expansions were natural. She has been imposed upon from without, but never has she forced herself on others excepting by the slow process of peaceful infiltration. If we searched history hard enough, we should probably find some exceptions to this statement. Japan, too, during the hundreds of years of her growth and development into that empire whose past the Japanese constantly remind us is responsible for producing a happy and strong nation, never extended herself beyond the confines of what may be termed her natural boundaries until she adopted the western notion which we now call imperialism. Both the Chinese people and the Japanese people are proud of the mighty changes which have taken place since the turn of this century and which are taking place in each country today. Those changes may, though, in a long survey of history and cultural development seem comparatively unimportant.

Being an American, my type of thinking is closely associated with the philosophical concept of progress and therefore makes me always assume that no matter how great the past may have been, the future will be more resplendent. But this may not necessarily be the case. Mistakes may be made in the Far East at the present time which may retard growth and development. Any ignoring of the fundamentals which go into social and cultural development will bring about a retardation.

Some of the fundamentals which are being grossly abused as a result of the present war may with benefit be considered here. An old Chinese social and economic proverb reads something like this: "If you gather together in one place the wealth of the people, you divide the people; but if you scatter among the people the wealth, you unite the people." Of course, if war destroys all wealth, then, it seems that we have unity because there is no wealth to divide. The sad thing about the present attempts to build Chinese unity and to hold together that which had been already attained in Japanese unity, is that in the destruction of wealth caused by this war the means of properly uniting people may also be destroyed. There is an old Japanese prophecy—and since I say Japanese, it was probably Chinese also—which I remember having learned a long time ago, which said that when men fly like birds 10 kings will go to war. Now, I do not suppose that man's learning how to fly is responsible for the almost universal war that the world has seen since the air was conquered, but the prophecy seem to imply that man's ability to fly makes for strife. It surely makes for wars of greater extent, and if man is destined to destroy himself, that terrible eventuality seems more possible. But that is not man's destiny. This fact history proves—that peoples who have made war their national objective and their most intensive occupation have become extinct. Surely, then, such a nation as China, whose ability to live so long may be ascribed to her fundamental political and social order, both of which have been based upon a life of peace and an aim toward good living, will survive.

China's real test will come when the opportunity for a return to peaceful habits comes. What a wonderful nation she will make when she is able to combine the great fundamentals of her social, economic, and political stability with her new knowledge in regard to health, sanitation, education, and engineering. If she can retain the great genius of her past while the new habits of the present are crystallizing and becoming universal, China will be the marvel of the ages and her people will become the envy of the world. What a task, therefore, rests upon her present-day leadership. May the travail through which she is now passing make greater and not mar that which the world has characterized for so many hundreds of years as Chinese civilization.

Tribute to the Late Col. Richard Rutledge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY CARL JACOBSON

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, last spring Colorado laid to his eternal rest her majestic adopted son, Col. "Dick" Rutledge. It was his privilege to commune with such hardy, restless, venturesome spirits as Colonel Cody, General Sheridan, and Kit Carson; to know their trials and burdens; and to serve with them in building the West.

Colonel Rutledge migrated in an oxcart to Colorado when it was a bleak wilderness and devoted the balance of his life to its remarkable growth and development.

Carl Jacobson, his friend and mine, penned a deeply deserved tribute to Colonel Rutledge under the caption of The Scout's Last Trail. I ask unanimous consent to insert this splendid article in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SCOUT'S LAST TRAIL

(By Carl Jacobson)

A thrilling chapter in the glorious and romantic history of the boundless West has closed with the recent passing of one of the most colorful of pioneers, Col. Richard Rutledge, of Denver, Colo.

Born nearly a century ago in Missouri, just at a time when the westward trek was beginning, Rutledge's venturesome spirit and youthful zeal led him to Colorado in an oxcart expedition—a traditionally primitive mode of early transportation that was truly western. He was only 19 when he contacted a scouting band to be with Kit Carson until the latter's death. His tales of many miraculous escapes from danger from hostile red men are classics in the lore of the plainsmen. In time he joined a former playmate of childhood days, the world-renowned Buffalo Bill. The days of Indian battles passed, he turned to aid in the commercial development of the West by freighting between Colorado mining towns during boom years. As late as 1923, Rutledge preserved the customs of a bygone age by migrating in a prairie schooner from Wyoming to Colorado. He spent his last years in the Queen City of the Plains, a living symbol of the pioneer era, his widely mourned death occurring in the spring of 1940.

His mortal life is ended, but the immortal spirit of this beloved scout will forever move along the historic and picturesque trails of the mountains and plains he loved so well and to which he devoted a long career of courageous sacrifice.

Significant, too, is the marking of the conquest of America's last continental frontier by the demise of this last survivor of the famed scouts, Kit Carson and Buffalo Bill. The advent of modern civilization with its tense might and mad tempo has gradually removed every vestige of that vast unconquered empire, which but a lifetime ago was inhabited only by roving Indian tribes and howling beasts and swept by the merciless elements of nature.

Words cannot adequately express the deep tribute which we must pay to the indomitable fortitude of Dick Rutledge, who lived 95 years through the building of a world of streamlined civilization from a barren wilderness. The most flattering superlatives at our command cannot honor fully his initiative and individualism. Were it not for these vital qualities possessed by the builders of the West—men such as Colonel Cody, General Sheridan, Kit Carson, and Colonel Rutledge—the American Nation would be deplorably lacking in the ideals of faith in the future, which have brought it incomparable greatness. The unequaled accomplishments of our method of life would have been impossible without the fearless confidence and resolute heroism of the pioneers.

Let the mad dictators of Europe learn that the men whose deeds endure and whose place in mortality and eternity is secured are built of such mettle as was Colonel Rutledge, rather than being regimented puppets of a blood-fed machine of carnage and destruction. Our Nation is great because we revere the builders—God-fearing men and women whose sacrifice and loyalty have blazed the trails which lead to security and peace, found at our homes, firesides, and altars.

We loathe the haters of mankind, the despoilers of culture and civilization, for whose self-vaunted false greatness nations and empires fall and people suffer cruelly and unjustly.

Colonel Rutledge never forsook for a moment the path of duty nor faltered in carrying out the demands of an ever-progressing empire. Fostered in a spirit of adventure; broadened into a long career of brilliant and valuable scouting expeditions under three of the most notable figures of western history, Cody, Sheridan, and Carson; given fruition in old age by remaining with nobility and benign dignity a true personification of the passing frontier, his remarkable life is an inspiring saga of national heroism.

Our hearts will fill with sadness as we gather to witness events which denote the modernization and expansion of the West, for we shall miss the traditional figure of the beloved scout who was always present for these occasions, bespeaking his keen interest in seeing the fruits of the toil of earlier days, and in experiencing the realization of fond dreams.

His hearty handclasp will be but a cherished memory, but it has left us with the intense pride of having felt kindred to the spirit he typified, in our personal association.

In every parade there will be a void, which only a short time ago was filled by a tall, kindly gentleman with flowing white hair, whose upraised hand of greeting excited admiration in the hearts of all, and conveyed a deeper sense of devotion to those who fully realized what he had done to make their happiness and comfort possible. May his soul march on forever.

In times of national stress and world crisis, we fervently respect the living patriotism, and that was Colonel Rutledge's. Its depth and intensity is real, for he gave his all that freedom might be universal in this land. This he owed largely to the genuine American stock from which he sprung, including two signers of the Declaration of Independence and a famous cousin, Ann Rutledge, sweetheart of the Great Emancipator.

Many of the world's most eminent figures have been sublime in their simplicity. Humility is a cardinal virtue of true greatness. Colonel Rutledge disdained frills and foolish fads and the unnecessary fancies of life, and abhorred personal glory and selfish gain. In his own words, this praiseworthy ideal is most aptly expressed: "I can clearly say that the scouts should ever be remembered, as they all died poor, as money was not their pride, but our country and our fellow man, and for humanity and love for our dear ones that have passed to the Great Beyond."

Col. Dick Rutledge is no more of this world, but has passed on to a glorious reward, leaving behind a rich heritage of accomplishment, foresight, vision, loyalty, patriotism, and faith. The West forever owes him a debt of gratitude and appreciation for the vital part he played in its building. America is indebted deeply for the pioneer spirit without which our national unity could never have been effected. The world shall know men of our land, such as Colonel Rutledge, for their exemplification of the American way of life, founded on the principles of liberty, justice, and Christianity.

"His work is done.
But while the races of mankind endure,
Let his great example stand,
Till in all lands and thro' all human story
The path of duty be the way to glory:
And as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime.
O good gray head which all men knew,
No more in soldier fashion will he greet
With lifted hand the gazer in the street.
O iron nerve to true occasion true,
Such was he whom we deplore.
The long self-sacrifice of life is o'er.
What know we greater than the soul?
On God and Godlike men we build our trust."

Invasion of the South by Wendell L. Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY GEORGE ROTHWELL BROWN

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by George Rothwell Brown regarding the decision of Wendell Willkie to invade Dixie.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, July 18.—Wendell Willkie's tentative decision to invade Dixie in an effort to break the Solid South next November is a wise one.

It would be the irony of fate if the birthplace and nursery of Mr. Roosevelt's first experiment with the New Deal "more abundant life"—T. V. A.—should throw its support in the coming elections to the Republican candidate.

But, strange as it may seem, Tennessee, largest beneficiary of T. V. A., may give its 11 electoral votes to the former head of Commonwealth & Southern.

Mr. Willkie stands mighty well in the group of Southern States serviced by his former power companies and, as Senator "Cotton Ed" SMITH, disgruntled Jeffersonian Democrat, of South Carolina, said in announcing that he would not go to the Chicago convention, a whole lot of people down in Dixieland are going to vote for Willkie.

Make no mistake about it; the New Deal high command is very apprehensive on this score, which explains why Representative RANKIN, of Mississippi, and Charlie Michelson's smear brigade, have tried to fasten the Power Trust and Wall Street labels on the disconcerting runaway prairie fire who now confronts the New Deal on every political frontier.

Last week the House Appropriations Committee tried to jam through under unanimous-consent agreement a bill appropriating $65,800,000 to T. V. A. in the next 3 years under the guise of a national-defense emergency measure. Of this the very spicy sum of $25,000,000 was to be made available this election year.

It would seem that the mountain folk down in Tennessee still need at least $25,000,000 worth of additional education in the blessings of the New Deal.

Tennessee has four major cities of 100,000 or more population, Knoxville, Nashville, Chattanooga, and Memphis. Each has two representative daily newspapers.

Seven of these eight newspapers are actively supporting Mr. Willkie. The eighth is published by one of Jim Farley's early New Deal satellites, Silliman Evans, formerly of Texas.

It doesn't make much sense to argue that seven newspapers can be wrong and the eighth one right. Newspapers usually reflect the mass mind of the people in the communities they serve; and in spite of the great boon that T. V. A. is supposed to have brought to Tennessee, it is reasonable to suppose that these seven newspapers which are supporting Willkie know what their subscribers are thinking.

Mr. Willkie has been doing business with the people of Tennessee for a good many years. That is one State in which the people know him mighty well.

Don't think that Tennessee can't go Republican if it makes up its mind to do it. It did so in 1924 and again in 1928, and the signs indicate that history is about to repeat.

Anyhow, the new dealers in Congress fear so, and hence the last-minute effort since Mr. Willkie was nominated to dump another $25,000,000 for T. V. A. into Tennessee between now and election day.

In blocking consideration of the bill in the House the other day Representative MCLEAN, New Jersey Republican, said:

"This is just another evidence of customary T. V. A. stupidity in trying to expand its ordinary program under the cloak of national defense."

The increase of Republican sentiment in Tennessee squares with reports from other parts of the South of Mr. Willkie's high standing with the people of Dixie. A newspaper friend who recently spent some time in South Carolina told this writer he was simply amazed by the evidence of Willkie's popularity in that most typical of all Southern States.

Maybe "Cotton Ed" SMITH knows what he is talking about when he predicts that many southern people are going to vote for the former Democrat, Wendell L. Willkie.

Refugee Children and Conditions in Belgium

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

NEWSPAPER ARTICLES

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two articles which this morning appeared side by side on the front page of the Times-Herald newspaper, one of which advised of the passage of a bill in the House of Representatives yesterday which would, under certain conditions, permit American ships to evacuate English children from the British Isles to the United States in order that they may not suffer death at the hands of an invading army.

The other article advised that United States Ambassador Cudahy, of Belgium, had stated that Europe would be a living hell this winter as the result of starvation due to the British blockade. Those interested in children the world over are desirous of these defenseless children of Belgium being protected against death by starvation. The newspaper report states that such a plan to save from death by starvation these children was received with a cold shoulder by the British.

I think it little behooves the British to object to our feeding the starving children of Belgium to prevent their deaths by the thousands this winter in the face of the fact that we are attempting to save from death their children of the British Isles by evacuating them at this time.

It is my understanding that the British Government predicates its opposition to feeding Belgium children on the theory that foods and supplies sent to Belgium for the benefit of these children would be seized by the Germans for the purpose of feeding their soldiers. In answer to this, I recall that the executives of the American Red Cross and representatives of the Hoover Relief Organization of New York, who also had representatives in Poland, testified that when about $750,000 of food, clothing, and medical supplies were distributed in Poland by these two aforementioned organizations, that the Germans in no wise interfered with the proper distribution thereof; and Ambassador Cudahy, our American representative, appointed by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Roosevelt's personal friend, states that he has assurances to the effect that if food and medical supplies are provided to these innocent children of Belgium that there would be no interference whatsoever from German authorities.

Shall we evacuate the English children from the British Isles to prevent their being slaughtered by the invading enemy and at the same time condemn children of Belgium to death by starvation?

In addition, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix extracts from the very interesting book which I have before me, entitled America for Americans, the author of which is Mr. G. Allison Phelps, author and radio commentator of Hollywood, Calif.

Also, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published, in connection with this subject, a very timely editorial from the Times-Herald of today entitled "Howling Hell This Winter."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REFUGEE SHIPS VOTED BY HOUSE—ASKS UNITED STATES VESSELS TO EVACUATE CHILDREN

(By Ernest Barcella)

The House yesterday voted overwhelmingly to send American ships into European war zones to evacuate thousands of refugee children, mainly British, who await an uncertain fate.

The vote was on a bill by Representative THOMAS C. HENNINGS (Democrat), of Missouri, who appealed to his colleagues to show "our traditional disregard for the consequences of a charitable deed bravely done."

The measure, applying to children under 16 of all nations, would amend the Neutrality Act to permit the vessels to enter and leave combat zones after all belligerents had given prior assurance that they would not be molested. The ships would proceed without convoys and would be identified by large American flags.

An amendment by Representative JOHN C. SCHAFER (Republican), of Wisconsin, requires that "necessary adult personnel" accompanying the children must be composed of American citizens. Another amendment by Representative JOHN TAFER (Republican), of New York, would make American citizens who accept refugee children personally liable for their support. A similar measure by Senator CARTER GLASS (Democrat), of Virginia, is pending before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Both bills are presumed to have administration endorsement, since the State Department did not oppose them. President Roosevelt said recently, however, that the problem requires careful consideration because of the hazards involved.

BRITISH COLD TO AID FOR WAR VICTIMS, GERMANS APPROVE—EXCELLENT IDEA," SAYS NAZI EMBASSY; "NO COMMENT," RESPONSE OF LOTHIAN

(By Fred Pasley)

American aid for a famine-threatened Europe to prevent it from becoming "a howling hell" this winter met with a polite but firm cold shoulder yesterday from British Embassy officials, while German Government representatives hailed it as "an excellent idea."

They were contacted by the writer for comment on an editorial appearing in the Times-Herald and New York News yesterday proposing establishment of an American relief commission to distribute food supplies to the millions of noncombatant men, women, and children who face starvation if outside help is not forthcoming by September.

STARVATION PREDICTED

The editorial was inspired by an interview given Tuesday in London by John Cudahy, United States Ambassador to Belgium. He predicted that in that country alone some 8,000,000 persons would be affected by the food shortage, with about 2,000,000 more Belgian refugees in similar straits in France.

Meanwhile congressional impetus was provided by Representative MARTIN J. KENNEDY (Democrat), of New York, who introduced a resolution authorizing the President to appoint a food relief commission "preferably headed by Herbert Hoover."

The commission would be authorized to distribute American surplus foods to Nazi-occupied territories, with the understanding that such action would not imply United States recognition of German conquest of these nations.

After reading a transcript of the editorial, a spokesman for Dr. Hans Thomsen, German chargé d'affaires, explained that diplomatic usage would not permit a formal statement until "the Embassy has been officially approached." Then, adding it was "an excellent idea," he expressed the hope it could be put into execution.

As to whether the Germans would confiscate food supplies for refugees to their own use, the spokesman referred the writer to Ernest J. Swift, of Washington, vice chairman of the American Red Cross in charge of insular and foreign operations, and Maurice Pate, vice president of the Commission for Polish Relief, associated with the Herbert Hoover organization in New York City.

PAID VISIT TO POLAND

Both Swift and Pate, each of whom visited German-occupied Poland, asserted that the Hitler high command attempted in no way to interfere with the distribution of food, clothing, and hospital sundries to victims of the "blitzkrieg."

"Every item reached its destination," said Swift, whose unit of the Red Cross handled $700,000 worth of supplies.

Pate added a poignant touch with the declaration that there are now some "10,000,000 children in Europe, who can't hurt anybody, waiting to be fed."

HOWLING HELL THIS WINTER

The above caption is suggested by some remarks which John Cudahy, United States Ambassador to Belgium, made in London day before yesterday. Mr. Cudahy, in a press interview, predicted that 8,000,000 Belgians will come "close to famine" by mid-September unless American shipments of food can get to them through the British blockade. Said Cudahy:

"Their situation is very, very serious. Belgium imports 75 percent of her wheat. Present supplies, with severe rationing—225 grams, or a half pound, of bread per person per day—will last until September 1, or at best until early October.

"If you gentlemen think the continent is a howling hell now, what do you think it will be this winter?"

British official reaction to the Cudahy statement was calm. British spokesmen, saying it is "unlikely that Britain will allow any food into German-occupied Europe," added:

"It is not at all certain that Europe will be in such a bad way as Mr. Cudahy thinks. Belgium and the other occupied countries have to make up their shortages from Germany. If the Germans are prepared to share fairly, there probably will not be any famine in Europe this winter."

The fact is that even if the Germans "share fairly"—which they won't—famine will not be averted in a fully blockaded Europe this winter.

Europe never has been able to produce enough food to sustain itself. It always has been a food-importing continent.

And the British intend to make this a complete blockade. They are already blockading France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Germany, and Norway. Now they talk of having to be careful about food imports to Spain, which is not yet in the war, because some of this food might leak out to the Axis powers.

What it all means is that the noncombatants of the principal European countries are to be pinched or killed by man-made famines this winter.

HUNGER AS A WEAPON

Hitler, for his part, is doing his best to starve out the British; and he seems to be getting some results. At least, the British have now reenacted their old World War criminal laws against food waste of any description.

This mass starvation is in prospect for Europe and Great Britain because two strong men—Winston Churchill and Adolf Hitler—are in a death struggle to find out which of them is the stronger.

The prospect of mass starvation does not worry Churchill or Hitler. To them it is all in the game of war. Starvation of the enemy's noncombatant population—women, children, men unable to fight—is as legitimate a weapon to these gents as tanks, airplanes, submarines, battleships, poison gas.

GET BUSY, AMERICANS

To us this seems one of the cruelest wars in history. We can compare it for cruelty only with the inter-Allied blockade after the World War, when, with Germany flat on its back, the Allies, at French insistence, went on starving the German people.

Our interventionists seem as calm about the whole thing as Churchill and Hitler. We believe American public opinion, however, should arouse itself and unite to bring pressure on the British Government to consent to these measures:

Formation of an American relief commission, perhaps headed by Herbert Hoover, the man best qualified by experience to head it.

This commission to negotiate with Hitler for distribution of American food shipments among noncombatants in need of food in all territory occupied by the Germans—these shipments to be allowed to pass the British blockade and the German counter-blockade without undue delays or red tape.

Distribution of all such food to be under the supervision of Americans, whose sworn duty it shall be to see that the food gets to noncombatants, instead of being confiscated by combatants.

There is no other way that we know of to keep Europe from becoming a howling hell this winter. There is no greater act of international charity and decency that the United States could perform. And there is no time to lose.

Don't you think it would be much smarter on our part to solve this problem of our children before shipping the children of foreigners to our shores and trying to solve theirs? Or are you, too, a victim of the European complex? Or have you a tenth cousin over there to whom you can give a job if you can get him over here (with his wife and European children) and discharge an American father to make room in your business for the alien?

And speaking of bringing European children into the United States: Are those who are so anxious that America's immigration laws be scuttled so that refugees can pour in here from Europe, just as anxious to bring in refugees from the war-stricken areas of China? And if not, why not? I've never heard of any great Nation-wide movement among bankers and motion-picture producers, and stars, and other representatives of moneyed interests, directed to evacuate Chinese children from regions in China that have been bombed by the Japanese. Aren't little Chinese boys and girls worthy of the Christly mercy and generosity of these sympathetic, warmhearted American humanitarians who have suddenly popped up in our midst?

What kind of hypocrites are these we have among us, anyway?

But this is not a question of whether or not it is right to evacuate children from war zones. We know it is both human and right to do so, whether they are the children of rich Europeans or the children of poverty-stricken Asiatics. The question is: When their own Fatherlands have colonies and possessions to which to send them, should our immigration laws be scuttled and such refugees be permitted to pour into the United States, a nation already deeply in debt, with millions unemployed and hundreds of thousands of its own children, living miserably, dependent upon charity which has been totally inadequate to care for them properly?

No! Let's not add to our own heavy burden. Let's keep out of this country hordes of refugees from either Paris, Palestine, Portsmouth, or Peking.

Anyone who says I do not sympathize with the European men and women and boys and girls who have been afflicted by the wars of their masters, is speaking an untruth. But I am wholly, completely, and utterly opposed to having America used as the soup kitchen of the world, especially when the soup we are feeding our own hungry masses has been so badly diluted that it contains little nourishment now for American citizens who must eat it or perish.

Transportation of Child Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY BOAKE CARTER

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, no vote of mine will knowingly be cast against the best interest of any child refugee or otherwise. If refugee children are to be brought here, and I hope that they may, it must be done at the risk of the sending nation. Congress has already adopted such a policy with regard to passenger and freight transportation and for the well-being of our own children it should not be abrogated now. The hazard to the United States is too great for any reckless speculation. In this connection I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD as part of my remarks a pertinent article by Boake Carter vividly portraying the grave dangers involved in such a laudable, humanitarian enterprise.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REFUGEE CHILDREN—DON'T SEND SHIPS—DANGER TOO GREAT

(By Boake Carter)

One of the direct causes of our entry into the first World War was the continued torpedoing of our merchant vessels. The Germans, engaged in a death struggle with France and Britain, warned that all neutral vessels caught supplying goods to her enemies or found in specifically stated belligerent waters would be torpedoed.

To avoid that provocation in a second World War, Congress, before the war began, established an act of neutrality which barred United States merchant ships from belligerent seas. We made that national sacrifice in order to attain a greater common end—peace for ourselves and avoidance of incidents which would inflame the public mind and provoke our entry into another foreign war.

To date the President has conscientiously executed these desires of the American people. American ships have been and are almost entirely barred from entry into waters around Europe, lest any one of them be torpedoed or bombed, and a dangerous incident be created.

Now, however, there is rising a clamor from well-intentioned but minority groups demanding that Congress amend the Neutrality Act to permit passage of American-flag ships to Europe to bring back British children to the United States.

A House committee has approved such a proposal. Lord Lothian, the astute British Ambassador, has lent encouragement. Likewise, Mrs. Roosevelt has been actively buttonholing Congressmen and Senators. Advertisements in the papers have begun to appear—"Write or wire your Congressman."

But to his credit let it be said President Roosevelt has not lent encouragement to this newest emotional outburst. On the contrary, he has been distinctly cool toward the idea.

Hardly any proposal could be more dangerous. The pity is the more because the real menace is obscured by the obvious human interest—children—which is involved.

The British cannot spare the boats. That is the most popular excuse in this country for clamor for substitution of American boats. Well-meaning people, including some of our columnists, have said that no danger will accrue if our boats are well lighted, the belligerent governments notified of their passages, and German authorities permitted to examine each vessel to see that nothing is carried but children.

It was my good fortune to sail from Norfolk to New York a few days ago on the newest, largest, and fastest American liner, the S. S. America. She is mentioned as one of the boats which should be sent abroad for the children.

I sought from the officers information on the experiences that befell them on the other United States Line's ships while taking refugees out of Europe in the earlier days of the war. What would be the risks in sending United States ships abroad for children, I asked. This is roughly what they have to say:

Talk about well-lighted vessels, notification to belligerent governments, and consular searches look nice on paper, sound well over the radio—but that is all.

In the twilight of dusk and in the half-light of early dawn, the silhouette of a large ship is deceiving. If the vessel is proceeding in belligerent waters, and is sighted by a belligerent submarine, the sub commander can easily be deceived by lighting conditions. He may fire his torpedo first and ask questions after—for that is war and the vessels are in war zones.

If a vessel approaches from a foreshortened angle, at dusk or dawn, it is hard to tell from the low elevation of a submarine periscope what vessel she may be. The sub commander is within his rights in assuming it is a vessel of questionable character.

But, you may say, the governments at war will have all been informed by the movements of these child-carrying United States liners and will have, in turn, notified their naval vessels. But what of some submarine who might fail to receive that broadcast notification? What if its antenna were out of order?

If a German sub and the German Government had broadcast the notification of passage of the United States ships, and yet the sub torpedoed the vessel through mistake, who would be to blame? No one. Yet a broken-down submarine wireless on one sub could cause a chain of circumstances which might lead to a horrifying tragedy and plunge the United States into a paroxysm of emotion overnight, and into war on the morrow.

And if that should occur, would not far greater tragedy be brought on millions more children because of the humane but misguided effort to salvage some children from a European nation at war?

Would not the sinking of a United States boatload of English children create almost inevitable war for the United States, and so involve many millions more children—children of the United States?

To save a few, we are preparing to risk equal miseries for many more, as yet untouched by the red hand of war. Is this mercy? Is it humanity?

With the daily bombing raids on the British ports in progress right now, would it not be the height of folly to send American ships into those ports, even though their mission be one of mercy?

When pilots are trying to bomb targets below them, with enemy fighters shooting at them in the air, and antiaircraft gunners pelting them from the ground, the bomber pilot does not conveniently and thoughtfully fly down to some ship to see whether or not it has the Stars and Stripes painted on its decks, before he pulls his bomb-rack lever. Yet one misplaced bomb on one of these proposed American ships could bring the United States to the brink of war overnight.

And while it is not the desire of humane-minded Americans to provoke measures which will send their fellow citizens to war, do not forget that there are European nations—the British—for instance, who would not be annoyed to see occur any incident which would bring America into the war.

Conscription of Wealth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT OF PHILIP MURRAY

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I noticed in last night's newspaper that Mr. Philip Murray, vice chairman of the C. I. O., came out in favor of a conscription of wealth. I ask unanimous consent that the brief item be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the item was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 7, 1940]

CONSCRIPT WEALTH, MURRAY DEMANDS

PITTSBURGH, August 7.—Philip Murray, vice chairman of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, today charged industrial leaders with failure to cooperate in the defense program and demanded that the Government "take steps to conscript the country's wealth and commandeer the productive facilities necessary to defense."

In an address before the annual convention of the Inland Boatmen's Division of the C. I. O.'s National Maritime Union, Murray quoted Eugene Grace, chairman of the board of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, as declaring the corporation would not expand its facilities for defense purposes "unless the Government agrees to early amortization and guarantees substantial profits."

Conscription Act

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

LETTER TO MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request the careful consideration of the House Committee on Military Affairs to my proposal on exemptions from the conscription act to the religious, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1940.

Re H. R. 10132, Wadsworth conscription bill.
MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE,
House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN: To me it seems imperative that action be taken by your committee to insure that the Wadsworth bill be so modified as to make due provision for the religious life of the American people. As you know, the sole provision of the bill in this matter is the President's right to defer the service rendered by ministers of religion actually engaged in ministerial duties. No provision is made for those who are preparing for the ministry: seminarians. Nor is any provision made for those indispensable members of a religious community, whose duties it is to attend to the domestic work of the religious house—the coadjutor brothers. These men make it possible for priests to attend to their proper work.

To me it seems clear that the good of the American people requires that all these classes—clergymen, seminarians, and brothers—be exempted from service under the bill.

Many reasons why this statement is true must occur to your mind; let me mention those which seem of weight to me. I shall not offer arguments which might appeal to my coreligionists, but such as must weigh with every thoughtful American.

It is evident to intelligent observers that religion is the backbone of all moral conduct; religion supports authority, teaching respect for law and order. Principles derived from religious moral teaching make the average man an honest man, a law-abiding citizen. Teaching, for example, that God forbids murder under threat of eternal punishment, religious instructors have proposed a motive for avoiding this crime far in excess of any which the State can assign or carry out; and so also of all other crimes. It is therefore good public policy to provide for the continued and flourishing existence of religion; I do not, of course, suggest any link with any particular form of religion, but an even-handed dealing with all religious bodies.

Religion is one of the needs and demands of the American people. In fact, the bill under discussion may be said to recognize this need, since it makes some effort to provide for religious ministers. The precise point is that the provision of this bill in this respect is not adequate.

Granted that religious ministers are to receive some consideration under this bill, consistency and thoroughness require that this consideration—

1. Amount to total exemption from training and service; and
2. Be extended not only to ministers already ordained but also to the two groups mentioned above—seminarians and brothers.

Let me take the three points that here suggest themselves in order:

1. Total exemption of ordained clergymen;
2. Total exemption of seminarians; and
3. Total exemption of brothers.

1. Total exemption of ordained clergymen: The American people enjoy the right to exercise freely their right to worship. To do this adequately, each religious group requires and desires that it be possessed of a group of trained religious educators and leaders known as the clergy. The principle, therefore, that each man should serve where he will do the most good and best further his country's interests in time of war requires that in time of war the clergy remain clergy. That is their specialty. There they are most efficient. There they are most needed. It is a well-known adage that "without hope the people perish." And truly this is especially manifest in time of war, when the buoyant and hopeful solution of life given by religion alone suffices to lift up fainting spirits.

2. Total exemption of seminarians: The public need for a properly trained clergy already described is a permanent thing, lasting as long as there endures the ineradicable tendency in man toward higher things. To satisfy this permanent need a continuous stream of trained religious leaders must be entering upon their work. This cannot be if we do not permit our seminaries to continue their normal functioning. For where are we to find our future ministers of religion if not in seminaries? It must be clear that if you take away the seminarian of today you take away the priest, minister, or rabbi of tomorrow. And whether the morrow bring peace or war, we can ill afford to lack spiritual leaders, be they chaplains to encourage and befriend our soldiers or be they pastors who instruct and serve our people.

But it may be objected that there is no intention under the bill of destroying the seminarian class, that all that is required is a temporary interruption of the course pursued by the seminarian. To this objection let me answer, first, that such an interruption of a full year in the midst of a course of study which of its nature is continuous and closely linked would be an immense setback in the progress of the seminarian toward his goal. Secondly—and this response is more basic—the objection misses the whole point at issue. That point is precisely this: The seminarian is destined to serve the people as a clergyman, whether in peace or in war. Hence any training of him for other work is a needless waste of time and money.

The measure to be taken, therefore, is one recognizing the principle that an adequate clergy group is a really fundamental necessity in time of war, and hence, parallelly, an adequate seminarian group is a real necessity in time of preparation. No bona fide seminarian should be shunted off the course he has entered upon and drafted into some other field of public service, thus deserting the line for which he is best adapted.

This leads us to another seeming objection to my proposal, which in fact, however, has no weight. That is the objection that spurious seminaries and seminarians will suddenly appear all over the country in order that conscription be evaded. Even if some less spirited youths might be tempted to try this ruse, is it not clear that a little careful examination of each institution will quickly reveal which are genuine seminaries containing sincere seminarians and which are so-called seminaries containing opportunists? For, surely, it is a matter of public record in each locality which seminaries have been in existence for a term of years before the war scare sufficient to prove that avoidance of military service had nought to do with their existence. Again, the records of these seminaries will reveal the average number of entries each year. Only if the number this year notably exceed that of recent years may suspicion be cast on the genuine good intentions of those entering this year.

3. Total exemption of brothers. We may distinguish two types of brothers, viz: Those who directly serve the people at large for example by teaching, and those who do so indirectly, namely by directly serving priests or other religious who in turn serve the people directly. I contend that both classes should be totally exempted from military service and training. This exemption is due to the first class—those who serve the people at large directly—because their functions are necessary both in peace and war. Let us consider the offices performed by the second group a little more closely. These men do the manual work necessary in religious communities and institutions. Their ministrations—given freely—are absolutely necessary, if the priests are to be free to attend to their special work. Hence, the arguments which prove the need of a clergy prove likewise the need of these relatively few but very important members of religious communities. They also ought therefore, to be exempted.

I hope my suggestions will receive the favorable consideration of the committee.

I would be pleased to have this letter included in the hearings.

Respectfully submitted.

MARTIN J. KENNEDY.

Advocacy of and Enlistment in War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 8 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE AVE MARIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the excellent paper, the Ave Maria, published at Notre Dame, Ind., and edited by Patrick J. Carroll.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Ave Maria of July 13, 1940]

A CHALLENGE

Some time ago Senator RUSH D. HOLT (Democrat, West Virginia), issued to American war meddlers a challenge that will weigh every particle of their sincerity and loyalty to a cause they have gratuitously espoused. Senator HOLT said: "Any man who advocates our entrance into this war, and who does not enlist in the cause of the Allies is a cowardly traitor to his country. If the danger is what they say, and the cause is what they preach, they should have the courage to offer their lives to the machine of death, rather than sit back and ask the sacrifice of the young fellows who want none of this war." Senator HOLT, with good reason, asked his listeners to inquire into the motives and interests of "the 'fifth column' interventionists," among whom he included "financially involved newspapers," "controlled radio commentators," "jingoistic government officials," "paid columnists," and "the active interventionists who have large financial holdings in Europe." Spurred by the Senator's invitation to warmongers to don fighting garb themselves, we checked the ages of the 429 American lawyers, educators, writers, and businessmen who urge the United States to declare war on Germany. Senator HOLT's challenge assumed added significance when we noted that the average age is well over 50. There is little cannon fodder here. There is small regard shown for those who will be called upon to lay down their lives when fighting begins.

The Migrant Problem

OF

HON. JOHN H. TOLAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the House Special Investigation Committee to Study the Migrant Problem held hearings in New York City on July 29, 30, and 31. We open hearings in Montgomery, Ala., August 14, then to Chicago, Nebraska, Oklahoma, California, and finally Washington, D. C.

Ever since the appointment of the committee by the Speaker of the House of Representatives the press throughout the United States has given us fine publicity and rendered a distinct service to the committee.

I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to a particularly fine and excellent editorial from one of the very best and fairest newspapers on the Pacific coast, the Oakland Post-Enquirer, of Oakland, Calif., as follows:

[From the Oakland (Calif.) Post-Enquirer of August 3, 1940]

TOLAN COMMITTEE ON MIGRANTS OFFERS REAL HOPE

Congressman JOHN H. TOLAN, of Oakland, chairman of the important congressional committee investigating the migrant problem, says there are now more than 4,000,000 of these homeless men, women, and children wandering from State to State.

The Tolan committee is making it increasingly plain that this migrant problem is essentially an interstate matter, a Federal responsibility, and that it can be met only on that basis.

California has been forced to meet more than its fair share of the responsibility of caring for these millions of victims of drought and economic disaster in other States.

But few States have escaped some measure of the burden.

As the number of migrant families has pyramided, and the pressure of the problem presented by them has increased, the Nation has been flooded with propaganda concerning this situation.

Some of this propaganda has been true, some of it has been garbled half-truth, much of it has been wholly false.

There is a need for a show-down of facts.

This is what the Tolan congressional committee proposes to do, and is doing.

It is digging up the essential facts, sifting the truth from what is half true and what is false.

It is approaching the problem as a Federal question, realizing that individual States cannot deal adequately with the situation.

It is going into all regions of the Nation affected by this problem, holding local hearings, investigating local conditions, and in this way gaining a first-hand knowledge of the factors involved.

This promises to be an immense service—to the Nation as well as to the migrants.

Since California has been penalized more than any other part of the Nation by economic disaster in other States and the consequent uprooting of families, the work of the Tolan commission will be of particular value to California.

The realistic attitude of Congressman TOLAN and his committee toward the migrant question is the most hopeful indication we have yet had that constructive action will replace the futility that has hitherto marked most of the attempts to deal with the situation.

Congressman TOLAN is keenly aware of its seriousness. He says: "The spectacle of more than 4,000,000 homeless and destitute Americans wandering from State to State is something that strikes directly at the morale of our people."

He is right. It is a disgraceful and shocking spectacle which this resourceful Nation should not tolerate.

Nor should the various States or the Nation continue to try to deal with the situation through weak, half-hearted measures which offer no permanent solution to the migrants and which further undermine their morale.

The great majority of these unfortunate people belong to families with a long American heritage back of them. They ask only opportunity to make a living on the land, and they want to do that in the environment they have known most of their lives.

Obviously, this problem should be met at its source, in the Southern and Southwestern States which have sent millions of dispossessed people pouring into other States.

In the midst of familiar surroundings, among friends, these people would have a far better chance for rehabilitation than in unfamiliar surroundings a thousand miles or so from home.

It seems altogether likely that out of the realistic, fact-finding efforts of the Tolan committee a program will be evolved for helping the migrants to find opportunity and security in their home States.

Strike of Capital Is Blocking National-Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK POST

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, while we are speaking these days of conscription and urging that it is the patriotic duty of our young men to sacrifice for the good of their country, it might not be amiss to apply the old adage, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." Just a little more patriotism displayed by some of our big industries might set an example for our young men.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD an article from the New York Post of August 6, 1940:

[From the New York Post of August 6, 1940]

BILLIONS FOR DEFENSE—BUT HOW MUCH FOR PROFIT?—STRIKE OF CAPITAL IS BLOCKING NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

WASHINGTON, August 6.—The national-defense program is almost 3 months old. It is possible now to appraise it not only in the statistical terms of contracts awarded but also in terms of sacrifice, of national unity, and of that quality which is far more essential than either dollars or tools—patriotism.

The defense program has been presented to the Nation in a series of generous appropriations totaling $14,000,000,000 set in a show window of glittering generalities technically known as "progress reports." On the face of it, you would think that everything is going along fine.

It isn't.

There has been, and is, delay—long delay on our most vital items of defense equipment—because, as one competent observer here puts it, the economic coefficient of patriotism has not yet been determined. The market in patriotism is extremely active, and the sale price is shooting up every day.

Washington is crowded with lobbyists and high-pressure salesmen and top executives of corporations trying to find out what they can do for their country, at what price, and at what profit.

The parallel between the Washington of 1917–18 and today is deadly. The talk 23 years ago in the lobbies of the Capitol and in offices and hotel rooms was of amortization and of cost plus such-and-such percentage. And that is all you hear today.

The steel companies refuse to contract to deliver armor plate.

The aviation companies refuse to contract to deliver planes.

Patriotism and defense and all that, they say, is very fine. But how about the amortization of plant expansion and the profits?

PROFIT NEED GRANTED

Now, every one grants, of course, that the industries on which the Nation must depend for its weapons are entitled to financial protection against loss from excessive plant capacity, and to legitimate profits. But those industries which are most vital to defense are refusing to do their part until every "i" is dotted and every "t" crossed on an agreement to their liking.

To put it another way: Steel companies and the aircraft companies could accept some contracts (and sizable contracts) now without facing great plant expansions. Acceptance of such contracts would tremendously facilitate the speedy defense of America. Such contracts are not being signed. Refusal to accept them is being used as a club to force through Congress legislation on amortization of plant costs which these firms have been seeking for years.

In 1917 Pierre du Pont, then president of the Du Pont Co., wrote:

"We cannot assent to allowing our own patriotism to interfere with our duties as trustees (of stockholders)."

On May 16, 1940, Capt. C. W. Fisher, testifying before a House subcommittee in behalf of the Navy Department on tax and labor legislation affecting defense contractors, said:

"In these perilous times, [illegible]man, we should make the Government business most attractive."

PRESIDENT SPOKE THAT DAY

Captain Fisher's plea in behalf of profits for defense was offered, incidentally, on the very day that the President delivered his historic message to Congress calling for 50,000 planes and a tremendous national sacrifice for preparedness. The President later said that the defense effort must not make a single war millionaire.

Captain Fisher and the heads of steel and aircraft companies have taken their cue from Du Pont, not from the President's message. And, incidentally, there is every indication that they will have their way. The "strike of capital," as the Senate Munitions Committee described the action of Du Pont and others during the World War, worked then, and it appears to be working equally well today.

Strong language, this "strike of capital"?

Consult the record.

On May 21, Rear Admiral W. R. Furlong testified before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations describing the necessity for expanding a Navy plant at which armor plate is made for ships.

DIFFER ON METHOD

He told the committee that a sum of $6,000,000 which was appropriated a year ago had proved of tremendous importance because:

"If I had not had that authority (to spend the $6,000,000 for plate), I would have been pretty badly off in the way of getting armor plate on these ships. The various armor makers have gone to the Treasury to try to have the tools and facilities amortized, but the Treasury and the armor makers do not see alike on how it should be done, so that the $6,000,000 that you gave me has enabled me to put $1,700,000, or about that much, in the Bethlehem Steel plant, because they had just stopped negotiating with the Treasury.

"There are two other steel mills which feel that they do not like to have the United States or anybody else's property on their property. (The admiral intended to convey to the committee that the Navy bought the machinery installed at the Bethlehem plant, and the Navy held title to it.)

"STILL AT STANDSTILL

"So they are at a standstill and trying to negotiate with the Treasury. But, as they have not had any success from their point of view, there is pending in Mr. VINSON'S committee (the House Naval Affairs Committee) authority to have the Secretary of the Navy say that machine tools shall be called a part of the cost when they are particularly for Government contracts. So, between his bill and the $6,000,000, I think we can solve it."

The two companies which refused to do business with the Navy on armor plate under the terms of the Vinson-Trammell Act limiting their profits to 8 percent were United States Steel and Midvale.

These companies contended that Treasury regulations under the act allowed too little leeway in charging depreciation of machinery against taxes. Admiral Furlong offered to buy the machinery, but that wouldn't do, because, as another Navy official testified, the companies wanted to be free to use the machinery in any way they saw fit, after production for defense was completed.

WHAT THE COMPANIES WANT

What it came down to was this:

These two companies—and remember there are only three firms making armor plate—wanted to charge the entire cost of plant expansion to the Government, not over a period of 10 to 20 years through allowances for depreciation but in one chunk; that is, against the cost of any given contract. In addition, they wanted to make use of the machinery in any way that might be profitable later on.

Armor plate and ordnance are the principal components of ships of the line. Armor plate, ordnance, planes, and plane engines are the four principal defense requirements of the United States. Delay on delivery of any one of those items constitutes a threat to the safety of the country.

Has there been delay on armor plate?

J. B. Woodward, of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., answered that for the House subcommittee. His reply was a grim one, for he said that the aircraft carrier Hornet must be launched without its armor plate because of delayed delivery.

The testimony:

"The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have had experience with delay on the Hornet.

"Mr. WOODWARD. The armor has not been delivered yet, but the schedule is such that we shall be obliged to launch the ship without its side-belt armor, I am afraid.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then the Bureau of Ordnance has not been able to keep up with your progress as to requirements of armament?

"Mr. WOODWARD. Not on the Hornet.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether the delay of the armor for the Hornet is due to inability to obtain it from the steel companies or is it due to the tests made by the Bureau?

"Mr. WOODWARD. No; to the best of my knowledge it is a question of the capacity of the armor manufacturers and perhaps a matter of priority as to which vessels get armor first."

HARMFUL TO PUBLIC MORALE

If the testimony of Admiral Furlong and Mr. Woodward and of others who have appeared before various congressional committees in recent weeks simply meant that companies supplying defense equipment intended to make a lot of money out of it, there might not be much to worry about—except taxes.

But it means two things even more important—delay in procurement of vitally essential supplies, and potential break-down of morale among citizens generally.

Senator JOSH LEE, of Oklahoma, in bringing to the attention of the Senate several days ago that Irving S. Olds, president of U. S. Steel, had said his company was delaying purchase of armor-plate machinery until proper tax legislation was passed, declared:

"If a soldier in the trenches should take the same attitude that has been taken by Mr. Olds—that is to say that he would not advance until his pay was raised—he would be court-martialed. But no soldier is going to take such an unpatriotic attitude as that."

As the story of the fall of France unfolds, we learn of profit-patriotism holding up essential war production, of cynical citizenry which accepted the Hitler charge that the war was intended to fatten the pocketbooks of munitions makers. Now Hitler is leveling that charge at British industry in an effort to break down British morale.

If Hitler heads this way, we will certainly hear that story. And there is very real danger that we now are laying a foundation for wide acceptance of it.

Centralization of Political Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a very notable address delivered by C. Wayland Brooks, Republican nominee for the United States Senate, delivered over the Mutual Broadcasting System network on July 21, 1940, in the course of the program sponsored by The American Forum of the Air, as follows:

We have confused the inconceivable with the impossible.

Because of our upbringing, we have thought in terms of faith and good will and refused to face the power of power alone.

Power is driving free expression and democratic processes from the world. Modern, mechanized, motorized, monstrous, military power is subduing the free people of Europe, while the monstrous concentration and centralization of political power in America is threatening, in the words of Wendell Willkie, "the last strong foothold of a free democracy."

It was inconceivable that the free states of Europe would fall in scheduled time under the monstrous heel of military aggression. It was inconceivable, and therefore we thought it impossible, but it is now an accomplished fact.

It was inconceivable that a Chief Executive of our free country would use the power entrusted to him to dictate not only his own renomination for a third term but also absolutely dictate the nomination of a hand-picked running mate to the exclusion of all other aspirants. It was inconceivable, and therefore it was thought impossible, but it is now an accomplished fact.

The American people who listened to the Democratic Convention on the radio know it, and no one knows it better than Vice President John Garner, Jim Farley, Speaker Bankhead, Paul McNutt, and the distinguished majority leader of the House who sits at this table, the Honorable Sam Rayburn, of Texas.

The contrast of the two conventions gives us a clear picture of our problem.

The Democratic Convention was held in the city of Chicago, a city under the domination of one of the most vicious political machines in the Nation—the Kelly-Nash machine—which delivered the 58 votes of Illinois to the will of one man. The convention was under the domination of members of the Cabinet and appointees headed by Secretary Hopkins, Secretary Ickes, and Attorney General Jackson, and assisted by many others, including the able Solicitor General Francis Biddle, who sits at this table tonight.

With the presence, power, and direction of these law-enforcing agents and the members of the Cabinet who have the power of expending billions of public money, no other candidates could show even signs of strength or possibility of selection. This was shown clearly when the name of the senior Senator from Illinois, SCOTT LUCAS, was placed in nomination for Vice President. Senator LUCAS immediately addressed the convention, saying: "Had this been a free and open convention, I would not have hesitated to make the race." He also stated earlier that the powers controlling the convention had made a survey which showed that they had enough votes to nominate for the Vice Presidency the man named by the Chief Executive. This survey included the votes of the notorious political machines throughout the country—55 votes in Illinois controlled by the Kelly-Nash machine, the solid 32 votes in New Jersey controlled by Hague, 22 votes in Tennessee controlled by Crump, and 68 in Pennsylvania controlled by Senator GUFFEY.

Further proof of domination was shown when the convention cheered the nominating speech for Mr. Paul McNutt for Vice President, only to hear McNutt, another Federal appointee, immediately rise to state: "He [meaning the President] is my Commander in Chief. I follow his wishes, and I am here to support his choice for Vice President of the United States."

All this, remember, in the face of the boos from delegates who resented the complete dictation and domination.

Contrast this domination and control with the complete freedom of the Republican Convention in Philadelphia.

The Republican Convention was a complete reverse. They freely selected an appealing, courageous, dynamic, liberal-minded product of the American system—a son of Indiana, a product of her public schools, a successful lawyer, farmer, industrial leader, and a great student of government—Wendell Willkie—as their candidate for President. He had no political power or domination to enforce his selection. His cause was directed by the young, liberal, aggressive element of the Republican Party who flocked to his support once Willkie's straightforward American views became known.

These young men consisted of young Republican Governors, Members of Congress, and so forth, who had been elected by the people in the various States against the money and landslides of the New Deal in the last few years. These young leaders included Governor Stassen of Minnesota, Governor Carr of Colorado, Governor Baldwin of Connecticut, Representative Halleck of Indiana, and Representative Bruce Barton of New York. Their efforts were led and coordinated by the youngest member of the Republican National Committee, Samuel F. Pryor, of Connecticut. They and Wendell Willkie were symbolic of a new voice and new leadership of the Republican Party. These young progressive leaders were expressing the demand of their States and the Nation for a champion who believed in and would defend and protect both the American form of government and the equally essential American system of private enterprise, a champion who would provide us with the necessary mechanized armed defense, bring about economic recovery, and continue our free Government so essential to the protection of our shores and our continued liberty.

Willkie's opposition to the abuses of the past and his knowledge of the needs of the present and the future produced a groundswell of support throughout the entire Nation. The delegates began to sense this widespread demand and nominated Wendell Willkie as their candidate for President. These same young men were quickly joined by the Republican Senators and Congressmen in advocating the selection of that able legislator and champion of agriculture in America, Senator CHARLES MCNARY. Like Willkie, MCNARY was the free choice of the delegates, and the Republican Party presents them as the only possible protection against the encroaching military power of Europe and the encroaching political power in America.

Poll Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

A LETTER FROM A POLL-TAX STATE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD a letter from a resident of one of the poll-tax States. This person is one of the ten and one-half millions of persons that are unable to vote in eight of our States because a dollars and cents value is placed on the privilege of voting for those who represent us in high places. I hope after reading this lady's appeal for help, which can only come from the outside, that most of my colleagues will sign discharge petition No. 34 on the Speaker's desk and thus emancipate these persons that have these restrictions placed on them by provisions in their State constitutions.

The letter follows:

ROGERS, ARK., July 27, 1940.

Representative LEE E. GEYER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GEYER: You are presenting a bill in Congress to outlaw poll taxes.

I sincerely hope the bill will be passed. It is an outrage for a free country to allow such a law to exist. I have lived in Arkansas for 7 years and have not voted because of the poll tax. There are thousands of others. The law in this State is tied up to personal taxes and the poll tax will not be accepted without the personal tax assessment. The personal tax cannot be paid without the poll tax. No one is allowed to vote even on school elections without a poll-tax receipt. I pay the regular school levy with my real-estate taxes but they will not allow me to vote for school director. I missed out on the national election 4 years ago. I hope the law will be repealed in time for us to vote in November, if not at the primaries.

Wishing you success in getting your bill passed, I am,

Very truly yours,

A New Deal in Cabbage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, two of the counties in my district are great producers of cabbage. We have shipped, over a period of years, thousands of tons of this very necessary article of food. It has been the source of a considerable income to the cabbage producers of Racine and Kenosha Counties, Wis. One of the products from cabbage is sauerkraut and we have several plants which produce this popular article of food. I desire to extend my remarks by printing a dispatch from Racine by Thornton Smith, correspondent with the Chicago Tribune, in the Tribune, as follows:

Along the lake shore in Racine and Kenosha Counties are acre after acre of lush cabbage fields that place these counties among the largest cabbage producers in the United States. But in the midst of this vast bounty stands a sight that provoked cabbage growers to a speechless indignation. There, being unloaded on a railroad siding, is a car of Virginia cabbage imported by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation for families on relief.

The cabbage producers approve of persons on relief, as well as everyone else, eating lots of cabbage, but when they recovered their breath they protested against the New Deal hauling cabbage 700 miles into the heart of what they regard as the best cabbage-growing territory in the country.

RANKS SECOND IN OUTPUT

Wisconsin is second only to New York in total cabbage production. The soil in this region is said to be ideal for its growth. Farmers have been harvesting the early cabbage for the last week, and the harvesting will continue for the next 2 months.

The importation of Virginia cabbage is irritating to the farmers, but they are willing to dismiss it as just one more strange manifestation of the New Deal if the Government will confine itself to giving cabbage to the needy and not interfere with the ordinary commercial practices of cabbage marketing, Wesley E. Hansche, one of the biggest cabbage raisers, said today.

"What provokes us most," said Hansche, "is to learn that a Government agency is again meddling with the natural supply and demand that establishes a market. Two years ago we experienced an ordeal through which no farmer cares to go again—a huge crop, with the F. S. C. C. stepping in and buying cabbage."

PRICE INCREASE THWARTED

In that case, Hansche explained, the F. S. C. C. set a price of $4 a ton for cabbage. The price stood pegged at that figure, he said, despite the fact that market conditions later developed which would have warranted an increase of 50 percent in the price.

In addition, Hansche said, the Government compelled the farmers to form a cooperative to sell cabbage to the Government agency. He said the F. S. C. C. also set up only two or three loading stations, forcing some farmers to haul as far as 15 or 20 miles, and limited the purchase to 5 or 6 tons a day per farmer instead of the usual 18 tons.

Present market conditions, Hansche continued, are similar to those of 2 years ago, and producers fear the Government is going to step in again and repeat its experiment.

He said current Chicago cabbage quotations are around $10 a ton, which is a satisfactory price, but that the demand has not yet reached the Wisconsin market.

Fear of Government interference, he said, is keeping sauer-kraut packers, who are big-volume cabbage buyers, from coming into the market at the natural time. "They are willing to pay $5 or $6 a ton now for good cabbage," he said, "but they feel the F. S. C. C. may come in and peg a price around $4, which would make them look like 'chumps.'"

Claim of Thomas A. Madsen for Disability Compensation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I am asking for permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter I received from Mrs. Thomas A. Madsen of Phelps, Wis., who is the wife of a disabled World War veteran. He appealed to the Veterans' Administration for disability compensation, which was denied him. I personally represented him before the Veterans' Administration with what I thought was ample proof that his present disability is the direct result of his service overseas. This letter is typical of a great many others which I, and I am sure many of my colleagues, receive. I know that Mrs. Madsen does not overstate the facts and I believe it is a shame that the burden of proof of service-connected disability should be placed upon a man who served this country during the World War. I am sure this letter will be of interest to most Members and I hope that before too long Congress will recognize the responsibility and the debt we owe to the boys who defended us in 1917 and 1918. While I am in favor of and have voted for every measure to strengthen our national defenses, I do not believe that we should neglect to do our duty in providing at least enough income for disabled World War veterans so that they will not have to become objects of public or private charity.

I am herewith including the letter as it was written to me by the wife of a veteran, who I feel has not been treated fairly:

I am taking this method of voicing my opinion in regard to the decision made by the Board of Appeals on C–2,791,802, for Thomas A. Madsen.

To begin with the verdict says that the claimant had no physical defect except for one tooth missing. The War Department also says they have no record of him receiving medical treatment or being absent because of illness. We thought it was for these very reasons that the affidavits were wanted. The claimant had two of them from buddies who knew these things to be facts regardless of whether the War Department has any record of it or not.

It was only natural that the veteran did not complain of any ailments when discharged. His main thought then was to get away from the Army, where he thought usual routine would straighten everything out. That the Army doctors found nothing wrong then is not to be wondered at, when they could find nothing wrong the winter of 1939. At that time the claimant was in the hospital for 9 weeks under their observation. He vomited everything he ate and was in severe pain most of the time. It seems it should have been easy to diagnose his trouble then, being he had been operated on for a perforated ulcer just a few months before and the vomiting showed that the food could not pass through. He came back from the hospital on a Sunday morning and on the following Wednesday we took him to the hospital at Rhinelander. Dr. Bump said that this persistent vomiting showed that the opening was closed and that an operation was necessary. But the claimant was in such a weakened condition after weeks of vomiting that he first had to be built up with extract of liver, blood transfusions, and glucose.

When the operation was performed they found the opening closed, and adhesions, also a much enlarged appendix. At the vet's hospital he was told he did not need an operation and that he should go home and diet.

Now we have several affidavits showing that the claimant was sick the first summer he was home from the Army and that he had to refrain from eating different things that disagreed with him. It is to be regretted that the doctors consulted at that time are dead. However, it is not to be expected that they could prove he had ulcers either, any more than the Army doctors could. When urged to go back to a Government hospital for care, he would say, "I can take the salts cure at home as well."

According to the findings at Wood, I notice everything was recorded as moderate or mild. Dr. Bump found him in a critical condition when he arrived at the Rhinelander hospital only 3 days later, and yet he had been much worse part of the time at Wood.

As for Dr. Finney not remembering him, that is very probable, as he had a very large practice. When he called there for an affidavit the office girl informed us that he had destroyed all old records. I am sure, had the claimant been admitted to see him, he would have remembered him.

Besides all this, there are records to prove that his health was poor the first summer he was home from the Army. Why were we asked to furnish these, when they cannot do anything for him simply because the War Department failed to record his hospitalization and absence from duty because of illness. The affidavits from his employers showing how he would lose time because of sickness, even the first summer he was back, should prove that his condition was brought on by war conditions. All knew him to be in good health before.

It does not seem possible that a few men, constituting the board of veterans' appeals, should be given sole power to say the claim is disallowed, when there are enough affidavits to prove the claimant's condition before and after his entry into the service. I am sure President Roosevelt, the Senators, and Representatives could see that the veteran in this case has ample proof to show that his disability was caused by service. They would also know that the veteran could have done as other "gold diggers" did. He could have had the Government support him all these years. Now that he has borne all this suffering in silence and paddled his own canoe until he is down and out, he is denied help. Should he be able to reach the average span of three score years and ten, the amount would now be small in comparison to what it would have been had he come back 21 years ago.

It does not seem fair to me that a man who has tried to do his best not to be an encumbrance to the Government should be denied help when he needs it.

Isn't there an avenue open to a veteran who has not been given a square deal, whereby he can get enough for his family and himself to have a decent living? Just because the claimant served his country in a cruel war overseas, he had to lose his health, and he and his family have had to do without many things that he and they should be entitled to, and could have had, had not he been disabled.

How well I remember while he was away at war, getting the insignificant sum of $1 a day, our friends and neighbors were working for ten and fifteen dollars a day. Their children can go ahead and have a decent education, and most of all those daddies have enjoyed good health. It appears to me, and I know I am voicing the opinion of thousands of others whose records were not properly kept when I say that the least the Government can or should do is to give the soldier and his family a decent living when he has come to the end of the rope. Isn't there anything that can be done for him and for the wife and children? Judging by the thousands of soldiers who pass away each year, whose pensions are dropped there should be a little to bestow on other unfortunates.

The veteran gave his all and what do many of them get in return?

Sincerely,

Mrs. THOS. A. MADSEN.

While Congressmen Debate Conscription Dixie Farm Youths Enlist by Thousands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 8, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE GREENVILLE (S. C.) NEWS

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Greenville News, of Greenville, S. C.:

WHILE CONGRESSMEN DEBATE CONSCRIPTION DIXIE FARM YOUTHS ENLIST BY THOUSANDS

ATLANTA, August 6.—While Congress debates conscription, a record-breaking flood of volunteers from the deep South is giving the present fighting force of the United States a strong southern accent.

The Fourth Corps Area, embracing all the "Confederate States" except Virginia, Texas, and Arkansas, enrolled 2,033 volunteers in 1 week last month—a record for the United States in peacetime and a third of the national total.

Army reports showed that in the same period industrial New England, the First Corps Area, had 175 enlistments and the Second Corps Area, which includes populous New York and New Jersey, had 275.

Since the current recruiting campaign started May 16, enlistments in the Fourth Corps Area have averaged 1,500 a week, compared to 200 to 300 in New England and the New York area.

Next to the Fourth Corps Area, most volunteers have come from the Eighth Corps Area, composed of Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Arizona. The Fifth Corps Area of Kentucky, West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana is third.

A steady increase is shown in Fourth Corps Area enlistments. For the last half of May the figure was 2,050. For June it was 4,700, and for July it jumped to 6,750. Had all the nine corps areas contributed at this rate, the recruits for the 2½-month period would aggregate 121,500—a sizable part of the Army Congress debates raising by conscription.

The average southern volunteer is a farm youth 21 to 23 years old. Army officers say they make fine soldiers. An influx of Tennessee mountaineers has been noted. One Tennessee hamlet reported recently every able-bodied man of military age had enlisted.

Shall Organized Minorities Control the Destiny of America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall quote from a press that well expresses the actual thoughts of the owners and of its subscribers; a people and a press which reach deep in the pool of defamation to slander anyone who refuses to aid them in blindfolding the people. However, we have reached a point where truth shall rise in its mantle of justice to smite its enemies; for it is said the guilty fear the truth and a liar fears exposure. These people and their press fear both truth and exposure.

As a point of interest, I shall now quote and discuss three of many like articles printed in this press: The first from the American Jewish World of July 26, 1940—Minneapolis and St. Paul:

THORKELSON LICKED, SO PELLEY HAS TO LOOK FOR NEW "FUEHRER"

WASHINGTON (special).—Believe it or not, William Dudley Pelley, of Silver Shirt fame, is now seeking a successor to Congressman JACOB THORKELSON, of Montana, for "head man of the United States of America." Pelley had high hopes for THORKELSON to become the American "fuehrer" until Miss Jeanette Rankin entered the Republican congressional primaries in Montana and defeated THORKELSON in his first district. THORKELSON is anti-Semitic. One factor incident to his defeat by Miss Rankin is that he no longer will have the franking privilege, which permitted him to send without postage expense his anti-Semitic materials throughout the country.

Pelley now is reported looking for another prospect for his American "fuehrer."

What does it set forth?

First. The article expresses relief in my defeat for renomination to Congress.

Second. It attempts to smear me by using the name of a person entirely unconnected with me.

Third. Another attempt to defame me by printing what another person thinks, but about which I know nothing. This is presumptuous mind reading.

Fourth. The article states that I am anti-Semitic, and intimates that that is the reason for my defeat.

Fifth. The article expresses relief that I cannot mail information to the people under franking privilege.

Sixth. That my work and speeches are anti-Semitic.

Seventh. And other cowardly and obvious attempts to add more insult to injury.

The question may be asked, What justification can this press find for making these statements, and what purpose can it serve, except as a final attempt to maliciously libel and destroy my name and character? The press willfully engages in libel of me, knowing full well that none of the statements made can be substantiated or proven in any American gentile court.

What does this article reveal? (1) Elation and relief in my failure to be renominated in the Republican primaries. (2) It shows extreme intolerance and hatred, with little or no consideration for anyone except their own people and their own objectives. In other words, they commit the very act of which I am accused by them. This is a characteristic procedure of these people, which they use to protect themselves and confuse the gentile. They always label those they fear will tell the truth with their own shortcomings or crimes. In doing this, they hope to place those who might expose them on the defensive. This queer reasoning is evident in nearly all of the acts of the New Deal, and in much of the legislation which reaches the floor of the House.

Let me call your attention to a few of these incongruities: In 1933, when the bankers were called to Washington, the President said it was to correct a dangerous financial situation which was threatening the credit of this Nation, and to provide measures to protect the people. Were such measures provided? No. Measures were instead provided to protect and safeguard the bankers instead of the people, for banks in outlying districts were closed, obviously because they did not fit in with the plans promulgated at this meeting.

The reason given for passing the Gold Reserve Act was that it was a measure to protect the credit of the United States and the people; when the contrary is true, for our credit is now jeopardized and the people are entirely unprotected, as they have been deprived of gold as an investment and money security.

The reason given for plowing under crops and killing cattle was that such procedure would raise prices on these commodities and increase farm income; when nothing could be further from the truth, because it has reduced prices and decreased farm income.

Last fall, when the President insisted on repeal of the arms-embargo clause, it was to aid him in maintaining neutrality and in keeping this Nation out of war. What was the result? He has broken every principle of neutrality under the protection of the amended Neutrality Act, and actually alined this Nation in war on the side of Great Britain. Not satisfied with this, the refugee bill passed August 7, 1940, providing for the use of American ships and American personnel to carry and conduct transportation of these refugees from England to the United States. This act in itself is extremely dangerous, as one of the refugee ships might be sunk and so provide an excuse to request Congress to declare war. If not sunk by accident, who would deliberately sink one of our ships? Certainly, not a power that invites defeat by our entry into the war. Will it be a power that wants us to remain neutral? No.

Who are the people who want us to go to war? Who are the people who want the United States to sell a part of its fleet to Great Britain? They are the very same people who led us into the World War—which those who are interested in this subject may prove for themselves by reading past history. Why are not these refugees sent to Canada, for being much nearer to England and also being an English colony, makes it the logical place for them to go. There is no sound reason why we should accept every adult refugee, as we have done and are now doing. These people should be sent to some place in the British Empire and not to the United States. The people who agitate for war are not loyal Americans, or even good Americans, for if they were they would not aid to bring about an incident that might involve us in war; yes, a war in which our manpower will not be a decisive factor, but will instead leave us with thousands drowned in the Atlantic, maimed or killed on European battlefields, all in order to please some crackpot internationalists in our own administration.

The Reorganization Act of 1939 was said to be to coordinate and provide smoother operation for Federal departments and to reduce the administrative costs. What was the result? It has caused friction in the Federal departments and has increased administrative costs. As a matter of fact, it increased the Federal employees in the District of Columbia by 8,000 and throughout the United States by over 100,000. I could go on and name many similar instances, but the list would indeed be too long.

I shall now quote the second article, from the American Jewish Outlook, July 26, 1940:

THORKELSON LOSES IN MONTANA POLLING

By Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

HELENA, MONT., July 26.—The name of JACOB THORKELSON has apparently been sponged from the national political scene after a single term in which he became notorious for his Jew-hating utterances and the inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of tens of thousands of words of anti-Semitic literature.

THORKELSON was defeated by some 2,000 votes, by Miss Jeanette Rankin, first woman Representative, who returned to politics to oppose THORKELSON in the Republican primaries in Montana's First Congressional District. Miss Rankin's victory was surprising to many politicians. For many years she has not lived in Montana and only began her campaign a month ago. The first woman ever elected to Congress, she has been connected with peace and women's organizations here since 1919.

This article states that I have been "sponged from the national political scene." That may be true, but if I am to judge from communications I have received, I am in accord with the wishes of the patriotic Americans who have expressed approval of my stand in Congress.

I shall now quote the last article, from the Detroit Jewish Chronicle of July 26, 1940:

THORKELSON'S DEFEAT

Former Congresswoman Jeanette Rankin has defeated the incumbent, Dr. JACOB THORKELSON for the Republican nomination for the United States House of Representatives in the First Montana District.

This may mark the end of the career of another violent American anti-Semite. It is a remarkable tribute to the sense of fair play of American voters that they did not fall for the nonsense which has been broadcast for 2 years through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Congressman THORKELSON. Perhaps his defeat for renomination will serve as a warning to fellow bigots who have been encouraging him in Congress. His fellow travelers, especially the two gentlemen from Michigan and Wisconsin who always came to his aid, may learn soon that the spirit of the American people works contrary to the venom which foreign powers seek to spread in this country. THORKELSON permitted himself to be the mouthpiece of those who spread religious and racial hatred. He tried to do a job in Congress for Hitler and Coughlin. Apparently the American voter will not stand for such dissemination of intolerance.

THORKELSON has paid the price for being a spokesman for evil forces in Congress.

This article continues along the same lines as the other two, in that it gives a reason for my defeat. The author of this article goes even a little further than that, because he uses my defeat as a threat or warning. Let me quote his words:

Perhaps his defeat for renomination will serve as a warning to fellow bigots who have been encouraging him in Congress.

This statement is unjust, because the writer intimates that other Members of Congress are responsible for my acts when nothing could be further from the truth.

These articles reek with hatreds, venom, and intolerance; and exemplify in my opinion the low esteem in which the gentile is held by these people. None of these statements can be substantiated or proven by this press and no evidence can be produced by anybody to show that I have ever had any connection with subversive or un-American activities. As a matter of fact, it is these very activities that I have condemned, and in doing so have let myself open to attack from this defamatory press. This is only natural, because these people are self-acclaimed leaders of all revolutionary movements, as stated by Rabbi Judah L. Magnus, in 1919.

The fact is that in the 400,000 words I have written into the RECORD, no statements I have made on money, government, or subversive activities have been disproven by anyone. The criticism levied at me by this press comes because I have called attention to the real radical leaders of communism, statements which have been proven by various congressional investigating bodies, and by books published by the subversives themselves.

For me it has not been difficult to spot the Communists for they have been working under our very noses since Paul Warburg wrote the Federal Reserve Act in 1913, an act which made banking a monopoly and control of money and credit a private prerogative. I, of course, designate as subversives all anti-Americans, those who attempt to controvert or change the actual meaning of the Constitution and to use it to shield themselves, while they are engaged in sabotage of industries and the undermining of the Government. I also included those who have read into the document their own interpretations and who have been getting away with the sabotage of the Constitution for many, many years.

I for one have profound respect for that document as it was given to us by the founders of our country, and no one regrets more than I the many needless amendments and dangerous unconstitutional laws. The result of these errors are now evident as we race toward a totalitarian Government. In speaking in this manner I am, of course, speaking as one of the common people, and not as a lawyer or Member of Congress when I say the Constitution was intended to protect the people against usurpation of the people's rights by their own Government, against the politician and those who are engaged in depriving the people of the rights they reserve to themselves and their State—amendments 1, 2, and including 10.

I take the position that our Constitution is a document in which the people speak to Congress, not a document in which Congress speaks to the people, except where such powers are specifically given to Congress by the Constitution as in article I, sections 8, 9, and 10.

The question which may now be asked is: Is the position that I have taken in regard to the Constitution correct? If it is, then it is obvious that the people have lost their rights one by one and their liberties little by little as soon as the eleventh amendment was adopted and the first restrictive law was passed by Congress. If Congress continues to legislate as it has in the past, the people will find themselves under greater and greater restrictions, and when the final power has been transferred from Congress to the President this Nation will be under a real military dictatorship. We are, as a matter of fact, just about in that position now. It should be clear that if the people speak to the Government, if the people speak to the Congress in the Constitution, legislative procedure has been in reverse for a long time.

If the Constitution is a code or laws or rules in which the people delegate certain specific powers to the legislative, executive, and the judiciary branches of the Government, what right has any of the three branches to liberalize or to widen the meaning of such delegated power? It should be obvious that liberal interpretation or wider construction of the meaning in this case will give greater and greater power to the President, as it has already done, with the ultimate loss of all rights of the people and of Congress itself.

No one can deny that it is the people who speak in the preamble of the Constitution, and that the same people delegate the powers to Congress and to the other two branches of the Government. No one can deny that it is the people who speak in their own behalf and for their own protection in the Bill of Rights, and who have reserved all rights not specifically given to the Government to the State and to themselves—amendments 9 and 10.

With this in mind, what right have we members of Congress to restrict or deprive the people of the constitutional rights by legislation? What right have we to jeopardize the national credit by injudicious borrowing and what right have we to levy excessive taxes that might bring about failure or bankruptcy to business?

As a Member of the Seventy-sixth Congress, I introduced a resolution to repeal the seventeenth amendment, an act for which I have been criticized. However, in reply to my critics, let me say, if the seventeenth amendment is not repealed, nothing can prevent the establishment of a dictatorship in this grand old Republic of ours. History will bear me out in this statement, and as a matter of fact has proven the truth of it in the regimentation that we have today. Repeal of the seventeenth amendment will restore balance in the Government, a condition which does not exist at the present time, and we will again become a sound and strong Government, for we will have—

(a) State representation in the Senate of the United States.

(b) Return of sovereign rights to the State.

(c) The right of business to operate as it should under State laws.

(d) The right of labor to regulate working conditions suitable to labor within the State.

(e) Business and labor would be free from Federal snooping, meddling, prosecution, and persecution; conditions now prevailing.

(f) The State would by its representation in the Senate be able with other States to direct the Federal Government in its foreign relations, for the protection of the State and for the security of the United States.

These are a few of the powers which the State and the people have lost and this loss is in reality the cause of the beastly condition in which we find ourselves today.

In 1939 I introduced an amendment to the Constitution, to delete the words in article I, section 8, paragraph 3, "and with the Indian Tribes." Were this amendment adopted the Indian Bureau could be abolished, at a considerable saving to the taxpayers. In addition to that it would leave the Indians free to become self-supporting and full-fledged citizens of their own country.

On February 22 and 27, 1939, I proposed that we prepare our national defenses by fortifying the Philippines and the island of Guam. Had we prepared these defenses, or had we fortified these islands, our west coast would have been reasonably secure from attack. These fortified colonies would also provide protection for Alaska and for the salmon fisheries in Bristol Bay. I also suggested that the Philippine Islands be retained as a commercial outpost to aid our exports to the Orient. These islands are not only valuable as a point for distribution of commerce to India, China, and the South Sea Islands, but would, if developed, furnish considerable employment to the natives and to our own people. In time of war, we could always trade with our own colonies, which would in addition to that, provide bases of supply and repair for our Navy and merchant marine.

I am opposed to the manner in which the merchant marine is operated at this time, for it is my firm belief that this transportation should be owned and controlled by private industry, with Government subsidies reduced to a minimum.

I opposed the lifting of the arms embargo because I knew and stated that repeal of the embargo clause was to provide a legal excuse and protection for the President to render all military aid necessary to England, and the truth of that statement is amply verified today.

I have suggested liquidation of the T. V. A., because it is nothing but a source of political graft. I am not opposed to the building of dams, but there is a limit to this construction. However, to construct a series of dams within a State, and then enact legislation to compensate the States for taxes lost, is not in my opinion sound business. We have gone far afield in this construction on money borrowed from the international bankers, and upon which we pay interest to them.

I have proposed that we place a sufficient tariff on all farm imports, to protect our own farmers and allow them to raise full crops without restriction, so that they may provide our own people with a full supply of food in times of peace, and sufficient for war emergencies.

I have proposed that Congress liquidate and close all Federal corporations now operating in competition with private industry. This is not only sound, but private operation of business and industry is a right which the people reserved to themselves in the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution.

I have proposed protective tariffs on all manufactured imported articles, in order to help our own industries to provide employment for our idle people. I also suggested a simple plan for retirement pension, to do away with the present Social Security Act, which is nothing but a political football and convenience for whichever party is in power. I have also opposed unemployment insurance, because it places a premium on idleness, when we should place a premium on employment. We can do this by placing a protective tariff on all competitive imports.

I have condemned the employment of aliens in our Government, and particularly the aliens who are recent arrivals in this country. With me it is Americans first, and the aliens last. I have opposed and exposed the international monetary control and the manner in which the American people are being defrauded by this group of money changers. The time will come when these defrauders must be deprived of their power, for it is, as I have said, greater than the Government itself. It is this control of money, which has given these international racketeers the monetary power to buy and control the industries of this Nation, and to provide a healthier industrial condition we must allow smaller operators freedom from coercion by monetary groups.

As I have already said, I have also proposed that we prepare our national defenses and at one time suggested that we construct another canal through Nicaragua, to be used for military purposes in case of war, and for commercial purposes with the Panama Canal in time of peace.

I have opposed and exposed radicalism, syndicalism, socialism, and communism. I have even gone so far as to say that under the Constitution, Congress should not tolerate the Communist Party in the United States. Our trouble will come from communism and from the proponents of this vicious doctrine. Communism has destroyed Europe and will destroy the United States if we do not institute the most drastic measures to stop this movement now. It is this exposé which has provided ammunition for the minority press—for many of these radicals, as the record will show, come from this organized minority party. This should be clear to everyone as they publish in their own books the manner or the procedure which is employed in the sabotage of our industries and the destruction of our Government.

These are a few of the principles for which I have stood as a Member of Congress. The last sentence in the article published by the Detroit Jewish Chronicle makes this assertion:

> Thorkelson has paid the price for being a spokesman for evil forces in Congress.

I can readily understand the statement made by this press, for constitutional government and sanity is an evil omen for them. However, I leave my case in the hands of the American people, and if anyone can find the slightest criticism of the principles which I have supported, I should like to hear such criticism from the American people and not from an alien-minded organized minority.

Boycott, Why Not?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, boycott is an old Asiatic weapon employed by the internationalist to maintain himself in power and to destroy all those who challenge his control. Intrigue, deception, and gentile stupid greed gave the internationalist control of gold. This control has given him the power to destroy nations, business, and people by boycott or withdrawal and denial of gold money and credit. It is this power—that is, the control of international gold money and credit—which the international bankers may lose if Germany wins, and it is apparently to restore this international control of gold and the perpetuation of their power that interested leaders in our own administration are depleting our defenses by giving aid to England.

This war, therefore, is a war fought by the gentile, in which he sacrifices his life to perpetuate international control of gold; a war in which the gentile enslaves his own people in the service of those who wield control of gold money and credit; a war for Mammon and "that detested tribe whose god is gold and savior is a bribe." Yes; a war in which should we become involved, we lose the rights and liberties which we reserved to ourselves in the Constitution of the United States.

We are, in submitting to private control of money, a property which belongs to the people, jeopardizing the life of our Republic and our national security. In allowing private, monopolistic control of gold and money we are boycotting or denying ourselves and our posterity the constitutional rights which we should have held inviolate to pass on as they were given to us by the founders of our country.

These are a few examples showing the destructive power of boycott as now wielded by the internationalists, and in which we unfortunately acquiesce. Yes; to which the gentile submits, because he is too tolerant and indifferent to his own welfare, an apathetic mental state in which he, failing to keep the Government clean, allows minority usurpation of majority rights. We are, therefore, in a disgraceful retreat before a minority upon which we bestow greater and greater power, as we transfer by legislation to the President and this minority, congressional powers which the people have delegated to Congress in the Constitution of the United States.

It was no doubt the power of boycott and its wide destructive application that Maurice Samuel had in mind when he wrote:

> We cannot assimilate: It is so humiliating to us that we become contemptible in submitting to the process; it is so exasperating to you that, even if we were willing to submit, it would avail us nothing. A century of partial tolerance gave us Jews access to your world. In that period the great attempt was made, by advance guards of reconciliation, to bring our two worlds together. It was a century of failure. Our Jewish radicals are beginning to understand it dimly. • • •

We Jews, we, the destroyers, will remain the destroyers forever. Nothing that you will do will meet our needs and demands. We will forever destroy because we need a world of our own, a God-world, which it is not in your nature to build. Beyond all temporary alliances with this or that faction lies the ultimate split in nature and destiny, the enmity between the game and God. But those of us who fail to understand that truth will always be found in alliances with your rebellious factions, until disillusionment comes. The wretched fate which scattered us through your midst has thrust this unwelcome role upon us. Wherever the Jew is found he is a problem, a source of unhappiness to himself and to those around him. Ever since he has been scattered in your midst he has had to maintain a continuous struggle for the conservation of his identity.

And when Justice Brandeis wrote:

Let us all recognize that we Jews are a distinct nationality, of which every Jew, whatever his country, his station, or shade of belief is necessarily a member. * * * Organize, organize, organize—until every Jew in America must stand up and be counted—counted with us—or prove himself wittingly or unwittingly, of the few who are against their own people.—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 16, 1940.

These are not my words. They are the words of Mr. Samuel, a prominent Jew, writing about his own people. Is it true? Yes; it is true, because their own law, the Talmud, corroborates his statements and also those of Justice Brandeis.

What does he, Mr. Samuel, say? He says, "We Jews, we the destroyers, will destroy forever." How is it done? It is done, as Justice Brandeis says, by "organizing" his people into a select unit to boycott and destroy, no matter how, anything and everything owned or operated by what the Talmud designates as "Goy, Goyim, or Cuthean," or, to be plain, the gentile, a Talmudian expression of contempt for us.

The American businessman should be interested in boycott, for it is that weapon which is being used to destroy him. It is a weapon I know something about, as it is now being used against a business in which I hold stock. The members of this minority who have set up boycott are not satisfied to be alone, but employ pressure on newspapers and other business to join them in this organized destruction. The gentiles who join them in this stupid act evidently do not realize that they give them aid in destroying an industry which has for over 10 years employed a number of people at union wages, and, in addition, has expended thousands of dollars in the community. This money, of course, has in turn been spent to a large extent with all merchants. I say all merchants, when in reality there are only two gentile dry-goods stores left in the town. In spite of this, the American merchants are still asleep.

Why this boycott? According to their own statement, to break me. So history repeats itself. It is organized minorities and American dupes against a gentile; a procedure in which they do not hesitate to destroy business and send people now working back to the ranks of the unemployed. All of this, in spite of the fact that this particular business has never paid the stockholders one cent and is kept in operation only in hopes of a better day ahead.

This organized minority wants the United States and South America to fight their self-designated enemy. They want the people here to destroy Colonel Lindbergh because he has an opinion of his own. They have employed their own press, their controlled national press and hired defamers, to discredit American patriots because they do not want them to say that we should return to sanity and sound constitutional government. They want chaos, destruction, and, more than all, a world state. To obtain this, they expect the Christian gentiles to crusade for them, and that is clearly evident, as we now know, for have they not claimed military exemption for themselves?

Let me warn you American patriots that you are aiding in your own defeat. Has not the gentile lost nearly all of his business to these organized destroyers? Has he not experienced depreciation in real estate and profitable apartment houses when an unknown new owner moves undesirable tenants in the adjoining house, and even in the same city block? Has he not, when indebted, had the bank foreclose on his business and sell it to his competitor? Has not the gentile discovered that these despicable competitors will undersell him or sell at cost until he is forced out of business and his competitor in full control? How is it done? It is accomplished by queer discounts to those favored by certain manufacturers and wholesale houses. It is organized minority boycott, as so clearly stated by Mr. Samuel and Justice Brandeis in their own books.

Have not a few gentile airplane manufacturers failed to get Government contracts until they accepted a loan from a designated bank; a loan which entailed transfer of stock to the brokers who negotiated the loan? Is not all of this organized destruction or boycott of business owned by gentiles? The gentiles take no issue with individuals of this minority, but object to their principles instead, the very principles which have kept them "hot footing" it all over the earth for thousands of years, accursed and despised wanderers.

The American people are due for a rude awakening, because they have been kicked out of business and will, if Congress does not take charge, lose this Government to the international Communists. This is obvious in the appointments of Sidney Hillman and Leon Henderson on the National Defense Advisory Commission, in charge of employment and price stabilization, respectively. It is generally accepted that Sidney Hillman is a radical and alleged Communist, and in his position on the National Defense Advisory Commission in charge of employment, can anyone imagine for one moment that he will not employ those with ideals similar to his own in strategic positions? Certainly not, because that is his record. Can anyone imagine for one moment that this was not known when he was appointed? Certainly not, for that was the purpose of his appointment. To determine the ultimate result it is only necessary to review history; for the same thing is liable to happen here as occurred in Russia 23 years ago, when native Russians were liquidated as the Communist Internationalists took charge of Russia.

It was an organized minority that was behind the drafting of the Federal Reserve Act. It was an organized minority which promoted gambling in stocks in 1928, 1929, and 1930, and it was the same minority that was instrumental in the stock-market crash which broke our banks and many, many of our own people, who foolishly tried to get rich overnight. It was the same minority which organized bank corporations and bank chains, in order to boycott independent banks, which had always been an aid to their own community. It was the same organized minority which was instrumental in defeating Hoover, because they had found a person more amenable to their organized destruction of the Government and boycott of the American people. It is this organized and monopolistic control of the press that has kept the people in ignorance of these facts and many other fraudulent transactions. It is this choking of the press and denial of free speech and authentic information in which the gentile himself aids when he assists in retiring those public officials, who have risked all to inform the American people of what is happening to this Nation.

It should therefore be clearly evident that the American people defeat themselves when they aid this organized minority in eliminating those from public life who have told the truth. The best evidence that these patriots are telling the truth is in the effort made by this organized minority in their own and in their controlled national press to descry and discredit those few who have had the courage to expose their fraud and deception. It should be clearly obvious, even to the most gullible and tolerant, that the communistic press, their own press, the controlled national press, and hired defamers, should not be needed to confound, disprove, or discredit statements made by a liar; for such statements, like houses of cards, fall by themselves. Therefore it should be obvious that when the whole national press, radio, and hired defamers are employed to discredit one man, it is not because he is prevaricating but it is because they fear the truth he is telling.

It should now be clear to all patriotic Americans that following and believing this alien-minded and organized minority can only lead to disintegration and chaos, as these self-admitted destroyers scuttle the Constitution, our noble ship of state. It is time for the patriots of America to awaken when organized minorities boycott the Constitution of the United States and those who speak in support of that wonderful document. If the people of America continue to sleep, it will without doubt terminate in the sleep of death.

BOYCOTT AND HATE

When we allowed the Federal Reserve banks, a privately owned monopoly, to control money and credit, we gave them the power that made our people poor and the Federal Reserve bankers rich; the people slaves and the bankers our masters. In giving these private bankers and their cohorts full control of money and credit we made it possible for them to buy and dominate our industries and the power to destroy small competitors. In other words, we made it possible for the money changers to boycott industry, business, and the people by the simple expedient of foreclosure of credit or call of loans.

Under the pre-1933 set-up, when the dollar represented 25.8 grains of gold, the people were secured by the gold held in the Treasury of the United States. Today, no money is secured by gold and no bills larger than $5 are payable in silver. This makes our commodity or managed money worthless. The money changers rightly estimated that a $5 bill would on the average be the highest denomination that the average gentile American would have in his possession, and that he, in seeing that the $1 and $5 bills were payable in silver, would believe that all the currency was secured by this metal. It was no doubt a trick employed by the money changers to deceive or fool a tolerant people. However, some day the Americans will see and understand this fraud and deception perpetrated by the money changers, and when they do, the money changers will be foiled, as we, the people, become wise to their rackets, trickery, and intrigue. They will then be driven out of their temple, as we set the Treasury gold up as security for the American people and for the security of American posterity.

The American people have been working under a handicap or boycott, ever since Alexander Hamilton placed our Federal Treasury under the supervision of the Bank of England, and left our money in international control. During these many years, the international money changers have controlled and used the people's bank deposits, or national currency, as their own private capital, to buy and to bribe themselves into power with free and unrestricted use of the people's deposit money. These international Shylocks first bought control of the press, in order to prevent the people from discovering how this alien horde would conquer America. The ownership and control of the press, and as a matter of fact, all publicity is important to them, because they can hoodwink the people and distort facts to suit themselves as they lead the American people into war and financial enslavement. To make it more real, they wave the Bill of Rights and shout, "Free press and free speech must be preserved!" I ask, for whom—for us? No, certainly not, they mean free speech for themselves and their people. Mr. Samuel is quoted as saying: "We will remain destroyers forever," and Justice Brandeis, when he served as Justice of the Supreme Court, advised his people to "organize, organize, and organize." For what? To do the very thing they now have done, that is, taking possession of the United States by the use of gold, banking, press, radio, cinema, private industries, war industries, gambling rackets, and in addition to that, an attempt to control both political parties, in order to retain control of courts for protection when they run afoul of the law.

THE PRESS

Why believe a people who, according to their own law, the Talmud, hold the gentiles in contempt? Have not the American people and Congress, in believing the controlled press, gone far afield from constitutional government? Why not look around and determine for yourselves, who is right and who is wrong? Remember, more mistakes are made by not seeing than by not knowing, and that none is so blind as he who will not see.

THE CINEMA

Why place credence in a picture, which reflects nothing on the screen except that which its producer wants you to see, so that he can mold your opinion so that you will become a medium for dissemination of his propaganda? Why not use common sense? Why not try to identify the producer and his object in exhibition of the picture? Most pictures, while they may be works of art, are in reality a most insidious and evil form of propaganda, to waylay the unwary and overtolerant people.

The leaders of this organized minority want this Nation to go to war, and to get your help they will in the future use the press, the cinema, and the radio, to misrepresent and obscure the real cause for this war, hoping in such deception to obtain your aid and plunge this Nation into the conflict and mass murder of Christian people.

THE RADIO

Why believe a wailer who exudes nothing but obnoxious effluvia, as he exhales his diatribes over the air to please employers as he is himself? Why not turn off the radio? Why not retaliate by boycotting the wares he is advertising, as he is doing to those he decries and defames, as he engages in mud slinging and character assassination? The strange part is that these people, these trained and natural defamers, are the first to shout: "I am being persecuted. Pass a law to protect me." And whether you believe it or not, like fools we feel sorry for these revilers, whose sordid principles plumb the depths of indecency.

BOYCOTT, HATE, AND WAR

When certain governments declared themselves off the gold standard, they deprived their people of sound money and gave the international bankers a power greater than the government itself. These governments, by giving the international bankers full control of gold, stabbed the Christian civilization in the back, as they bestowed upon these money changers the power of boycott and the power to plunge nations into war.

We helped in this treasonable act and betrayal of our own people, when in 1934 we passed the Gold Reserve Act. Where are we today? The Bank of England held in 1937, as per Department of Commerce report, $7,883,000,000 in American industrial stocks and bonds. No doubt these were acquired when the stock market collapsed in 1929–30, for they are old issues. These industrial stocks and bonds are now worth in the present international dollar, $13,348,088,985 in gold. In this sum I do not include United States Government bonds and the two hundred million gold stabilization fund which is used by Wall Street brokers to sustain foreign money and securities.

On July 30, 1940, the daily statement of the United States Treasury showed that there was $20,460,471,296.32 of gold in the Treasury. Against this, the same statement showed $18,255,460,809 in gold certificates held by interests outside of the Treasury and by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, a private monopoly. In the redemption fund, Federal Reserve notes, there was $12,853,801, and in the gold reserve, $156,039,430. In the exchange-stabilization fund, the statement shows, $1,800,000,000. Balance on increment amounts to $142,796,468, and in the working balance there is $93,320,785; which makes a total in the general fund of $236,-117.254, and a grand total of $20,460,471,296.32.

I have reproduced this statement to show that the United States does not own or control the gold in the Treasury of the United States, but that it is instead owned and controlled by those who are holding the gold certificates, and they are, as I have stated, interests outside of the United States Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, a private banking monopoly.

When you now add to these holdings the $13,348,088,985 in American industrial stocks and bonds, held by the Bank of England, we find the outstanding liabilities against the gold in the Treasury amounts to $31,603,549,794.

It should be clear from this that we are today a debtor nation in gold to the international bankers, to the tune of $11,143,078,498. This is not a very cheerful outlook, in view of the fact that we are operating on purely inflated currency, with the national debt at over fifty-five billions and with contingent liabilities amounts to over thirteen billions, of which only about three billion are held collectible—and the remainder ten billion a total loss. This, as you will see, leaves us with a potential national debt today of $65,000,000,000, and which I am sure will be nearly seventy-five billion at the end of the next fiscal year.

The question is, How is this going to be paid, and where is the money to come from that is to pay this colossal debt? The fact is, it will not be paid, but will instead, like our inflated currency, be repudiated. That means nothing else but national bankruptcy. That is the picture which is facing the American people today, and which the administration wants to cover up either by war, internal strife, or by having administration Communists start a revolution to provide an incident for the President to declare himself a dictator.

What can be done? We can only save this Republic by eliminating those who have been designated as the unseen or invisible government. Who are they? They are the former pro-English gentile, and the former pro-German Jewish bankers; the House of Morgan and the House of Kuhn-Loeb, both of which are now pro-English and ready to plunge this Nation in a war which cannot help England and which is liable to destroy us.

It should be obvious to these back-seat warriors that they have "missed the bus," and should in their own interests engage in the reconstruction of this Republic instead of wasting their time snarling and shouting defiance at Hitler. Our interest is in the United States and not in Europe. We also know that the internationals are not going to lead us into this war as we were led into the World War; for we are much better informed today. Our task is at home and our enemies are the Communists and those who are financing this diabolical attempt at world revolution. Our Army and Navy will be needed at home to subdue and disarm these Communists whom the administration has blessed for 7 years.

The Constitution provides that the States shall have a National Guard, and I am firmly convinced that this protection is necessary; particularly in view of the conditions now existing in the United States. The Communists no doubt are biding their time to strike, and will be ready to go when they get the "green light" from Washington. I question as to whether or not the Executive understands the real background of those who are now engaged in subversion of our Government, although it should be as clear to him as it is to us who have taken an interest in learning about these activities. I can only conclude that if he is informed, his lack of interest in communism—the most serious problem which confronts our Nation today—and in not giving orders to stop this movement, that he is sympathetic toward this most damnable doctrine. As I look upon this entirely from a constitutional viewpoint, I am opposed to any plan whereby we may recruit in conscription ranks those who favor communism instead of constitutionalism; for should that happen, I can only say it is good-bye to freedom and good-bye to this Republic of the United States of America.

Questions Addressed to Members of National Defense Advisory Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

PROGRAM BROADCAST OVER FOUR NETWORKS FROM WASHINGTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 8

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD questions asked by radio commentators and answered by members of the National Defense Advisory Commission in a broadcast over the four radio networks from Washington on the evening of August 8, 1940.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following are questions which were asked by radio commentators and answered by members of the National Defense Advisory Commission in a broadcast over the four radio networks from Washington the evening of August 8, 1940:

Members of the Defense Commission are: Ralph Budd, in charge of the Transportation Division; Chester Davis, in charge of the Agricultural Division; Miss Harriet Elliott, in charge of the Division of Consumer Protection; Leon Henderson, in charge of the Division of Price Stabilization; Sidney Hillman, in charge of the Division of Labor Supply; William S. Knudsen, in charge of the Production Division; Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., in charge of the Raw Materials Division.

Mr. Budd was unable to be present. His place was taken by Mr. Karl W. Fischer, his assistant.

Mr. GODWIN. What are the functions of your section of the Commission?

Mr. KNUDSEN. We cooperate with the contracting officers of the Army and Navy and try to help out on any problem involving production machines or tools.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Mr. Knudsen, as head of the Production Division of the Defense Commission, where does Mr. Stettinius' work end and yours begin in the long line from production of raw materials to the finished product?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I told him, Mr. Baukhage, when we set up shop here that I considered everything raw material until we got ready to cut it up.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, do you mean such things as cloth for uniforms is raw material, Mr. Knudsen?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I do; until we start making the uniforms.

Mr. WARNER. There seem to be differences of opinion, Mr. Knudsen, on the present production of airplanes. Can you tell us something about that?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Present production, Mr. Warner, is approximately 900 planes per month. By January 1 the number will have risen to 1,500 planes, and the volume will increase steadily thereafter. You might also be interested in knowing that in January 56,800 people were employed in aircraft factories. Today the number is nearer 75,000.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Is it true that not a single combat plane has been contracted for out of money appropriated by Congress up to August 1?

Mr. KNUDSEN. No. It is not true. The Navy, for example, contracted for $7,000,000 worth of combat planes in July. But, more important than that, Mr. Baukhage, is the over-all picture. Take the money appropriated by Congress thus far for the defense program. They cover about four thousand two hundred-odd airplanes. Money in the defense appropriation bill now before Congress will add 14,000 more planes to the total. We cannot make complete plans and arrange final details with the manufacturers until we know that the appropriations are passed. We won't know that definitely until the Congress passes the bill. However, we have received from the principal aircraft manufacturers complete estimates on the plant space necessary for the whole program. I would like to add that of money made available to us on July 1, 5 weeks ago, contracts have already been awarded for 45 percent of the entire Army funds and 75 percent of the Navy's funds.

Mr. GODWIN. It has been stated that delay has been caused by lack of specifications for rifles, planes, tanks, and other material.

Mr. KNUDSEN. That is not true, Mr. Godwin. Rifles, planes, and tanks are already being produced under the present program.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. It has been charged that there are no specifications available for the heavier tanks. How about that, Mr. Knudsen?

Mr. KNUDSEN. The designs for the heavier tanks are being modified on the basis of experience gained in the European war, particularly in the Battle of Flanders. The redesigning will be completed by the end of this month and negotiations are under way with several companies for the production of the tanks.

Mr. LEWIS. Are any tanks being produced at this time, Mr. Knudsen?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, Mr. Lewis. One large company, for instance, has orders for 1,156 tanks. They are already producing at the rate of nearly 3 each day, and within 5 months we expect this one plant to double this figure.

Mr. WARNER. If the compulsory-service law passes, or a law that would put approximately 400,000 men in service by fall, will there be sufficient equipment for these men?

Mr. KNUDSEN. If you mean uniforms, other clothing, and general equipment, the answer is yes, Mr. Warner.

Mr. LEWIS. Are you going to stop automobile production and make planes in automobile factories, Mr. Knudsen?

Mr. KNUDSEN. No, Mr. Lewis. We don't plan any such step now. Aircraft can best be produced in aircraft factories. Several automobile factories are making parts for airplane companies, and two are making complete motors without interfering with their automobile production.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Knudsen, it has been said that small business is not getting any defense contracts. What about that?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Many of the smaller business firms are already getting orders, Mr. Warner. They are usually subcontractors under the main contract, which is the one you see mentioned in the papers. When a big bomber is built, for example, the contract for the full cost is awarded to the general contractor. There are, however, 536 business firms participating in that single piece of construction. It is because they are seldom mentioned in connection with the general contract that people get the impression that no one but the big contractor gets any business.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Do you expect production of combat materials to interfere with the normal production requirements of the country?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Part of our job, Mr. Baukhage, is to minimize that interference.

Mr. GODWIN. Tell me this, Mr. Knudsen. If a man is in the manufacturing business and thinks that his plant could make light tanks, gun carriages, or, say, machine guns, whom should he get in touch with here in Washington?

Mr. KNUDSEN. He should write to the Chief of Ordnance, War Department, Washington. They can tell him the name of the nearest ordnance officer to his plant.

Mr. LEWIS. Are any new plants going to be built, Mr. Knudsen?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, indeed. Under the present program it will be necessary to construct quite a few of them.

Mr. WARNER. Where will they be located?

Mr. KNUDSEN. The Army and Navy are making every effort to spread the plants over a wide area, including all the Middle Western States, where suitable labor and materials are available.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. When can we expect deliveries on the combat material the Defense Commission is interested in?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I expect that the tooling-up process will more or less take up the balance of this fall, but by January substantial deliveries of most of the material should commence, and by spring 1941 production should be going at a good rate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Hillman, your job has been described as having to do with the labor supply in the defense program. Will you tell us what that means?

Mr. HILLMAN. My job has three parts: First, to find out how many people will be required to carry on the defense program; second, to see to it that sufficient labor is available to meet the defense program; and, finally, to arrange as far as possible for good standards of employment and good labor relations.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. You say you are responsible for labor supply. Does that mean that the Defense Commission gets jobs for people?

Mr. HILLMAN. No, Mr. Baukhage; it does not. That is the job of the United States Employment Service and their affiliated State employment offices. Their activities are coordinated under the Defense Commission's program.

Mr. WARNER. But you are also concerned with training workers for defense industries, aren't you?

Mr. HILLMAN. Yes; we have set up plans for training skilled workers on the job within industry. In addition, special summer courses are now being given in our vocational schools throughout the country.

Mr. GODWIN. What are these courses like?

Mr. HILLMAN. These courses, which are given by the public vocational schools, follow closely the range of defense occupations. Among other things, they include machine-shop practice, welding, pattern making, and drafting.

Mr. LEWIS. How many people are taking the training program?

Mr. HILLMAN. The Office of Education's most recent figures show about 80,000 taking the training.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. How can people apply for this training, Mr. Hillman?

Mr. HILLMAN. They should apply to their nearest State employment office or one of its local branches. The officials there can put them in touch with those agencies offering the kind of training the applicant may be interested in.

Mr. WARNER. A minute ago, Mr. Hillman, you said your Division was also interested in maintaining friendly industrial relations.

Mr. HILLMAN. That is correct, Mr. Warner. Our activities have already helped to avert stoppages in the automobile, shipping, shipbuilding, and copper industries.

Mr. GODWIN. What agencies do you use in bringing about these settlements?

Mr. HILLMAN. First of all we use the agency that was created by the Congress to adjust industrial disputes. That is the Division of Conciliation of the United States Department of Labor. I have also had the aid of my colleagues on the Commission. The Commission also has the services of the labor policy advisory committee, which works closely with my division. That committee consists of six representatives of American Federation of Labor unions, six representing unions of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and four representatives of the railroad brotherhoods. They meet with me once a week and the three labor groups for which they speak have consistently cooperated in all matters coming before us pertaining to the national defense.

Mr. LEWIS. I take it, Mr. Hillman, that the number of people to be employed on defense production will be pretty large. Do you expect to have any difficulty in finding all the skilled workers that you will need?

Mr. HILLMAN. We have a large body of skilled workers who are now unemployed and registered with the United States Employment Service. They number more than 900,000. Putting the unemployed back to work is, as I see it, our first big responsibility. As far as the immediate future is concerned, I cannot see any reason why any serious labor shortage should develop.

Mr. WARNER. Is there any evidence that the defense program has yet affected employment?

Mr. HILLMAN. It certainly has. The shipbuilding industry today is employing almost 40,000 more people than at the 10-year peak in 1937; the aircraft industry is employing 50,000 more people; the machine tool industry is employing 18,000 more people; and the same is true of the engine industry.

Mr. GODWIN. Mr. Davis, as the head of the Agricultural Division of the Defense Commission, would you tell us something of the problems of agriculture in relation to national defense?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Godwin, city people continually tell me that the farm problem must be a perpetual one. I agree with that. A just balance between agriculture and the other elements of our economy is a difficult objective under normal circumstances. Recent international conditions which make the defense program essential have added to the difficulty.

You remember the slogan of 1917: "Food will win the war." Then we strained ourselves to limit domestic consumption and expand production to provide food for our armies and our Allies. Now you might say the situation is reversed. We have an abundance of food and fiber to meet normal civilian requirements and any military demand that may arise. On top of this abundance the surpluses are piling up which would have moved into export if there had been no war in Europe.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, if that is the condition, Mr. Davis, just what is agriculture's relation to the defense movement?

Mr. DAVIS. The big job, as I see it, Mr. Lewis, is to keep our farms in healthy production and at the same time prevent American farmers from becoming the first American economic casualty of this new world war. No defense program can succeed, in my opinion, if farm income and prices are not maintained at a level which will keep the farm plant healthy in the defense front.

Existing machinery developed during the past 7 years is available to do this job. My division is working with the Department of Agriculture and other action agencies inside and outside the Government to maintain our American farms as a strong line of defense.

There isn't time to describe the specific projects that are under way. I just want to emphasize again that American agriculture is one branch of our economy that doesn't have to expand its plant or step up its production to meet whatever demand may be thrown upon it. Our job is to help it keep that way.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. You, Miss Elliott, are the consumer adviser on the Commission, I believe. What do you consider your job to be?

Miss ELLIOTT. I can best describe that, Mr. Baukhage, by saying that I am charged with the responsibility of thinking of consumers of America in the broadest meaning of the word—of the ordinary people of America—their needs for food and clothes and houses, the prices they have to pay, and the wages and salaries out of which they can pay those prices.

Mr. LEWIS. What, specifically, Miss Elliott, does your division do to meet the needs of consumers as part of the defense program?

Miss ELLIOTT. We do two main things. We watch carefully what is happening to prices of the things people buy. Unnecessary increases in the prices of food, or clothes, or rents—lower living standards. Secondly, we work directly with those agencies that are working to raise levels of living where these are dangerously low—low in health, in nutrition, in welfare.

Mr. WARNER. How do you pursue this policy, Miss Elliott?

Miss ELLIOTT. First of all, we work with existing governmental groups, civic organizations, consumer and business groups in such a way as to assist in maintaining a steady flow of food and clothing to our people at fair prices and quality. At the end of this month we are having a meeting with leading retail organizations of the country to work out a cooperative relationship with them.

Then we have the leading experts in the country to see to it that the emergency needs for health, nutrition, social security, child welfare are met.

Mr. GODWIN. What is the situation at present in regard to the prices in which you are interested?

Miss ELLIOTT. Thus far, in the 2 months since the Commission was appointed by the President, there have been no significant changes in the prices of consumer goods.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Does all this mean, Miss Elliott, that you are setting up a complicated administrative machine?

Miss ELLIOTT. Indeed not. We have no intention of imposing a master blueprint. We merely want to bring together the energy already existing in the departments of the Federal Government and in the agencies of State, county, and local governments, as well as the many civic organizations throughout the country. In other words, Mr. Baukhage, we want to act as a kind of cooperative clearinghouse for the variety of organizations so that our defense activities in this field can be integrated to the best advantage for everyone.

Mr. LEWIS. Have you discussed your problems with any of these groups outside the Federal Government, Miss Elliott?

Miss ELLIOTT. Yes, Mr. Lewis. For weeks we have been receiving hundreds of requests from organizations throughout the country and from countless individual citizens asking the one question, "How can we help?" As our first step toward providing the answer, we had a conference here in Washington last week of almost one hundred national organizations. Representatives came from every part of the United States—from civic groups, patriotic organizations, women's clubs, church groups and social-welfare agencies. Our mutual problems were discussed around the conference table. Many valuable suggestions were made and numerous recommendations were placed before the Defense Commission. We will presently have a working relationship with civic groups throughout the country so that they can gear their programs and plans with the defense effort.

Mr. WARNER. Then you, Miss Elliott, are preparing the civilian population in these respects. Is that true?

Miss ELLIOTT. I can explain that, Mr. Warner, by saying that ill people and hungry people are a national liability at any time, and a double liability in a defense program. I can say, too, that in some countries they have guns but no butter. In this country, I think we will all agree we can have both guns and butter. My office, I assume, handles the butter.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Mr. Henderson, you're the Commissioner in charge of price stabilization, aren't you?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I must confess I'm not quite sure as to what your division covers. Could you give us a rough idea about your work?

Mr. HENDERSON. It's easier to tell what the President wants done than to outline our operations. The President wants to avoid the familiar price spiral—like he saw in the last war—where wages, the cost of living and prices skyrocketed up and left the country with a postwar headache. B. M. Baruch estimates that the last war cost us at least $13,000,000,000 more than it should if prices had been stabilized.

Mr. WARNER. I gather then that you watch all prices, defense and civilian, and the price level pretty closely.

Mr. HENDERSON. That's true.

Mr. GODWIN. Can you give us some idea of how you function if you find some important prices spiraling up?

Mr. HENDERSON. Let's take paper and pulp prices, which were getting out of line recently mainly because Scandinavian imports were shut off. We consulted with experts on Stettinius' staff who try to keep accurate records necessary for insuring adequate supply. We looked into prices, exports, imports, found out how much capacity was still idle and concluded prices were rising mainly because of excitement and ignorance. We had a meeting with representatives of leading firms in the industry and their opinion was that no price inflation ought to occur. But taking the excitement out of a potential price spiral is only one method of effecting stability.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. What are some of the others?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, we pay most attention to the things that make prices get out of line. In the last war the Government paid too much for its supplies because some forms of contracts encouraged inflation. We are working to perfect contract forms which will help keep prices down, and also tap bank and private funds for defense plant expansion.

It's very essential, too, that the Army and Navy have preference in getting supplies without bidding up prices and creating shortages. Our division handles certain phases of this activity, sometimes known as priorities. Our staff helped out the 5-year rapid-amortization plan so that new plant and equipment costs would not be added to price in too short a period. We're interested in the effect of taxation on consumption, we watch monopolistic practices, and a host of other things that affect price.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand you are constantly studying the European war experience.

Mr. HENDERSON. That's right; we spend quite a bit of time on the economic set-ups, particularly of Germany and England, to learn, for example, how these countries organize to procure and finance their supplies and how they control prices.

Mr. WARNER. Do you have any authority or intention to fix prices?

Mr. HENDERSON. I'm glad you brought that up. There's no need for Government price fixing at present, and none will be needed for any commodity if supplies are kept adequate and if new facilities are built when needed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Stettinius, I think everyone realizes that raw materials are the basis of all production. I believe you are in charge of the raw materials division. Would you tell us something of your work?

Mr. STETTINIUS. The Army and Navy requirements and their defense plans cover hundreds of thousands of articles. Our assignment is to make sure that the raw materials for the manufacture of these articles are available at the right time and at the right place.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. What are some of the raw materials, Mr. Stettinius, which are needed most urgently?

Mr. STETTINIUS. They literally run from A to Z—from antimony to zinc.

Mr. WARNER. How are some of them used?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Well, airplanes need chromite from Turkey. High-speed tool steel requires tungsten from China. Then we turn to South Africa for industrial diamonds, which are essential to the machine-tool industry.

Mr. GODWIN. How do you go about locating these materials that you need in such large quantities, Mr. Stettinius?

Mr. STETTINIUS. The Army and Navy Munitions Board have had capable and outstanding specialists studying these strategic items for years. They are familiar with their sources and they are concentrating their energies on locating adequate supplies, so that these will be ready when needed by industry. Our staff of specialists and businessmen are working most harmoniously with the Army and Navy experts.

Mr. LEWIS. You mentioned your staff, Mr. Stettinius. I believe you have some prominent men working with you. Will you tell us about some of them?

Mr. STETTINIUS. The best way, Mr. Lewis, to answer that is to take you to a typical Wednesday morning staff meeting. Some 35 surround the table and the work of each of my groups is discussed and progress and problems are reported. Among those 35 you will find Bill Batt, president of S. K. F. Industries. He reports for division A on metals. Then there is Clare Francis, president, General Foods, who tells us what division B has been doing in connection with textiles, lumber, and so forth. Ed Weidlein, director of the Mellon Institute, presents the story for division C, which is concerned primarily with chemicals. Sometimes the reports of these men at staff meetings are amplified where necessary by others. These men and the fine members of their staffs were called to Washington to serve their country. Aside from those mentioned, there are many others of equal importance, such as Gano Dunn, president of the J. G. White Engineering Corporation; Carl Adams, chairman of Air Reduction—who are only typical of the men outstanding in their fields—who are devoting their time and energy without thought of personal credit to help our country meet this great emergency.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. People are asking, Mr. Stettinius, why, with the billions of dollars available, these raw materials can't be gotten together more quickly?

Mr. STETTINIUS. People who ask that question must realize that American industry cannot be completely mobilized and coordinated within a week or a month or several months. It is a long job. It isn't easy. It calls for full cooperation and, may I add, patience.

It can be said, however, that no effort is being spared to serve them. We are assisted by the cooperative effort of industry and through the splendid aid given us by other divisions of this Commission, the Army, the Navy, and the various agencies of the Government.

Mr. WARNER. Of course, you must encounter numerous difficulties, Mr. Stettinius. Could you give us an example?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes. A very practical difficulty, for instance, involves one of our sources of high-grade manganese—an indispensable alloy for the manufacture of steel. It is in Brazil. Transportation to that source is inadequate and to get the supplies we need, a railroad in Brazil will have to be rebuilt. That is typical of the kind of problems we face.

Mr. GODWIN. There has been a good deal of talk lately about synthetic rubber. Is it still in the experimental stage, Mr. Stettinius?

Mr. STETTINIUS. That is a very interesting story, Mr. Godwin. Most rubber articles, as you know, are made from crude rubber imported from the East Indies. Research has developed a substitute for this crude. The job of our division has been not only to get supplies of crude but to investigate how far this substitute might be used in an emergency which would be created by cutting off our supplies of crude from the Indies.

Mr. LEWIS. Is there more than one process for making synthetic rubber?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes; there are several. Some are out of the experimental stage and in small commercial production. Synthetic rubber is now being used in a limited way in the manufacture of commercial articles and it can ultimately be used effectively in an emergency in the manufacture of most all other important rubber products.

Mr. WARNER. Can it be used in the manufacture of some of the defense material?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes; for certain purposes, including some airplane parts, synthetic rubber is definitely superior to crude.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Is progress being made toward developing emergency supplies of synthetic rubber?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes. We are discussing with the industry the necessary plans for production of emergency supplies. The response from the industry has been excellent. But all of us should realize that plants and necessary machinery and equipment cannot be built overnight.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Fischer, I understand that your job is to see that the raw materials in which Mr. Stettinius is interested are delivered promptly to the factories where they will be produced under Mr. Knudsen's schedules. Is that true?

Mr. FISCHER. Well, Mr. Warner, you can also explain it this way: The Transportation Division wants to avoid, if possible, any need for priorities in transportation or any embargoes on any particular commodities.

Mr. GODWIN. Will you explain that a little further, Mr Fischer?

Mr FISCHER. Briefly, we want to make sure that all forms of transportation—rail, water, and air—are properly prepared to meet any military responsibilities they may have to face, and meet them without serious disruption or confusion.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. I recall that there were some serious jams due to crowded terminals during the last war, Mr. Fischer. What are you doing about terminals now?

Mr. FISCHER. I can say this, Mr. Baukhage, it is of the utmost importance that provision be made for the proper reception of shipments of all kinds of commodities to avoid the use of cars, steamships, or pipe lines as warehousing facilities. We are making extensive studies of warehousing and terminal facilities. They must be adequate, because goods and commodities needed in the defense program must be kept moving to their ultimate destination.

Mr. LEWIS. I read somewhere the other day something about reducing the number of freight cars in need of repair. Can you tell us about that, Mr. Fischer?

Mr. FISCHER. Yes, Mr. Lewis; I have asked the Association of American Railroads, which is cooperating with us, to reduce to not more than 6 percent the number of cars awaiting repairs. That, Mr. Lewis, will be the smallest number of cars needing repairs for many, many years.

Mr. WARNER. Do we have enough rolling stock for an emergency, Mr. Fischer?

Mr. FISCHER. For the immediate future the answer is yes. During the past year, for instance, the railroads have increased the number of cars available by 25,000. We have also worked out several types of special equipment for the transportation of troops and military matériel.

Mr. GODWIN. What is the situation so far as the highways are concerned, Mr. Fischer?

Mr. FISCHER. Well, we have approximately a million miles of hard-surfaced roads, as you know. Already the War Department and Public Roads Administration have laid out a network of strategic highways. They cover some 80,000 miles of road. They lead to every part of the country. A survey has shown that in the entire chain of 80,000 miles there are less than 2,000 bridges that need to be strengthened to carry the heaviest military equipment, and I might add that the work of strengthening those structures has already been undertaken.

Mr. BAUKHAGE. Then you don't see any serious problems in connection with defense transportation?

Mr. FISCHER. No, sir. I can confidently say that transportation on rail, on the waterways, and in the air is today capable of meeting any emergency which we can foresee. We have better, more efficient, and faster rail transportation facilities; we have the air lines which we have never had before; we have inland waterways capable of carrying great volumes of freight; we have 30,000,000 mobile units on the highways of the country which did not exist during the last war. Everyone with whom we have talked in the transportation industry has assured us of their utmost cooperation and where results were necessary immediately they have come through. It can be truly stated that transportation is ready for any emergency.

The Mystery of Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY E. W. MASON

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD extracts from a speech delivered by E. W. Mason, chairman of the board of control of the One Dollar an Hour Club, at Moultrie, Ga., on March 19, 1940.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MYSTERY OF MONEY

Money is a mysterious thing because it pays a certain class of people to make it mysterious. This special class can secure all the money it wishes for only the cost of printing. Of course it is printing-press money—we have no other. Printing-press money is the money of civilization; commodity money is the money of semi-barbarism. There are no other kinds of money but these two.

Our Government goes into the business of furnishing this printing-press money to the Federal Reserve banks for an average of 30 cents or less per year for each thousand dollars furnished. Some call it a gift, some call it a steal, but I prefer to call it a loan.

If the United States Government lends a thousand dollars to one class of citizens on their security for 30 red cents or the cost of handling, why not lend to all citizens alike? The only mystery is that it lends this money—this printing-press money—to the bankers and not to all citizens alike. This is one mystery.

Your Government itself simply violates the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution by giving bankers advantages over farmers, over businessmen, over workers. Well might we ask, "Why is a farmer not as good as a banker, why is a businessman not as good as a banker, or why is a worker not as good as a banker?" That they are not is the mystery.

Give us a monetary system for all the people and there will be no mystery. Henry Ford has well said, "Money is only a means of transportation of goods and services." Postage-stamp money moves communications and small parcels. There is no mystery about postage-stamp money.

Supposing, now, the Government should furnish postage-stamp money to the public as it does pocket money. Then we would have a mystery. Postage stamps would be sold by brokers. The brokers or bankers would always be short of postage-stamp money. You would have to wait days at a time for your stamps, as there would have to be shortage of stamps to enable the banker to make a living. We would only charge these bankers for the cost of the postage-stamp money—the cost of printing. Congress would vote that all Government franking in the mails should cease—that all departments and Congressmen would have to buy the stamps the Government sold the bankers at printing cost back again, paying premium on the face value of the stamps.

If Congress should pass such a law, the postage stamp would be a mystery.

When Congress lends a thousand dollars to the bank for 30 cents and borrows the same thousand dollars back again for a period of 40 years at $30 a year, it represents a loss of $29.70 per year for 40 years, or $1,188. That is a mystery.

That is one mystery of the Owen-Glass unconstitutional Federal Reserve bill. Another mystery is that every President from Woodrow Wilson to Franklin D. Roosevelt and every Congress during that period have voted for that robbery by making 80 amendments to the unconstitutional law.

When money laws and rules of distribution to the public are as simple as postage-stamp money, there will be no mystery.

Cotton and Commodity Loans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER SIGNED BY NUMEROUS SENATORS AND LETTER BY EDWARD A. O'NEAL

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to the President, signed by numerous Senators, appealing for a higher cotton loan, and also a letter from Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president, American Farm Bureau Federation, urging that agricultural commodity loans be made at higher levels.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 6, 1940.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The undersigned Senators, representing the cotton-producing areas of the United States, respectfully invite your attention to the critical situation confronting our farmers as a result of the dislocations of foreign trade due to the European war. Because of the large portion of the cotton crop normally exported, the situation faced by cotton growers is particularly acute.

Regardless of the amount at which the loan rate is fixed, it is evident we will be unable to export our normal quantity of cotton during this season. For this reason, as a temporary emergency measure, a higher loan rate than ordinarily would be required under normal conditions is fully justified and essential in order to protect the income of our cotton farmers until such time as more normal trade conditions can be restored.

Cotton farmers have already done their part by going the limit in adjusting their acreage of cotton to bring supplies into balance with demand. This action has been helpful.

We approve the recommendations pertaining to surplus problems faced by farmers that were submitted to you on August 2 by Hon. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. For your convenience we attach copy of exhibit to Mr. O'Neal's letter, which furnishes valuable statistical information.

A loan of 65 percent of parity on cotton would add approximately $110,000,000 to the income of cotton farmers above the amount they would receive under the present mandatory loan rate. The additional cost to the Government on approximately 3,000,000 bales which will be exported or remain in the loan should not exceed $10 a bale or a total of $30,000,000. This estimate is based upon an estimated crop of approximately 11,500,000 bales, an estimated domestic consumption of 8,500,000 bales, exports of approximately 2,000,000 bales, leaving a net increase in loan stocks at the end of the season of only 1,000,000 bales.

An increase in the loan price to 65 percent would amount to approximately 10.25 cents per pound. That figure would assure the farmers an additional $10 a bale on the entire crop. If the crop yields 11,500,000 bales this year, the farmers would be benefited in the amount of $115,000,000. What would be the probable cost to the Government for providing such a tremendous addition to the farmers' income?

It is generally believed by the cotton trade that domestic consumption this year will exceed 8,500,000 bales. If we can export 2,000,000 bales, there will be a very small amount of cotton left in this year's loan. It might be necessary to pay a subsidy as high as 3 cents per pound to secure the foreign business. That would amount to $15 a bale, or $30,000,000. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has the largest fund available in its history for export subsidies. Surplus cotton is our greatest agricultural problem at this time, and the use of that money to aid in disposing of cotton should be exceedingly liberal.

Farmers will be required to live from the proceeds of the current crop until another cotton crop is produced. Regardless of all efforts that may be made, it is reasonably certain that living costs and the costs of all things the farmers must buy will be materially higher during the new year than they have been during the past. Certainly all forms of taxes will be higher and many new taxes, some of them hidden, will be applied, resulting in increased cost of the things farmers buy. Consideration should be given to this certainty when a loan figure is fixed.

We appeal to you to utilize the facilities of our national farm program to safeguard the income of our farmers during this emergency. The producers of our great export crops must be protected from bearing a disproportionate share of the troubles we face as a result of the European war. The gains we have made toward better conditions on American farms must be safeguarded. We believe the maintenance of a strong internal economic position is fundamental to adequate national defense.

Respectfully submitted.

Statistical summary

Item	Cotton	Wheat	Corn
Normal domestic consumption and exports	13,000,000 bales	756,000,000 bushels	2,575,000,000 bushels.
Average farm price, July 15, 1940	9.54 cents per pound	61.4 cents per bushel	63.1 cents per bushel.
Parity price, July 15, 1940	15.75 cents per pound	$1.123 per bushel	81.5 cents per bushel.
56 percent parity loan	8.82 cents per pound	62.9 cents per bushel	45.64 cents per bushel.
65 percent parity loan	10.24 cents per pound	73 cents per bushel	52.97 cents per bushel.
75 percent parity loan	11.81 cents per pound	84.2 cents per bushel	61.12 cents per bushel.
Parity income (normal consumption times parity price)	$1,023,750,000.	$848,988,000	$2,098,625,000.
Estimated 1940 production	11,067,000 bales	729,000,000 bushels	2,415,998,000 bushels.
Estimated value of 1940 crop	$488,055,000	$458,541,000	$1,576,700,000.
Parity payments, 1940	$95,700,000	$58,000,000	$48,892,000.
Agricultural conservation payments, 1940	$105,000,000	$49,000,000	$80,496,000.
Estimated total returns to producers:
(a) Based on 56-percent loans on cotton and wheat; 75-percent loan on corn	$688,755,000	$565,554,000	$1,606,088,000.
Percent of parity income	67.3	66.6	76.5.
(b) Based on 65-percent loans on cotton and wheat; 75-percent loan on corn	$767,330,000	$637,710,000	$1,606,088,000.
Percent of parity income	75.0	75.1	76.5.

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR PRESIDENT: Agriculture faces a critical situation. This industry which produces in abundance and where there are no bottlenecks has become the first major casualty of the war. As the new crop season approaches it is imperative that the position of agriculture be fully and clearly recognized. Half of our cotton, over a third of our tobacco, and from 10 percent to 25 percent of our wheat, rice, lard, dried and canned fruit have normally gone into export. During this coming crop year nearly all of these surpluses will be thrown back on the domestic market. The benefit payments available for these crops are not sufficient to prevent distress among producers.

A sympathetic Congress and administration have provided the farmers of the country with the machinery for dealing with this situation. We are not helpless. There is no reason why there should be widespread distress and discontent this autumn. But prompt action is imperative if we are to protect the farmers' prices and income while the bulk of their products move to market.

Farmers are alive to the urgency of this situation; they recognize that the same procedures and standards that have governed our agricultural programs in normal times will not suffice to meet this emergency. They have grave fears that the routine established over the last 7 years may not be adjusted to meet the present situation. For example, there has been substantial merit in past years in the argument that the loans on basic commodities should be low so that the normal flow of commodities into export will not be hampered. We have supported this position. This argument has no merit in a year when the great proportion of our export trade has been cut off. It has no merit when the loan rate is the only hope of the farmer that there will be a floor under his prices. Stocks will accumulate this year, to be sure. But every other country in the world would look upon such stocks as a source of strength and security. We firmly believe that our inventories of food and fiber should be regarded as a source of strength to this country.

Within the next few months, we have grave fears that ill-advised individuals will use agricultural distress as an argument for an appeasement policy—as an argument for deals with those who would destroy us. There will be no basis for such a policy if domestic prices are favorable and our domestic position is sound. Finally, we draw attention to the need for a strong internal economic position if we are to cooperate effectively with our American neighbors in efforts to cope with our mutual surplus problems. It is important that our own position be strong if we are to mobilize full and effective national support for the task of keeping the dictators out of this hemisphere.

RECOMMENDATIONS

We are not asking the creation of any new machinery to meet this emergency. All we ask is the courageous and effective use of the machinery which is now in existence. Specifically, it is our earnest desire that the following steps be taken:

1. That the commodity loans, which are now the only floor for agricultural prices, be set at higher levels than would normally be required. Specifically, we ask that the cotton loan be set at 65 percent of the parity level. We recommend further that the wheat loan, which was announced before the emergency became fully apparent, be adjusted upward to the equivalent of the cotton loan. Such loans on cotton and wheat, together with the mandatory loan on corn, will bring the total returns, including benefit payments, to approximately 75 percent of parity income, for the producers of cotton, wheat, and corn.

2. We ask that the Secretary of Agriculture immediately call into conference representatives of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and a representative of the National Defense Advisory Commission to survey agricultural surplus problems growing out of the present emergency. We ask that they formulate programs of action and determine the amounts of money which will be required to meet this emergency. For each individual commodity we urge that such programs be formulated and announced prior to the marketing season, in order that farmers may receive full benefit during the period when they market the bulk of their crops. There is always danger that relief will be too late and the benefit will accrue to handlers and speculators for whom it was never intended.

3. We ask that during the coming months there be an impressive demonstration of our ability to make our agricultural surpluses available to low income and needy people in whatever amounts may be necessary to give them a completely adequate diet.

This should include as a major element the bulk purchasing of commodities in the farmers' market and their direct distribution to needy individuals.

4. In the interest of the morale of our farm people and their single-minded support of the national interest, we ask a declaration from the President of the United States that no farm prices will be allowed to reach ruinous levels as the result of surplus problems growing out of the European war. We ask that this statement set out clearly and frankly the positive policy of holding agricultural prices as nearly as possible to parity levels.

I hope this matter will receive your immediate attention. With assurances of my highest esteem, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD A. O'NEAL,
President, American Farm Bureau Federation.

Relationships With South America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY JOSEPH ALSOP AND ROBERT KINTNER

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner, and appearing under the title "The Capital Parade" in last evening's Washington Star.

This article comments upon our relationships with South America, and deals in part with a proposal which has been submitted to the Senate, and which has for its purpose a continuation of the good-neighbor policy initiated by President Roosevelt, and which is intended to give protection to the Western Hemisphere against economic assault from any source.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 8, 1940]

THE CAPITAL PARADE—REARMAMENT AND TRADE PROGRAM CONSTITUTE PREPARATIONS FOR DEFENSE OF HEMISPHERE

(By Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner)

Preparation for defense of the Western Hemisphere in the event of an early German victory are being carried forward along two lines. The first is rearmament. The second is the hemisphere trade program, worked out at the State Department and recently approved at the Habana Conference. The trade program is intended to supplement rearmament, by forestalling German economic penetration in South America, and thus preventing the inevitable accompanying German political activity.

In assessing the present position of the United States in a troubled world, it is important to know that rearmament has been lagging badly thus far because of hampering tax laws which Congress has been slow to change. It is also important to realize that while the trade program is certainly an effort in the right direction, and has a reasonable chance of success, it cannot possibly be considered a sure reliance in time of crisis.

SHIELD AGAINST PRESSURE

The trade program has changed so much that it is no longer clearly understood by most people. As originally conceived in the State and Agriculture Departments the program called for the establishment of a vast hemispheric marketing cooperative, or several smaller cooperatives, all financed and managed from Washington.

The theory was that the nations of the Americas could bargain better with Germany in a united front, and that with the United States serving as the broker of the hemisphere, Germany would be unable to break down the resistance of the smaller nations by economic pressure.

As conceived after the discussions at Habana, the program is far less ambitious and more practical. Broadly speaking, three steps are planned: (1) The United States being the only Nation in the hemisphere rich in liquid capital, will lend money against South American surpluses, thus permitting South American commodities to be stored until Germany is ready to pay a reasonable price; (2) marketing agreements will be made between this country and the South American nations, dividing the world markets as they were divided, for example, in the prewar copper agreement; (3) the nations of the hemisphere will then be free to trade as they please, with Germany or anyone else, so long as they observe the conditions imposed by the United States loans and the marketing agreements.

There are certain minor points in the program, such as the promise of additional United States loans to finance South American production of raw materials like rubber, which this country must buy somewhere abroad. But the program's essence is expressed in the three major points. The object of the new program is the same as the object of the hemisphere trade cooperative, to shield the weaker American nations from German pressure.

HEALTHY DOUBTS

As has been said, the program is sane and points in the right direction. In making a balance sheet of the factors operating for and against the program's success, the most important item on the favorable side is the attitude of the South American leaders. At Habana, as at all such conferences, the Argentinians and one or two other delegations made a show of independence for the record.

This show in no way altered the basic fact that the leading men in all nations of the hemisphere hate the prospect of German domination, are now exceedingly afraid of it, and are therefore willing to agree to extraordinary measures to guard their independence.

On the other hand, this attitude of the South American leaders will last only so long as they feel reasonably sure of the protection of the United States. This psychological problem is fundamental. Furthermore, there are a number of practical obstacles also threatening the program.

For one thing, the President has asked Congress for $500,000,000 to finance the program through the R. F. C. But Congress has not yet acted. If the worst fears of the Army and Navy Departments are substantiated, Germany will be victorious this summer. The program is extremely complex, and if Congress delays much longer there will be no time even to arrange the surplus loans. Then, too, the marketing agreements will have to cover several commodities, such as wheat and beef. Being produced in this country, these are political poison and will add to the tremendous difficulties which always attend the preparation of marketing agreements. Finally, even if the loans and marketing agreements are successfully arranged, they will still be pretty feeble weapons against the incessant "fifth column" activity, the brutal economic discrimination against unsympathetic businessmen, and the elaborate propaganda with which the Germans will attempt to combat the American effort.

The Habana Pact

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have been reading from day to day articles in the Washington Daily News by Mr. William Philip Simms, who has recently flown 15,000 miles over the Pan-American Airways in South America and Central America, studying subjects in which we are interested. I have read them with so much interest that I have asked unanimous consent daily to have them inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, and I hope my colleagues will likewise read those articles. The articles are very brief, very interesting, very much to the point.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article published in the Washington Daily News of Thursday, August 8, 1940, by William Philip Simms, headed "Latins Doubt Habana Pact Will Succeed."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of August 8, 1940]

LATINS DOUBT HABANA PACT WILL SUCCEED

(By William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard foreign editor)

The United States cannot shut Germany out of the Western Hemisphere with a wall of gold. All the treasure at Fort Knox could not permanently corner the products of North and South America and force the Nazis to buy them on our terms.

In all my 15,000-mile journey up and down the principal countries below the Caribbean, I failed to find a single statesman or business man, Latin or Yankee, who believed that the so-called inter-American cartel to purchase and handle Western Hemisphere surpluses would work out as a practical proposition.

They agreed that if the United States were willing and able, year after year, to lay out a billion and a quarter to $2,000,000,000 to finance such a scheme, one of two things would happen. The totalitarian powers of Europe and Asia would either gang up on Uncle Sam to break his stranglehold on inter-American commerce, or else pay no attention to it and start developing their own sources of supply outside the cartel.

MIGHT BE DISASTROUS

Which of the two would happen would depend upon just how desperately Europe and Asia needed the meat, wheat, coffee, cotton, and other American products. And the betting would seem to favor the second alternative—namely, the development of new sources.

And that, South American trade experts observed, would simply add to the Americas' trouble. The warehouses of this hemisphere are already bursting with surplus cotton, wheat, corn, meats, coffee, and other products. For already the world supply is greater than world consumption. So if the totalitarian powers found it inconvenient, difficult, or impossible to buy these things in the American market and hence began to produce still more, say in Australia, India, China, Africa, Russia, and Europe, the American republics would be left holding the bag with a vengeance. Their natural markets would disappear not temporarily but for all time.

"If the cartel is out," I asked, "what can we do to cushion the economic impact of a Nazi victory in Europe on South America?"

COMPOSITE OF ANSWERS

Here is something like a composite of the answers I received:

1. If any attempt is made to invade this hemisphere militarily, hit back with everything we've got—particularly if the thrust is made anywhere near the Caribbean, the Panama Canal, or their approaches. Any weakness now in the face of foreign threats would lose us whatever prestige we may have managed to build up south of the Rio Grande.

2. Do everything we can to increase our trade with South America, especially imports. Internationally speaking, hearts follow the trade routes. If Argentina is bitter against us and friendly toward Great Britain, it is because Britain is her best customer and we are a poor one. In 1938, the last year before the war, the United Kingdom took nearly 32 percent of Argentina's exports; Germany, 11.5 percent; United States, 8.1.

3. Help reasonably with South America's rearmament. It's silly to say that this or that regime is a dictatorship or that it has Nazi or Fascist leanings. Latin American regimes, with few exceptions, have almost always been dictatorships. And Porfirio Diaz, Mexico's iron man for decades, was a sort of Fascist or Nazi before the Duce, the Fuehrer, or even the words, were born. No South American dictator is going to allow the Germans or Japanese to invade his country if he can help it. But he may not be able to help it unless he is to some degree armed.

COULD EXTEND CREDIT

4. Find a way to extend long-term credit to buyers of American products. This could be done by Government agency or privately. It could be arranged so that American merchants and manufacturers, who have weekly pay rolls to meet, could get their money in 60 or 90 days, while some central organization carried their Latin American customers for the necessary time.

5. Help develop communications, transportation, industries, etc., on condition that equipment and technicians come from the United States. Sell productive equipment on terms which would permit such equipment to help pay for itself, as the Germans do.

6. Help culturally. Help build elementary schools, improve hygiene, train doctors, nurses. Increase manyfold the number of scholarships in American colleges and universities. Bring keymen and women to the United States to see what we have to offer. Germany is doing a vast amount of that sort of thing. Henry Ford's River Rouge plant is as impressively efficient as the Germany Army.

USE BURIED GOLD

7. Use some of the $20,000,000,000 now buried at Fort Knox to put South America's principal currencies on a gold or dollar basis, thus frustrating the reported Nazi plan to tie them to the mark and demonetize gold.

What if we did eventually lose a hundred million dollars or so, it is asked, in transactions like these? Wouldn't we get most of it back in the form of wages to American workers in the first place? And wouldn't it be a better investment in the long run than some of the billions we have tossed into the public "kitty"? Or lent to Europe?

The Value of C. C. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting article written by Ernest K. Lindley and appearing in this morning's Washington Post. The article deals in a most enlightening way with the great economic and social values of the C. C. C. camps.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE VALUE OF C. C. C.—YOUTH PROGRAM STILL NEEDED

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

The balancing of the Budget, which the Republicans have been grooming as a campaign issue for almost 7 years, has been pushed into the indefinite future by the exigencies of national defense. But the demand that the huge outlays for national defense be offset in part by economies in the so-called nonessentials is arising again, and doubtless will be heard throughout the campaign.

It scouting around for nonessentials some of the economizers have now picked the Civilian Conservation Corps. They give as their reason the recent relaxation of the C. C. C. regulations to permit the enrollment of youths from families with moderate incomes.

According to the Washington Post, "If the C. C. C. finds that the quotas assigned to the several States are not filled, that evidently means that relief needs are less pressing and economies could be instituted with comparative ease."

Much of the work done by the C. C. C. is not pressing, in the view of the Washington Post, and does not provide a great variety of opportunities for training. It thinks that if Government money is to be spent on training young men from nonrelief families, it could be spent more advantageously by financing vocational training in private industries.

Vocational training in private industries, properly safeguarded, can be of great value in the defense program now getting under way. It is perhaps true, also, that the C. C. C. does not provide a great variety of opportunities for training. However, the training program of the C. C. C. has been greatly enlarged in the last few years, and the emphasis from now on will be even more on training for useful civilian and noncombatant military jobs.

The unemployment problem among youth is much larger than is implied by the Washington Post and others who are beginning to urge a reduction in the C. C. C. Throughout the depression about one-third of all the unemployed have been found in the 16 to 24 age group.

The Biggers unemployment census in November and December 1937 indicated that there were almost 4,000,000 unemployed in this age range. Of these almost 2,500,000 were boys. These were youths who were out of school and who wanted jobs, but were unable to find them. They did not include a large number who were being kept in school and college with help from the National Youth Administration. Nor did they include perhaps 1,750,000 partly employed young people who wanted regular jobs.

Of course, these unemployed youth are not confined to families on relief. Must a boy of 18 or 21 or 23 be condemned to idleness because his father is employed? Regardless of the father's employment or station in life, the moral damage to a youth who cannot obtain useful work is a matter of serious national concern.

A great majority of these unemployed young people have never had regular jobs. They have never learned the habits of steady work, much less the skills which improve their chances to obtain steady work.

The C. C. C. has not been strictly limited to boys from families on relief. It has been open all along to boys whose families might have gone on relief if they had not received the $20 or $25 a month from a scn enrolled in the C. C. C. In 1937, when Congress made the C. C. C. a semipermanent agency by authorizing its continuation for 3 years, and again in 1940, when the authorization was renewed for 3 years, the test of eligibility was "unemployed and in need of employment." This was a test of the need of the individual boy, not of the need of his family. By authority of Congress the C. C. C. has been open, for 3 years, to boys from families eligible for relief, even if they were not on relief. For more than a year it has been open to boys from families whose living standard is below "normal" for the community in which they reside. The recent relaxation is only another slight broadening of the economic area from which C. C. C. boys may be recruited. As in the past, youths from families on relief or eligible for relief receive the preference.

Conscription, if approved by Congress, will reduce unemployment in the 21–24 age group. When some youths are to be called, by lot, to defend their country is precisely when it is most important that all young people be made to realize that there is a useful place for them in our society. The boys who enter the combatant services must feel that they are preparing to defend something that is worth defending. They cannot be expected to be enthusiastic about defending people so myopic as to condemn young people to idleness rather than to pay them modest sums to conserve the natural resources of the Nation and to acquire training which will make them more useful citizens, through subagencies of the C. C. C. and the N. Y. A.

Friendship of Americas Cemented by Airways

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by William Philip Simms headed "Friendship of Americas Cemented by Airways," published in the Washington (D. C.) Daily News of today, August 9, 1940.

In that connection I wish to say, unhesitatingly and with perfect candor, that I think the gratitude of the United States is due to the Pan-American Airways, because that organization was started without any financial help from the United States Government. I recently observed in an article I read that $20,000,000 were put up to start that company. The Pan-American Airways have done more to cement friendship between the people of South America and Central America and the West Indies and the people of the United States than anything our Government has ever done in those countries. They have given us a decided advantage over the European countries by reason of the fact that orders have come from the southernmost portion of the South American continent to our manufacturers in this country in a couple of days, thus giving us an advantage of anywhere from 5 to 10 days over the manufacturers in European countries.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRIENDSHIP OF AMERICAS CEMENTED BY AIRWAYS

(By William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard foreign editor)

Two things have served, probably more than all the others put together, to draw North and South America closer together in trade, friendship, and mutual understanding. These are transportation and communications.

All the ambassadors, all the good-willers, all the good neighbor policies, and everything else combined would never have got to first base—or if they had, the effect would not have lasted—had it not been for these two.

For 20 years our independent, uncontrolled and unsubsidized press associations have been carrying the news, day and nights, back and forth between the northern and southern continents. And American ships, and more recently, planes, have been speeding up and facilitating inter-American trade and travel.

AIRWAYS LEAD WAY

Of all these ties, none is more important than the comparative newcomer, the airways. What the railroad builders did for the States by opening up the rich country west of the Mississippi and helping to make us a united nation, Pan American and Panagra (Pan-American-Grace Line) Airways are now doing for the republics of the Western Hemisphere.

I have just completed 15,000 miles of air travel by Pan American. Since boarding the Dixie Clipper on June 24 at Lisbon, Portugal, I have flown across the Atlantic to New York, to Miami, to Barranquilla, Cristobal, Guayaquil, Arica, Santiago, Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro, Recife, Para, British Guiana, French Guiana, Dutch Guiana, Trinidad, Puerto Rico, Haiti, Cuba, and way stations, and back to the National Capital.

Not once is the entire distance did a single spark plug in any one of the multiple motors misfire. There was never even a sputter. I crossed the Equator twice, sailed high over steaming jungles and sizzling deserts; through tropical storms in daylight and darkness; along and across the snow-clad Andes in midwinter; past the iced flanks of Aconcagua, loftiest mountain peak of the western world, and over the 100-mile-wide mouth of the yellow Amazon. And never an uneasy moment.

SAFETY ACCEPTED FACT

But the purpose of this article is not to brag about flying. There is nothing novel about that. On every leg of my journey I had as fellow passengers graybeards and youngsters, women, children, and sometimes babies in arms—just as in any Pullman car. Safety in American planes is now an accepted fact. I aim merely to call attention to something that is going on right under our eyes, something of immense importance to the relations between North and South America, which most of us are overlooking.

Panagra's first weekly schedule from New York to Buenos Aires called for 9 days as against 18 by the fastest steamers. Even that was pretty revolutionary. Today, however, there is service three times a week, and the time has been cut in half. Soon, when the new cut-off across the Brazilian bulge is ready, the time will be further reduced to three and a half days. But even that is not all. From Miami to Barranquilla, Colombia, I traveled by stratoclipper in a sealed cabin through the substratosphere. The time was exactly 6 hours—the fastest ever made by a commercial plane between North and South America. When these planes really get going, and night travel starts, New York and Buenos Aires will be only 2 days apart.

TOUGH SLEDDING

But the going has not been easy for Pan American-Grace Airways. Both the Germans and the French were strongly entrenched on the eastern coast of South America before Panagra charted the west coast airways. And to make it all the tougher, Germany, France, and Italy subsidized their lines as a matter of national policy. The American concern had to pay its way by carrying passengers, express, and foreign mail, or go under.

So, when the Panagra pioneers planked down their original $20,000,000, it was an investment in faith, just an old American custom. True, they had a foreign mail contract, but it was entirely temporary with no certainty of continuity. Not even when another $10,000,000 was needed for equipment to keep Panagra abreast of the times. But now the uncertainty is nearly over. The Civil Aeronautics Act has adjusted rates on foreign mail to enable operators to perform the type of service required in the public interest.

There is no military objective behind the American air lines. Their purpose is to develop faster and better transportation, without which trade will stagnate. They aim to bring buyers and sellers together in close and friendly contact and make it easier and pleasanter for our South American friends and neighbors to visit us than to visit Europe.

TIME ELEMENT VITAL

The time element today is more vital than ever before in all history. It is vital to governments, to businessmen, and to political and cultural relations between nations.

"What we are trying to do," Juan Trippe, president of Pan-American Airways system, told me years ago, "is to swing the time advantage to the side of American commerce and a better understanding between nations."

Ask anybody you meet in South America today, and they will tell you the American air people are doing all that and more. I've flown in practically every country in the world, and I can say that in the air we're tops.

An Ominous Hour

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COLGATE W. DARDEN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 4, 1940

Mr. DARDEN of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, we celebrate today an event of profound importance—an event upon which rests in great part those institutions which guarantee liberty and individual freedom in our country.

We have seen in recent weeks the destruction of the French Republic at the hands of a highly trained and efficient German army led by capable and ruthless men.

This melancholy happening has surprised and profoundly shocked our people, because there has always been a close bond of friendship between the peoples of the United States and of France. We are still wondering what could have happened to an army which we had long believed to be the equal of any on earth.

The answer, I think, will be found in lack of preparation and lack of decision on the part of those charged with administering the Government of France.

We cannot repair now the great damage which has been wrought, but we can, if we are wise, profit from the lesson taught by this frightful catastrophe.

There is now under way a great armament program. We are rushing through the Congress huge appropriations in order to make available the money necessary for the materials of war. But this is only part of our problem.

Appropriations readily made will not make secure the future. This money must be turned, and quickly turned, into instrumentalities of defense and protection if we are to survive. In addition, our men must be well trained. The grim situation which today confronts us will not be overcome simply by a grant of money.

We shall be forced to exert every effort and to expend our energies to the utmost if we are to supply in time the weapons, the ships, the aircraft, and the ammunition of which we stand in immediate and desperate need.

To these must be added an unconquerable spirit if our country is to live through the challenging years which lie ahead.

Those who seek to govern themselves must be willing to accept the obligations as well as the benefits of the democratic system.

The vitality of the democracies has been sapped by a philosophy the unsoundness of which is only equaled by its broad acceptance. A philosophy of ease—a belief that the difficulties of mankind will readily yield to statutes enacted by the Congress rather than to sacrifice and to toil.

The State cannot solve the problems of mankind. It cannot guarantee either health or prosperity. It can destroy both, but it can create neither. These in the end must rest in large part with our individual citizens.

Our duty cannot be discharged by making appropriations. We must go further—much further— and see that the country is fully armed, with its fighting men well trained, if we are to celebrate at this time next year.

Taxes or Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LEMKE
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I am going to talk to you on the subject of taxes or bonds. May I ask why an intelligent people should be burdened with either taxes or bonds? Why should our Government issue Federal Reserve notes and give them away for the cost of printing—seven-tenths of 1 cent per bill—and then issue interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds in order to get back part of its credit? If any businessman did this, he would be adjudged insane.

Why should our Government issue $5,467,445,045 Federal Reserve notes and give them to the large bankers through the Federal Reserve banking system for nothing except the cost of printing and then issue in addition $45,000,000,000 tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds and give them to these same bankers for a check book and a deposit book? These large bankers now have the $5,467,445,045 Federal Reserve notes and they also have the $45,000,000,000 tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds, and the Government is still in financial distress.

If our Government can issue Federal Reserve notes and give them to the large bankers for nothing, why can it not issue these same notes to pay its own obligations? If the Government would do this, then the people would not have to tax themselves $1,400,000,000 a year to pay the interest on these tax-exempt bonds. Then there would not be 12,000,000 people out of employment and millions more on a disguised dole system. As Thomas Edison so ably said:

> If the Nation can issue a dollar bond, it can issue a dollar bill.

May we ask what is money? What is its purpose and function? Money is not gold. Money is not silver. Money is not paper. Money, as such, has no intrinsic value—it is not wealth. It is a unit of exchange, a measure of values, a common denominator with which we measure the comparative values of commodities; it is a yardstick with which we measure the value of the things produced by the energy of a people.

Besides being a yardstick, a medium of exchange, money also represents the accumulated wealth of a nation. It serves as a storage of individual credit, produced by mental and physical energy, which may be exchanged for property. It serves as negotiable credit in the present or future acquisition of property, the value of which is measured by it as a yardstick.

Money is now made by law, made full legal tender by a sovereign government. It no longer has intrinsic value as such. It is a yardstick with which we measure and exchange present and future wealth. The Government should never give it away to anyone except for value received, for services rendered.

Article I, section 8, part 5, of the Constitution of the United States reads:

> Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin * * *.

In accordance with this mandate of the Constitution, I, during the 1933 special session of Congress, introduced a bill creating the Bank of the United States. I reintroduced it in every Congress since, and it is now pending before Congress.

This bank would transfer funds to the credit of the Treasury of the United States for public works and public expenditures as directed from time to time by acts of Congress. Thus it would put the United States upon a cash basis. It would use the money and the credit that belongs to us all for the benefit of us all in place of giving it away to a few individuals and borrowing it back again by issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. It would end the tax-exempt, interest-bearing, bond-issuing racket once and for all. It would save the Federal Government and the State governments and the political subdivisions billions of dollars of interest taxes.

This bank would make loans to any State or Territory of the United States, or to any political subdivision thereof, for public improvements up to 30 percent of the assessed valuation of the property of any such State, Territory, or political subdivision. It would give preference to States, Territories, or political subdivisions whenever and wherever there is unemployment or where the wage scale for common labor falls below a living annual wage. It would enable us to establish an American standard of living for all of our citizens.

This bill provides that the bank, using its capital and other available funds as a revolving fund, shall take up the $45,000,000,000 of outstanding tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds and certificates of indebtedness. In other words, this bank, by using the money and credit that belongs to us all, would take up the Government's outstanding interest-bearing obligations and henceforth transact the Nation's business with cash. Our Government would no longer be compelled to pay $1,140,000,000 interest annually on its own money and credit. It would be freed from self-imposed bondage—debts, interest, and taxes.

If this bill becomes a law it will not be necessary for this Government ever again to issue tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds in order to borrow back its own credit. It will save the Nation billions of dollars in interest and taxes. It will save the revenues the Government now loses on tax-exempt bonds. It will enable States, counties, school districts, cities, and towns to refund their bonded indebtedness at a service charge of less than 1 percent in place of 5, 6, or 7 percent interest. It will get the Federal Government, State governments, and various political subdivisions out of debt. It will meet the requirements of the Constitution of the United States:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

When the bill creating the Bank of the United States becomes a law it will give the Nation a banking system owned, operated, and controlled by our Government in its sovereign and governmental capacity. It will give to the people of this Nation at all times a sufficient currency—a medium of exchange so that the energies of all the able-bodied men and women can and will be utilized in the creation of new wealth. It will give us the "abundant life" rather than poverty by scarcity produced by the wanton destruction and ignorant curtailment of the production of wealth through the insanity of official Washington.

By using the money and credit of this Nation for the benefit of all the people, the people will soon be able to pay up the $300,000,000,000 of public and private debts and save $15,000,000,000 each year in interest. There will then be no further need of the Federal Government, State governments, and other political subdivisions going into debt by issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. There will then be no further need of the people going into debt or buying on the installment plan, which has been the curse of this Nation—a human wrecking machine. We will then be able to go on a cash basis and devote our energies to producing and distributing wealth rather than to paying interest and debts. We will no longer be obliged to mortgage our own future or that of our children and grandchildren to a money and credit monopoly.

What a wonderful country this would be if we, as a whole, had started and continued on a cash basis ever since the Nation was established; if we had never permitted a lending class—a money trust—to exist. What a happy people we would be today if we had never permitted anyone to control and manipulate the money and credit of this Nation so as to destroy industry through bankruptcy and wreck millions of homes by mortgage foreclosures and evictions. What a difference it would have made for all of us if, in place of paying interest on $300,000,000,000 of public and private debts, our Government had provided us with sufficient money to do the Nation's business and remain on a cash basis.

It is self-evident that we cannot borrow or tax ourselves into permanent prosperity. Our monetary system has been responsible for all the panics and depressions. It is a dishonest system that has been permitted to continue only because of lack of understanding. We cannot permit our Government to continue to issue its money and credit and give it away for nothing and then borrow it back by issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds.

When the public once understands that our monetary system is the cause of panics, depressions, and recessions, then that unsound system can and will be changed. When the people realize that the money and credit of this Nation belong to us all and not to a favorite few, then that system will be abolished. Then there will be no need for taxes or bonds.

No power on earth—so help me, God—shall control the key to the Nation's funds but the United States Government itself.—President Andrew Jackson.

Review of Habana Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ, OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a review of the Habana Conference which I made last evening over the Columbia Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A REVIEW OF THE HABANA CONFERENCE

Why was the Habana Conference called? To further hemispheric solidarity for purposes of defense; to overcome a widespread belief among Latin American delegates, based upon their view of our past record, whether justified or not, that injustice had been done to Latin American countries. Fortunately, our representatives have shown an increasing degree of acquaintance with the characteristics of the Latin American people, largely as a result of the policy adopted by President Roosevelt 7 years ago and ably furthered by Secretary Hull at every subsequent conference of the Americas.

In referring to the defense of this hemisphere, it is well to point out that this defense means the safeguarding of the entire hemisphere.

And what are the results of this significant conference? Perhaps most important of all was the convention authorizing the United States to seize any colonial possessions of a foreign country in the event that its ownership is threatened, these colonies to be held in trust on behalf of all of the countries of the Western Hemisphere. Furthermore, a declaration was adopted by the conference stating: "Any attempt on the part of a non-American state against the integrity or inviolability of the territory, the sovereignty, or the political independence of any American state shall be considered an act of aggression against the states which signed this declaration." Among the resolutions that loom large may be mentioned those dealing with "fifth column" activities, the subversive activity of aliens, the completion of the pan-American highway, a declaration that American republics will settle their disputes peacefully, and another urging economic cooperation among the Americas as recommended by Secretary of State Hull. Also, and very important, a resolution calling for "a just, peaceful, and prompt solution of the dispute over Belize (or British Honduras) between Guatemala and Great Britain."

Our program of preparedness could have very little permanence or any real safety while the possibility of seditious or subversive activity continues within our own hemisphere. That the friendship, the good-neighborly attitude, of our sister republics to the south is a vital necessity may be demonstrated in the very near future. But our record as seen in Latin America has been far from reassuring. I propose to take only a few minutes to develop the reasons why we had no time to lose in effectuating, in rendering concrete and palpable, the new departure inaugurated by President Roosevelt 7 years ago, and ably seconded by Mr. Hull. If our program of national defense, which now entails hemisphere defense, was to succeed, we had to act, and act now.

We made a good beginning in our Latin American relations by being the first country to recognize the political independence of these erstwhile colonies, but we failed to have representatives at the first pan-American conference held in Panama City in what was then New Granada, later Colombia and now the Republic of Panama. In the meantime, an event of far-reaching importance—the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine—occurred. Why was this declaration of national policy made on December 2, 1823? There is an explanation.

The continental powers of Europe had just taken France, lately the aggressor and transgressor nation under Napoleon, back into the bosom of the family of nations. They forgave their erring sister, and all was harmony once more. Two alarming alliances emerged: The Holy Alliance, the product of Czar Alexander the First's quasi-liberal mystic mind, and the Quadruple Alliance. The Holy Alliance included all of the European monarchs with the exception of King George III of England, who was disabled, and the Sultan of Turkey, who was not invited, since the organization limited its membership to Christian monarchs. One of its prime purposes was the suppression of liberalism and constitutionalism, and the safeguarding of monarchy. The program included mutual assistance, and the inner circle (reminiscent of the council of the ill-fated League of Nations which has now virtually concluded its labors) was called the Quadruple Alliance in 1815, being composed of Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia; 3 years later, upon the admission of France, it was called the Quintuple Alliance, and sought to put into practice some of the nebulous theories of the Holy Alliance. One of these projects included the recovery of Spain's colonies, with France undertaking to furnish the principal assistance. This represented a most serious threat to the independence and territorial integrity of these newly established republics. Then we had to contend with the expansionistic activities of Alexander I of Russia in the northwest. A most emphatic note was sent to the Czar. During these discussions, John Quincy Adams stated to the Russian Minister that "The American Continents are no longer subjects for any new European colonial estabments." (The Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, vol. VI, p. 163.)

This pronouncement had a beneficient effect upon our Latin American relations for it notified the world that the republican form of government and the democratic way of life were here to stay. And they are here to stay.

Then came a series of well-known but unfortunate historical incidents involving Mexico, Spain, Colombia, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and Nicaragua—none of which allayed the fears and resentment of Latin America.

My sole purpose in mentioning these incidents is to safeguard my fellow citizens against continuing a course of conduct that can only lead to tragic, perhaps disastrous consequences, for a house divided against itself cannot stand. Our national defense is today predicated upon the solidarity of the Western Hemisphere; without that solidarity, our defense problem becomes most acute.

The Latin American is, by race, background, and tradition, proud, sensitive, cultured, courteous, and quick to take offense. It should not be forgotten that the discovery of this continent was sponsored by Spain, that the conquistadores and the religious orders were largely responsible for the exploration and settlement of so much of our two continents. To carry on successful negotiations with the Latin American republics, it is imperatively essential to employ those who understand the Latin temperament. In the southwest, many of our States have more than mere vestiges of Spanish culture and tradition. My own State, New Mexico, is an outstanding example; even now, we are celebrating the quadricentennial of Coronado's explorations. We have many able and public-spirited citizens who would be happy to collaborate in this work of drawing closer, of knitting more firmly the ties of affection and of real need that bind our continents and our peoples to each other.

Our indifference to the pleas of the Argentine Republic when the British took possession of the Falkland Islands in 1833, 10 years after the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine, guaranteeing territorial integrity in general, did not help to improve our relations with Latin America. It is common knowledge that this matter of the Falkland Islands motivated the Argentine delegates in adopting a reservation to the understanding relative to the foreign colonies reached at Habana.

Similar indifference to the British seizure of Belize or British Honduras in 1835 in spite of the protests of Central America resulted in further resentment throughout Latin America.

Certainly our representatives at the Habana conference in arriving at an understanding with the Latin American delegates were also concerned with the resources available in Latin America, as for example, tin from Bolivia and rubber from Brazil. They are vital to our defense needs; our dependence on extra-American sources of supply must end.

President Wilson understood the state of mind of the people of Latin America and how the nations of Latin America felt toward the United States because of certain of the incidents impairing our relations with South America and Central America that I have mentioned. By way of making reparation and in recognition of Colombia's claims, Congress was prevailed upon to appropriate $25,000,000 to be paid to that country.

And so the Habana Conference. This and similar conferences have accomplished much by affording opportunities for discussion and the achievement of a better understanding. But these conferences alone are not sufficient. Notwithstanding the good intentions of our delegates and their efforts to dissuade our Latin American conferees from their suspicion of the motives of the United States—and there is no question about the good faith of Secretary Hull—yet, there must be concrete results, actual tangible evidence of that feeling of solidarity in which lies the real solution to our defense problem. It can make or break this hemisphere.

For several years I have had a positive plan for the improvement of our Latin American relations. As early as August 10, 1937, I urged the Senate to direct its attention to South America where our natural interests are and where untold resources and buried wealth lie waiting for the investment of a limited amount of capital. I have frequently urged the utilization of the talents and abilities of our people of the great Southwest; their background lends itself most completely to the successful conduct of negotiations with the nations of Latin America (81 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 8601–8603).

On March 3, 1938, I urged the establishment of a Government short-wave radio station for the primary purpose of improving our relations with Latin America. Shortly before I had introduced a bill to accomplish this, but apparently the Congress was not yet aware how alarmingly close the peril was even then. No action was taken.

Fearing the direction that our foreign policy might take when, more than a year ago, events in Europe seemed to be extending a formal invitation to the four horsemen of the Apocalypse to wreak general havoc and destruction, I spoke over a national network on May 11, 1939, urging this country to choose the road to peace—peace by pan-Americanism.

During the neutrality debate on October 25, 1939, I offered a solution which called for the substitution of profits out of peace for profits out of war and recommended the adoption of the following six-point program:

1. Develop our national defense—at peacetime prices for labor and materials—to such a point that no nation or combination of nations will dare attack us.

2. Cultivate our economic relations with Latin America; if necessary, by subsidizing our shipping.

3. Provide funds for the construction of a Nicaraguan Canal, and possibly the Mexican-Tehuantepec Canal, through an understanding with Mexico.

4. Build additional transcontinental highways to and through Latin America comparable to the projected pan-American highway.

5. Under suitable guaranties, arrange for long-term investments in improvements of a permanent nature, such as utilities, including transportation facilities, communications, and water-power resources.

6. Enlarge the facilities of the Panama Canal.

That was more than 9 months ago, and we are just beginning to take the necessary steps in that, the right direction. It is gratifying to note that all but the third of the foregoing recommendations are now being carried out by the Government.

Again, on April 2, 1940, on the floor of the Senate, while speaking on reciprocal trade agreements, I referred to the necessity of eliminating uncertain sources of vital raw materials and concentrating on those that would remain available in times of emergency. Specifically, I referred to manganese which can be obtained from Brazil, if necessary, althought my own State has a quantity available which should be developed so as to overcome our dependence on Russia.

Just a month ago, on July 8, 1940, in another broadcast, I emphasized the absolute necessity of effective action in Latin America, stressing some of the means whereby we could improve our new vital relations with the southern continent. I recommended: (1) Facilitation of travel and intercourse by Government grants to airways and steamship lines; (2) completion of the pan-American highway and a network of roads radiating therefrom; (3) speeding up of news services, cable and radio facilities, and their improvement; (4) immediate development of tin, rubber, and other strategic resources essential to our national defense; (5) immediate abandonment of all supercilious and condescendingly patronizing airs of superiority toward all things and peoples Latin American; (6) raising the standard of living by sound economic assistance; and (7) utilization of a personnel for the promotion of a better understanding with Latin America whose members are acquainted with the Latin American psychology and temperament because of their heritage, linguistic qualifications, and racial attributes.

Now, while there is yet time, let us turn our faces resolutely to the south—where opportunity beckons; where productive investments will lead to permanent peace with profit. Our national-defense needs dictate an immediate understanding with Latin America.

While some of the resolutions and declarations of the Habana Conference may never materialize concretely, yet this conference, perhaps more than any other, signalizes the results of actual good will and understanding. Suspicion has vanished. The 21 countries trust each other; not, as in the past, did they merely meet, smile, talk, eat—and forget; nor was there any feeling that some country had a hatchet to bury in its neighbor during the conference. The disappearance of suspicion, the actual desire to trust the conference and its program, irrespective of its formal understanding, had more to do with furthering peace and economic welfare than anything that has been done heretofore.

President Roosevelt has said that this generation has a rendezvous with destiny; from the bottom of my heart, from the uttermost depths of my being, I hope and pray the Almighty God that that destiny may not be death on the battlefield.

Transfer of Destroyers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to the editor of the New York Times under date of August 10, 1940, by Charles C. Burlingham, Thomas D. Thacher, George Rublee, and Dean Acheson, relative to legal aspects of the transfer of destroyers to Great Britain.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of August 10, 1940]

NO LEGAL BAR SEEN TO TRANSFER OF DESTROYERS—AMPLE AUTHORITY FOR SALE OF OVER AGED NAVAL VESSELS TO GREAT BRITAIN EXISTS IN PRESENT LAWS, ACCORDING TO OPINION BY LEADING LAWYERS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The policy of the United States to aid nations resisting aggression is not based on sentiment alone. It is rooted in very real and material interests of this country. Both major political parties are pledged to the extension of such aid so far as is consistent with law and the interests of our own national self-defense.

We are told, and it is not seriously disputed, that Great Britain urgently needs more destroyers to help her resist invasion by Nazi Germany. That invasion is about to be launched from neutral ports and territories which the Nazis have seized, contrary to international law, to use as bases for their armed aggression against Britain.

In the present state of the world, the maintenance of British sea power is of inestimable advantage to us in terms of our own national defense. Since General Pershing's speech, on the evening of August 4, there can be no question that there is the highest military and naval authority in support of the view that the release of at least 50 of our overage destroyers for sale to Great Britain is not only compatible with, but is vitally important to, the safeguarding of our own national defense. If Great Britain is able to resist German aggression and maintain her sea power, the danger of German aggression being directed against us in the immediate future is enormously reduced. Even if Great Britain should be forced to yield ultimately, the longer she holds the more time we shall have to strengthen our defense and the more time it will take Germany to repair and rehabilitate her armaments before she will be able to launch an attack on the Western Hemisphere.

NO TIME TO BE LOST

It has been suggested that fresh legislative authority is required to permit the executive branch of the Government to release these old destroyers for sale to Great Britain. We should like to place on record our own legal opinion that this is not the case.

Whatever might be our views on the law, we would not suggest Executive action without congressional approval if we believed that a majority of the Congress was opposed to such action. But believing, as we do, that the preponderating opinion both in and out of the Congress favors such action, we are loath to see time lost to secure authority which already exists when time may be vital to the preservation of our own liberties.

During the battle of France a number of our naval planes were transferred from the Navy Department to the War Department under the provisions of the act of July 11, 1919 (ch. 9, 41 Stat. 132, U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1274), which provides that: "The interchange without compensation therefor of military stores, supplies, and equipment of every character, including real estate owned by the Government, is hereby authorized between the Army and the Navy upon the request of the head of one service and with the approval of the head of the other service."

SERVICE PLANES SOLD

Immediately after such transfer the Secretary of War released the planes to private manufacturers under the provisions of the act of July 9, 1918 (ch. 143, 40 Stat. 849, U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1272), which provides: "Subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, motor-propelled vehicles, airplanes, engines, parts thereof, balloons, and appurtenances may be exchanged in part payment for new equipment of the same or similar character to be used for the same purposes as those proposed to be exchanged." The private manufacturers at once sold the planes to the Allies.

Shortly thereafter the Congress, by the act of July 2, 1940 (H. R. 9850, Public, No. 703) broadened the authority of the Secretary of War so that the power to make exchanges should not be limited to any particular kind of equipment. That act authorizes the Secretary of War "to enter into such contracts (including contracts for educational orders and for the exchange of deteriorated, unserviceable, obsolescent, or surplus military equipment, munitions, and supplies, for other military equipment, munitions, and supplies of which there is a shortage) and to amend or supplement such existing contracts as he may deem necessary to carry out the purpose specified in this section."

VETO POWER PROVIDED

In order, however, to assure that the technical heads of the Army and Navy might veto the release of ships, equipment, or supplies deemed by them essential to our own safety, the following section was inserted in the act of June 28, 1940 (H. R. 9822, Public, No. 671):

"SEC. 14. (a) Notwithstanding the provision of any other law, no military or naval weapon, ship, boat, aircraft, munitions, supplies, or equipment, to which the United States has title, in whole or in part, or which have been contracted for, shall hereafter be transferred, exchanged, sold, or otherwise disposed of in any manner whatsoever unless the Chief of Naval Operations, in the case of naval material, and the Chief of Staff of the Army, in the case of military material, shall first certify that such material is not essential to the defense of the United States.

"(b) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, are hereby requested and directed to furnish or cause to be furnished to the respective chairmen of the Committees on Military Affairs and the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives a copy of each contract, order, or agreement covering exchange of deteriorated, unserviceable, obsolescent, or surplus military or naval equipment, munitions, or supplies exchanged for other military or naval equipment, munitions, or supplies, and a copy of each contract, order, or agreement shall be furnished regarding any other disposition of military or naval equipment, munitions, and supplies by which the title passes, either de jure or de facto, from the United States, or by which delivery of material thereunder is deferred, where the original cost of such military or naval equipment, munitions, or supplies exceeded or exceeds $2,000. The copies of each contract, order, or agreement herein referred to shall be transmitted to the respective chairmen of the committees not later than 24 hours after such contract, order, or agreement is made, and the chairmen of each committee shall consider such contracts, orders, or agreements confidential, unless a majority of the members of his committee shall direct the particular transaction to be made public."

Although some effort was made to place more drastic restrictions on Executive authority, the Congress deliberately refrained from going further than requiring the certification of the Chief of Naval Operations or the Chief of Staff of the Army. And again when efforts were made to place further restrictions on Executive authority in the Naval Act of July 19, 1940 (H. R. 10100, Public, No. 757), the Congress deliberately refrained from going further than providing that "no vessel, ship, or boat (except ship's boats) now in the United States Navy or being built or hereafter built therefor, shall be disposed of by sale or otherwise, or be chartered or scrapped, except as now provided by law."

INTENT OF CONGRESS

In light of the fact that the Congress has provided for the free interchange of supplies and equipment between the Army and Navy, there is no reason to suppose that the Congress generally intended stricter rules to be applied to the release of naval supplies and equipment than to the release of military supplies and equipment. And this would seem to be particularly true in view of the fact that after naval planes had been transferred to the Army for the purpose of permitting their release to private manufacturers on an exchange basis, the Congress chose to enlarge rather than to restrict authority of the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for the exchange of obsolescent equipment for new equipment, and conditioned the exercise of such authority solely upon the certification of the appropriate staff officer that such obsolescent equipment was not essential to national defense.

If it should be the opinion of the appropriate staff officers of both armed services, as it is the opinion of General Pershing, that the requirements of our national defense would be served rather than hurt by the release of some of our overage destroyers for sale to the British, there should be no legal bar to effectuating their release under existing statutory authority.

It is true that on June 24 a ruling of the Attorney General was announced to the effect that private builders who were constructing new torpedo boats for the account of the Navy could not, even with the consent of the Navy, complete such boats to the order of a belligerent government. The Attorney General indicated that the sending out of the country by a private builder of a vessel of war built to enter the service of a belligerent would be a violation of section 3 of title V of the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 (ch. 30, 40 Stat. 222, U. S. C., title 18, sec. 33), and possibly also of section 23 of title 18 of the United States Code.

It is clear, in our judgment, that neither these statutory provisions nor the views expressed by the Attorney General stand in the way of the sale to a belligerent of armed ships, like our old destroyers, which were not built or completed to the order of a belligerent.

SECTION NOT APPLICABLE

Section 23 of title 18 of the United States Code is obviously not applicable to ships which were neither built nor equipped with a view to their entering the service of a belligerent power. The section reads as follows:

"Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, fits out and arms, or attempts to fit out and arm, or procures to be fitted out and armed, or knowingly is concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any vessel with intent that such vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, or whoever issues or delivers a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for any vessel, to the intent that she may be so employed, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than 3 years. * * *"

In The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheat. 283), the United States Supreme Court held that the statute did not apply to the commercial sale of an armed vessel to a belligerent when there was no evidence that it was originally outfitted contrary to law. Justice Story stated that "there is nothing in our laws or in the laws of nations that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale."

Section 3 of title V of the Espionage Act of 1917 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 33) also is, in our opinion, inapplicable to armed vessels, like our old destroyers, which were not built, armed, or equipped as, or converted into, vessels of war with the intent that they should enter the service of a belligerent. That section must be read in conjunction with the section which precedes it, and in the light of the rules of international law which both the then Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, and the Congress stated the statute was aimed to fulfill (H. Rept. No. 30, 65th Cong., 1st sess., p. 9). These rules are clearly stated by Dr. Lauterpacht in his fifth edition (September 1935) of Oppenheim's International Law, volume 11, section 334:

"Whereas a neutral is in nowise obliged by his duty of impartiality to prevent his subjects from selling armed vessels to the belligerents, such armed vessels being merely contraband of war, a neutral is bound to employ the means at his disposal to prevent his subjects from building, fitting out, or arming, to the order of either belligerent, vessels intended to be used as men-of-war, and to prevent the departure from his jurisdiction of any vessel which, by order of either belligerent, has been adapted to warlike use."

Section 2 of title V of the Espionage Act of 1917 (ch. 30, 40 Stat. 221, U. S. C., title 18, sec. 32) recognizes the right of American and foreign citizens to take armed vessels out of the jurisdiction of the United States for sale to belligerents, provided that assurance is given when clearance is applied for that this sale or delivery will not take place within the jurisdiction of the United States or on the high seas. It provides as follows:

"During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, may detain any armed vessel owned wholly or in part by American citizens, or any vessel, domestic or foreign (other than one which has entered the ports of the United States as a public vessel), which is manifestly built for warlike purposes or has been converted or adapted from a private vessel to one suitable for warlike use, until the owner or master, or person having charge of such vessel, shall furnish proof satisfactory to the President, or to the person duly authorized by him, that the vessel will not be employed by the said owners, or master, or person having charge thereof, to cruise against or commit or attempt to commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince, or state, or of any colony, district, or people with which the United States is at peace, and that the said vessel will not be sold or delivered to any belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, by them or any of them, within the jurisdiction of the United States, or, having left that jurisdiction, upon the high seas."

DILIGENCE DEMANDED

The next section (sec. 3) enforces the obligation of the neutral state to use diligence to prevent building or arming of vessels of war to the order of or for delivery to a belligerent. That section provides:

"During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall be or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States."

In other words, the correct construction of the section, in our opinion, is that vessels built, armed, or equipped as vessels of war with the intent or under any agreement to deliver them to belligerents or with reasonable cause to believe that they will be so delivered, may not be sent out of the jurisdiction of the United States. It does not mean that no vessels of war may be sent with such intent or under such agreement. Two reasons lead to, if they do not compel, this conclusion:

First, any other conclusion nullifies that portion of the preceding section which limits the President's authority to detain armed vessels owned by American or foreign citizens applying for clearance until such time as he is assured that they will not be used by such owners for hostile purposes, and that they will not be sold or delivered to a belligerent within the jurisdiction of the United States or on the high seas. He has no authority under the statute (the provisions of the Neutrality Act of 1939 are discussed below) to detain them if assured that the sale and delivery to a belligerent is to take place in a belligerent or neutral port. This is clearly incompatible with a construction of section 3 which would make the departure of any armed vessel for sale to a belligerent illegal.

GREGORY'S DRAFT

Second, the language here involved was drafted by the then Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, who pointed out (1916 Annual Report of the Attorney General, pp. 15–16) that the section was directed to the rule of international law which he quoted as follows: "The first rule of the Treaty of Washington requires a neutral country to 'use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping [within its jurisdiction] of any vessel which it has reasonable grounds to believe is intended to cruise [or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace].'"

Neither the Attorney General nor the Congress indicated in any way that the section was intended to go beyond fulfillment of the rule of international law as there stated. To construe section 3 as forbidding any sale of war vessels to belligerents would impose restrictions upon the citizens of neutral states not required by international law, as well as introducing irreconcilable inconsistencies within the act itself. To construe it as we have done fulfills in every respect the obligations intended by the Attorney General and makes the act a consistent whole.

Nor does the Neutrality Act of November 4, 1939 (ch. 2, U. S. C., title 22, sec. 245j–1), interpose any legal bar to the release of the destroyers to the British. Under that act the vessels may lawfully be taken out of the United States to a belligerent port provided title is first transferred from the American owner. Such transfer of title could be made under the act to a foreign neutral individual or corporation.

We believe that we are entirely justified in the view that the powers granted by law to dispose of these destroyers would only be exercised where, in the considered opinion of those responsible for our national safety, their exercise would increase our powers of defense. General Pershing is high authority for the view that the transfer itself may be a vital factor in keeping war from our shores. It is quite possible that in connection with the transfer arrangements might be made which would increase our defensive power in this hemisphere.

These destroyers are now built, armed, and equipped. It cannot by the farthest stretch of the imagination be said that they were built, armed, or equipped to the order of any belligerent, or with the intent that they should enter the service of any belligerent. If they are now released to private contractors, there is no insuperable legal barrier which stands in the way of their sale to the British in a manner compatible with the provisions of the Neutrality Act.

There is no reason for us to put a strained or unnecessary interpretation on our own statutes contrary to our own national interests. There is no reason to extend the rules of international law, beyond the limits generally accepted by other nations, to the detriment of our own country.

When vital interests of the United States are at stake, when the sentiment of the country is clear, the Government should not hesitate to exercise powers under existing law. To seek an unnecessary reaffirmation of these powers from the Congress now would be to run a serious danger of delay, and by delay possibly to endanger the vital interests of the people of the country in keeping war from our own shores.

The Pershing Broadcast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURTON K. WHEELER
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL IN THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the August 10, 1940, issue of a great Democratic newspaper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 10, 1940]

WHO INSPIRED THE PERSHING BROADCAST?

So that the people may know what forces are behind the proposal to send 50 American destroyers to help England, the Post-Dispatch has done some exploring into the background of General Pershing's speech of last Sunday. The findings are not complete, but they are most informative. Indeed, the curtain of silence and secrecy encountered at various points is highly significant in itself.

Joseph Alsop, columnist and zealous Anglophile, arranged for the broadcast, but now asserts "it would be wiser" for him to say nothing about it. The day after the Pershing speech, his column endorsed the proposal. Walter Lippmann, another columnist who wrote an article this week endorsing it, says General Pershing asked him to talk over the address, but declines to say who else participated. The general's aide, Colonel Adamson, says several persons, whom he would not name, had urged the general to make the speech. Pershing, who holds the key to the mystery, refuses to be interviewed about the speech or its origin. Just why all this disinclination to speak on the part of Messrs. Alsop, Lippmann, Adamson, and Pershing?

Enough has come out to prove conclusively that the speech was part of a concerted campaign to send destroyers to England—an action which would, in the opinion of competent experts, weaken American defenses and constitute an act of war. The choice of General Pershing to put it before the public was a canny move. He is a military hero, a venerated figure. Isn't it likely that some shrewd mind considered him the ideal person to answer another popular hero, Colonel Lindbergh, who was scheduled to make an anti-interventionist broadcast?

The people are entitled to know the full facts as to the origin and inspiration of the Pershing speech. The mystery of his sudden emergence from retirement, at almost 80, to make this plea ought to be cleared up. General Pershing is still an officer of the United States Army. It would be entirely proper for a committee of Congress to call on him, and the other figures in this strange episode, to tell the full story. It is vital that Congress and the people know exactly what is going on backstage in Washington in these crucial times. A congressional investigation is assuredly in order.

Civilian Conservation Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY FREDERIC J. HASKIN AND RÉSUMÉ OF CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS WORK FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, material assistance has been given to many thousands of homes in America by the creation of the Civilian Conservation Corps. Youths who might have become derelicts have been given instruction in manual training, with an opportunity to improve their physical condition, making them better citizens. Boys who might have drifted into crime have been spared such a life. They have been able to send to their homes, to needy dependents, millions of dollars.

They have built for the future by planting trees, they have built for the present by construction of roads, trails, bridges, and telephone lines. They have prevented the destruction of our forests by fighting fires. They have helped in irrigation and soil erosion work by the construction of dams. Probably the greatest service of all is that their bodies have been built to splendid physical manhood and will be the bedrock of our national defense.

I wish to offer for the RECORD an article written by Mr. Frederic J. Haskin, which covers the activities of this program. I may say that the Civilian Conservation Corps is merely one of the institutions which has been inaugurated under the New Deal for the benefit of the public welfare, and particularly it has given a chance to the underprivileged.

Also, I wish to include a résumé from the New York Times.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRAISES RECORD OF C. C. C. CAMPS

(By Frederic J. Haskin)

When history records its true appraisal of the emergency legislation enacted during the depression years, it is evident that the work of the Civilian Conservation Corps will rank high in the Government's attempts to combat an economic collapse.

The C. C. C. has possibly received more praise and less criticism than any other experiment by the New Deal. This agency has not only provided work under healthful conditions for more than 2,500,000 young men, but has given them opportunity to obtain valuable vocational training.

The C. C. C. program was initiated on March 20, 1933, when President Roosevelt sent to Congress a message urging adoption of legislation under which a vast army of idle young men could be given employment through the performance of useful public work in connection with the conservation and development of the natural resources of the United States. Congress passed the legislation on March 31, and the corps was established on April 5.

For many years the public has increasingly regarded conserving and restoring the forests and lands of the Nation as an opportunity through which young men could obtain their first experience and training in real work. The C. C. C. program gave practical expression to this sentiment.

When the first enrollees went to camp they were referred to as a weaponless army whose recruits came from broken homes, highway trails, and relief shelters, but an army that carried implements of production and not death-dealing devices.

The corps has definite and constructive purposes. One of these is the conservation of natural resources, and is regarded as an achievement of importance. No less realistic and important is its purpose in advancing personal and social objectives. The corps is also successfully engaged in the conservation of human resources.

Camps of the C. C. C. are especially well adapted to the needs and interests of those eligible for enrollment—unmarried youths between the ages of 17 and 23 who have completed their formal schooling and who have had little or no opportunity to develop work qualifications.

An enrollee in the C. C. C. soon begins to adjust himself to camp life and makes physical improvement. Moreover, he is no longer idle and dependent on others. He not only is self-supporting but from his cash allowance of $30 a month sends home to his dependents a minimum of $22 a month. If he has no dependents, the Government keeps this monthly sum for him until he leaves the corps, when he receives the total.

Since establishment of the corps, enrollees have contributed more than $575,000,000 to approximately 11,000,000 needy dependents. At present the strength of the corps is 300,000, although approximately 1,780,000 persons are receiving benefits through its program.

Enrollees work 8 hours a day, 5 days a week, except in cases of emergency. The projects on which they are engaged include reforestation, park development, soil and wildlife conservation. After work hours the men are at liberty to study, attend classes, read in the library, which is included in each camp, or engage in other recreational activities of their choosing.

The C. C. C. takes the position that it should do more than give a young man a job and security while he is in the corps and at the end of his enrollment send him home with improved health, morale, and self-confidence. It holds that during his enrollment every effort should be made to increase his employability so that he may find work when he leaves the corps. To further this, an educational and training program is an important part of each C. C. C. camp. The educational opportunities open to the individual enrollee after completion of his work hours range from the course for the elimination of illiteracy to courses in technical subjects of college level.

Among the very few critics of the C. C. C. are certain individuals who contend that it is Army training. The agency was never so designed, and those who have taken the time to understand its workings do not support this contention. However, if war should come, the millions who have been trained through C. C. C. activities will be better fitted to serve their country, and obviously better able to protect themselves.

Young men trained in C. C. C. camps are specialists in a dozen or more fields. Thousands of them know the practical workings of engines. Among them are expert truck and tractor drivers and expert mechanics and linemen. There are also radio operators, carpenters, cooks, and photographers, and in the far Northwest C. C. C. enrollees use airplanes in fighting forest fires. Along with the pilot go expert parachutists, who jump from planes to fight isolated fires in backwoods areas where no truck trail leads. Indeed the C. C. C. is the largest and best vocational school in the world.

The long list of C. C. C. accomplishments in the conservation and development of this country's natural resources gives one a higher appreciation of the country's young men. Their accomplishments include such high lights as 1,753,000,000 trees planted for reforestation purposes; more than 114,000 miles of roads and truck trails constructed, largely through forest areas; more than 75,000 miles of telephone lines built to improve forest and park communications; some 47,000 bridges built; about 4,000 look-out houses and towers erected to improve forest-fire detection; fire hazards reduced on about 2,000,000 acres; approximately 3,500,000 acres of forest stands improved; more than 5,450,000 check dams constructed to prevent soil erosion; about 1,000 new State parks and related areas developed for recreational use, and in excess of 5,000,000 man-days spent fighting forest fires.

Although the C. C. C. was inaugurated as an emergency measure, it has developed into an established institution. With so few schools having vocational-training classes and employment at its best not too favorable to young men when they leave school, the C. C. C. serves as a great training agency. In all the multiplicity of plans to help the youth of the Nation, it has evolved the most practical and constructive means to an end.

[From the New York Times]

The Civilian Conservation Corps, now holding attention because it has been called upon to further the national-defense program by training young men in technical skills, has this record of achievement since it was established in 1933:

Men enrolled	2,500,000
Sent home by enrollees to needy dependents	$593,000,000
Trees planted	1,816,000,000
Miles of truck trails or minor roads built	113,000
Bridges built	43,000
Miles of telephone lines constructed	78,000
Man-days spent fighting forest fires	5,601,056
Erosion control check dams built	5,200,000
Acres of forest stands improved to aid growth	3,625,000

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ATLANTIC CITY DAILY WORLD

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Daily World, published in Atlantic City, N. J., on the subject matter of the draft bill now under consideration before the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlantic City Daily World]

TO CONQUER POLAND, 17 DAYS—TO LAY WASTE FRANCE, 20 DAYS—ACTION ON CONSCRIPT BILL, 47 DAYS

Unprecedented in the peacetime history of the United States was the vote passed in the Senate to mobilize 360,000 National Guard men and Army Reserves for home defense and authorizing the dispatch of these men to South America, if necessary, to enforce the Monroe Doctrine against any foreign aggressor.

The vote of 71 to 7 in favor of the bill represents the consensus of opinions held by United States citizens—to protect our land, to protect the rights embodied in those first 10 amendments to the Constitution—our Bill of Rights.

However, prior to the voting on the mobilization bill, the Senators were faced with the problem of restricting the movement of sending these men outside the confines of the United States or its Territories and possessions, including the Philippine Islands.

This is where the divided opinion was shown. This amendment was defeated by 1 vote—39 to 38.

It shows one very important point: We are not fully cognizant of the fact that it is not 48 States which we must defend now, but an entire hemisphere.

If Europe wishes to reach us, they must come here. They won't set up arms plants and airplane bases in Atlantic City, but will choose some spot in either South or Central America. Most of the other countries in this hemisphere are not strong enough to combat the dictator nations who would seek to have our Constitution torn and sprinkled in the smoldering ruins of Europe's battlefields, but we are—if we mobilize our forces now.

"Now" means today and not a month from now. The 47 days spent in considering compulsory military training is but 30 days more than it took Hitler to conquer Poland and but 27 days more than he needed to lay France beneath his heel in the Battle of France.

The world today is not moving in such periods as 48 days to change history. It's done in a few days. This is why our Congressmen must act rapidly.

It took the United States almost a full year to wake up to the fact that Hitler was taking over Europe. We don't have half that time before we find he is looking in our direction to lay definite plans for possible conquest.

Agreement Between Tennessee Valley Authority and the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. H. SCHWARTZ

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

MEMORANDUM COVERING PRESENT AND PAST RELATIONS

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a memorandum of the agreement effective August 6, 1940, between the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council, covering present and past relations between the Authority and organized labor in construction work, and providing for collective bargaining, and that work shall continue during any negotiation that may arise.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Renewed assurance of intensified labor-management cooperation in the national-defense program of the Tennessee Valley Authority came today as the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council announced jointly that they had signed an agreement between the Authority and its 8,000 employees in the building construction and metal trades. The announcement was made through Sam E. Roper, president of the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council, and Arthur S. Jandrey, Director of Personnel of the T. V. A. The agreement, formalizing more than 6 years of amicable labor relations, improves machinery of conference through formal recognition of the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council and provides for mediation facilities designed to assure uninterrupted work during the course of negotiations and settlement of disputes. While disputes are in process of settlement, the unions agree not to encourage or sanction strikes. Provisions of the agreement in this respect are similar to those embodied in the Railway Labor Act.

The agreement defines and secures the benefits of joint labor-management conference and action. It also recognizes that union membership is conducive to the furtherance of the purposes and benefits of the agreement itself. The council and the Authority point out that almost all employees in the trades and labor classifications with which the agreement is concerned are members of the unions affiliated with the council. In many of the trades union membership approximates 100 percent.

The employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority in the trades and labor classifications covered by the agreement are working at numerous locations in the valley on dam construction, transmission-line construction, hydroplant operations, property maintenance, and in the fertilizer works. The Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council is the central body through which various unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor cooperate in representing these employees of the Authority in all negotiations. Conferences leading to the agreement have been in progress for more than a year, with major assistance from Otto S. Beyer of the National Mediation Board. The following international unions are now affiliated with the council and will deal with the Authority through the council under the terms of the agreement:

Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers; International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers, and Helpers; International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; International Hod Carriers, Building, and Common Laborers' Union; International Union of Operating Engineers; Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; International Union of Wood, Wire, and Metal Lathers; Operative Plasterers and Cement Finishers' International Association; United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters; United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners; Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers' International Union; International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen, and Helpers; International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers.

The Tennessee Valley Authority Act and the purposes for which it was established serve as the keynote of this joint agreement. The agreement specifically stipulates:

"The Tennessee Valley Authority and the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council recognize that cooperation between management and employees is indispensable to the accomplishment of the public purposes for which the Tennessee Valley Authority has been established as set forth in the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of May 18, 1933, as amended, and recognize that such cooperation rests squarely on clear-cut mutual understandings between the Authority and its employees arrived at through the processes of collective bargaining."

The agreement further provides that:

"The public interest in an undertaking such as the T. V. A. always being paramount, the Authority and the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council on behalf of the employees further agree that pending the determination or adjustment of any issue arising between them by means of the conference machinery and procedure hereby set up and during the life of this agreement the Authority will not change the conditions incorporated in written schedules or recorded understandings between the Authority and the Council out of which the issue arose, and the council or its member organizations will not encourage or sanction employees leaving the service."

Representatives of the Authority and of the unions view this agreement as formal recognition of a program of responsible collective bargaining and constructive joint effort which was initiated over 6 years ago. It is the consummation of the comprehensive joint relationship to which the Tennessee Valley Authority Board and employees looked forward at the time the Authority's employee relationship policy was adopted in August 1935. That policy is made a part of the agreement just signed. The agreement itself is the result of over 6 years' practical experience, study, and work by representatives of the Authority and of the council. During the 6-year relationship between the unions and the Authority, 6 large dams have been completed, 4 more are under construction, 2,100 miles of transmission lines and 4,400 miles of rural lines have been constructed, 405,000 electricity customers are being served, developing T. V. A. revenues now grossing $15,000,000 a year, and 289,000 tons of concentrated experimental fertilizer have been produced, without a single substantial stoppage of work due to labor disputes between the Authority and its employees.

The agreement provides for the effective and rapid handling of jurisdictional questions, employee grievances, and labor disputes, and for the increased efficiency and uninterrupted work on the Authority's program of dam construction, flood control, navigation, power production, experimental chemical manufacture, and national defense. It creates joint conference machinery to regulate and determine labor conditions and labor standards, to promote education and training of employees, to improve efficiency and economy in construction and operation, and to prevent hazards to health, life, and property.

Under this agreement, as in the past, wage rates are made the subject of annual conferences for the purpose of reaching joint determination of prevailing rates of pay in the Tennessee Valley. The Tennessee Valley Authority Act requires the Authority to pay the prevailing wage rates in the vicinity with due regard for rates secured through collective agreement by representatives of employers and employees.

An article provides for the maintenance of an adequate system of apprenticeship in the skilled trades to be administered by a central joint apprenticeship council under standards approved by the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship.

Another article of the agreement of particular interest recognizes that the Authority is responsible for performing the duties assigned to it by law and must therefore assign work to maintain schedules and to meet construction, operating, and service requirements. This article goes on to stipulate that the labor unions shall determine the jurisdictional boundaries between and among the several participating unions. The Authority agrees to make work assignments according to such determinations, thus disposing of a type of labor dispute which might disrupt morale and efficiency of the service.

The agreement was signed by appropriate representatives of the council and of the Authority, to become effective August 6, 1940.

Ireland's Stand in the Present War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

INTERVIEW WITH MR. FRANK AIKEN, MINISTER OF DEFENSE FOR EIRE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, Ireland is practically the only small nation left in Europe. Nevertheless, it is making a gallant effort to maintain its neutral rights in the face of its dangerous position as an independent nation.

The Government of Eire, under the premiership of Mr. De Valera, is entitled to the generous support and encouragement of the liberty-loving people of the whole world. Its courageous stand for its rights as a neutral nation is inspiring to all Americans. I am confident that, with the spirit they are exhibiting, they will ward off any threat of violation of their neutrality.

Mr. Frank Aiken, Minister of Defense for Eire, has recently given an interview which explodes the propaganda which has been carried in the press and explains the stand taken by the Irish people in the present war. I have here a transcript of that interview and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Frank Aiken, Minister of Defense for Eire, in an exclusive interview for National Broadcasting Co. listeners on the Fourth of July, said that if Ireland is attacked she will ask aid from the opposition.

Interviewed in Eire by Dennis Johnson, prominent author and publisher, the Eire Minister of Defense said: "There are two sides to every war, you know, and if we are attacked by one belligerent, we shall certainly be helped by the other. And we will ask help if events prove we are not able to beat off the attacks with our own resources."

The Irish official gave facts and figures on defense and alien migration into the Irish Free State and outlined defense plans.

The complete text of the interview as transcribed from the air by the National Broadcasting Co. in New York follows:

"Mr. JOHNSON. You know, Mr. Aiken, a great many quarters are greatly concerned about the possibility of Ireland's being invaded. Now, do you feel that you can tell your American listeners whether there is any basis for these?

"Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Johnson, so far as these 28 counties of which the Irish people have effective control are concerned, there is no legitimate reason why we should be attacked by either side. We have declared our neutrality. We did it in the exercise of our national right. That declaration received the practically unanimous consent of our people, and we have abided strictly by the laws of neutrality since hostilities began. In fact, in order to avoid giving any excuse for an attack upon us, we have avoided doing a lot of things the laws permit neutrals to do.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Do you expect any scrupulous observer of neutrality will really have——

"Mr. AIKEN. Well, Mr. Johnson, all I can say is that we are neutral. We have a right to be neutral. We expect our neutrality to be respected. In the last resort, we are prepared to defend our rights to the utmost of our strength and resources.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but I think what England would like to know is whether you are strong enough to defend those rights successfully against a large belligerent power.

"Mr. AIKEN. Well, we are not—that is, alone we are not. But there are two sides to every war, you know, and if we are attacked by one belligerent we shall certainly be helped by the other, if we ask for help.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Do you think, in the second instance, you would ask for help?

"Mr. AIKEN. Yes; we would; that if, of course, if events proved we were not able to beat off the attacks with our own resources.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Aiken, you are being very careful. I notice you have been talking about the war for quite a while and you haven't mentioned the name of a single belligerent so far.

"Mr. AIKEN. Of course not, Mr. Johnson. The situation is much too serious. You have noticed, I am sure, that the name of Ireland has been bandied about rather ominously these days on all sides. As an assistant of Mr. De Valera said recently, we are a small state in the midst of warring giants. In such circumstances we cannot afford to trade our coat, even if we wanted to, and so we are far from wanting to.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Does that matter very much these days, Mr. Aiken?

"Mr. AIKEN. Oh, yes; I think it does. We are determined to act in such a manner that if we are ever attacked it would be clearly an unwarranted and unjust attack, an attack so unjust that our people would resist it with the greatest vigor.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but are they in a position to resist? I mean, some people seem to think, for instance, there hasn't been a very good response to the recruiting appeal.

"Mr. AIKEN. Well, now, I don't know what you mean by good. But in an actual week about 90,000 men have enrolled, and of these a large number are trained soldiers.

"Mr. JOHNSON. That sounds like a pretty high percentage of the population.

Mr. AIKEN. It is; yes; it is a pretty high percentage. It would correspond to a figure of, say, 1,350,000 in the United States.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I see.

"Mr. AIKEN. When we started a month ago, recruiting was a bit slow for the first week. You know how difficult it is to make people realize the danger of which there is no immediate signs. But now they are enrolling in increasing numbers every day. It seems to me practically the whole of the able-bodied men in the country are prepared to fight, if we had arms for them all. If we fail, it won't be for want of men or of the will to fight, or of a good cause.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Well, that, of course, brings me to the very next point: The question of arms. It has been said that although you may not be short of men, you have not got the arms to equip them with.

"Mr. AIKEN. Well, we haven't all the arms we would like; but we are much better off now than at any time in our history. We shall try to get more, of course; but what we have we shall use effectively, I hope. We may be beaten even, of course, but we won't lie down until we are knocked down, and I guarantee that our overthrow would not be achieved without cost.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Well, there is another point, Mr. Aiken. There has been a lot of talk recently about 'fifth columnists.' Do you think there is anything in it so far as Ireland is concerned?

"Mr. AIKEN. No; at least there is very little. It is largely a scare story built on half-truths. We have, of course, a number of men who have preferred to use forceful political opposition. For centuries, as you know, we had no other effective means to redress political grievances and the traditions thus established die hard. But it is wrong to say that we haven't very large numbers of Irishmen who would help on our side in an attack on this part of the country. We had unfortunately, before the present developments in European affairs, to imprison about 500 people whose activities were a danger to the state. We feared also that any sporadic acts of undiscipline might encourage outsiders to think we were not a united and disciplined people. But at no time in our history, I think, have we shown a greater unity of purpose and a greater solidarity—the solidarity that our people are showing in this crisis to defend our neutrality.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I see. Well, so much for Irishmen. What about all the aliens who are here?

"Mr. AIKEN. Supposed to be here? You should say.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Maybe I should put it that way.

"Mr. AIKEN. You know how stories get exaggerated. As a matter of fact, we could fit all the continental citizens of all nationalities here into a single hotel holding 1,300 people.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Could you give us actual figures about the aliens?

"Mr. AIKEN. I can; yes. The total number of aliens in this country is 2,610 persons. Of these, a couple of weeks ago, almost exactly half were American citizens. Some have gone back since then, of course. The other half are from 34 different other countries.

"Mr. JOHNSON. And how many of these are, shall we say, Germans?

"Mr. AIKEN. I think there are a little over 300 Germans; yes, 326 to be exact, and about half of them are refugees.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Well, there is another point, Mr. Aiken. Are the staffs of the legations in this country, the foreign legations in this country, unusually large?

"Mr. AIKEN. The British and the Americans are the largest; they have nine each, and the French and the Germans come next with a half dozen each.

"Mr. JOHNSON. That is a little surprising. There is one other rumor which it might be interesting to deal with. Have a great many Germans come into the country since the war started?

"Mr. AIKEN. Two, at least.

"Mr. JOHNSON. How is that?

"Mr. AIKEN. Two.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, Mr. Aiken, all these matters we have been discussing apply only to the 26 counties under the control of the Irish Government.

"Mr. AIKEN. Unfortunately, the other part of the country, the six northern counties, are still controlled by Britain, and when Britain declared war they were automatically at war, whether they willed it or not.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I realize that, Mr. Aiken, but I see the question of a united Ireland is being very wisely discussed at present. Tell me, would your government be prepared to give up its neutrality for the sake of union with the north?

"Mr. AIKEN. Most certainly not. We want union and sovereignty, not union and slavery. This nation, this whole island is entitled to decide its own policy in peace or war. Even though unity may not be attained immediately, there can be no foregoing or bartering of that right—the right of the Irish people to decide their own destiny. Again, we are as concerned for the well-being of our people in the north as for the well-being of our people in the 26 counties. If we once acheve union on a basis of sovereign national right, our strength of defense would be so enormously increased that I don't believe anyone would dare attack us. That, of course, is the position we are trying to achieve.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Surely, Mr. Aiken, for good or ill, the six counties are now in war. Do you suppose any belligerent would ever agree to them withdrawing from the war into a state of neutrality?

"Mr. AIKEN. Why not? After all, these are our people—Irish. They did not declare war. And if they happened to form a sovereign parliament, they would have the same right to be neutral as the rest of the country.

"Mr. JOHNSON. From the point of Britain, do you believe a unified Ireland would be as valuable as at present, in which she has six counties belligerent on her side?

"Mr. AIKEN. Now, Mr. Johnson, let me say, first of all, our right union doesn't depend upon an answer to that question; but I believe an independent military expert would say yes, much more valuable. My own view, however, is whoever would force an extension of the war to the present 26 counties would lose heavily through the venture and they would, of course, lose much more heavily in the cast of a neutral or all-Ireland State.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I see. Very well, your immediate problem at the moment, however, is defense of 26 counties. And what steps have been taken to meet the present emergency?

"Mr. AIKEN. Ever since the emergency became acute, we have taken steps to strengthen our defense forces in every way possible.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I see. You certainly seem to be feverishly active about preparing your defenses.

"Mr. AIKEN. There is no panic about them, but we are preparing with all our energy and putting our trust in God and hope to pull through. You know how the old Irish saying goes, 'God likes a little help,' and we are going to try to give him all the help we can."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to thank my colleagues in the House of Representatives for the support they have given during the present session of Congress to many important measures for the benefit of San Francisco, the city which I have the honor to represent. I am sure that all of my constituents will join me in an expression of gratitude to the membership of this House for their very generous attitude toward our problems and projects.

This Congress has been in large measure responsible for making it possible to continue the Golden Gate International Exposition during the year 1940. Without the assurance of funds which have been appropriated to continue Federal participation in the exposition its gates would not have reopened this year. I am happy to report that our exposition is enjoying a very successful season, and that the average attendance to date has been considerably larger than it was at this time last year.

SUPERNAVY ASSURED

Through the courtesy of my Democratic colleagues, it has been my privilege to serve as a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, and I am proud to say that the record will show that I have voted for every measure for the national defense since I have been a Member of Congress. It has been a most interesting and inspiring experience, Mr. Speaker, to take part in the formulation of the great naval expansion program which will provide the United States with the most powerful navy in the history of the world—a navy sufficient to protect both our Pacific and Atlantic coasts against any threat of attack in the future. This new supernavy will guarantee peace for the American Nation for generations to come. It will be our most effective insurance against war.

San Francisco has become one of the most important centers of national-defense activity in America, Mr. Speaker. The total amount of money appropriated by this Congress for national-defense projects and other public works in the San Francisco Bay region and for shipbuilding there has reached the astounding total of half a billion dollars.

MILLIONS FOR SHORE DEFENSES

The Navy Department has been authorized by this Congress to construct and acquire public works on San Francisco Bay costing $24,722,000. Much of this construction work is nearing completion, and will soon be ready for use by the Navy.

This Congress has appropriated $6,000,000 to enable the Navy to acquire ownership of the important graving drydocks at Hunters Point. A large assembling plant will be constructed on property immediately adjacent to the drydocks and this section of San Francisco will be converted into a great base for the repair of major ships of the Navy Department and the merchant marine.

For the Alameda Naval Air Base, located on the opposite side of San Francisco Bay, this Congress has appropriated $10,492,000. The Secretary of the Navy informs me that this new aviation base will be completed about the first of October this year, and it will be in operation with a full complement of about 1,300 men by the 1st of January 1941. This will be the largest naval aviation base on the Pacific coast.

For additional facilities at the Naval Supply Depot in Oakland, $2,300,000 has been made available. Money has also been allotted for new construction at the Mare Island Navy Yard in the amount of $5,931,000.

VAST SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

The greatest shipbuilding program in history is now under way on San Francisco Bay. It began rather modestly in 1939 when the Navy Department ordered the construction in bay region shipyards, including Mare Island Navy Yard, of naval vessels costing $6,021,000. In 1940, the current year, the total cost of ship construction allotted to the same yards will be $61,566,000, and the projected program of the Navy Department for shipbuilding on San Francisco Bay in the immediate future represents an outlay of $318,852,000. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this vast program will involve the employment of large numbers of men. At the Union Plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co. in San Francisco alone it is estimated that nearly 12,000 men will be employed in the near future, in addition to the regular working force of the plant.

MANY MERCHANT SHIPS

During 1939 the United States Maritime Commission awarded contracts for the construction of 14 merchant-marine ships in San Francisco Bay yards at an aggregate cost of $31,869,020. The Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, has contracts for 5 of those ships totaling in cost $10,010,000. The Western Pipe & Steel Co., of San Francisco, has contracts for 5 vessels, amounting to $10,637,500, and the Moore Drydock Co., of Oakland, 4 vessels costing $11,221,500.

It is estimated that on these contracts alone about $10,000,000 in wages will be paid out in the bay area.

Bids have just been opened by the Maritime Commission for the construction of additional ships. Among the bidders are the Western Pipe & Steel Co. and the Moore Drydock Co.

ARMY AND COAST GUARD

For Army defenses in the San Francisco Bay area $3,351,400 is being expended under the authority of this Congress for emergency construction work of a temporary character and $958,000 for Regular Army construction. The posts at which this construction work is being done include the Presidio of San Francisco, Fort Mason, Fort Baker, Fort Winfield Scott, Hamilton Field, Moffett Field, Camp Ord, and Mines Field.

The United States Coast Guard has nearly completed its new $600,000 air station at the Mills Field airport, and the Army engineers will soon begin the dredging work necessary to construct a seaplane harbor in front of the Coast Guard station at a cost of $275,000.

We appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the appropriation recently approved which has made it possible to proceed at once with the construction of the new $4,825,000 Federal building at Sansome and Washington Streets which will house the appraisers' department of the Customs Service and the Bureau of Immigration at the port of San Francisco.

PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS

During the life of this Congress expenditures made through the Work Projects Administration for public improvements in San Francisco have amounted to $24,055,253, embracing a wide program of highway and street construction, improvements of parks and playgrounds, and public buildings of permanent value to the city.

The new national cemetery near South San Francisco, purchased under the authority of this Congress, will be opened for burial of soldiers about October 1 of this year. This cemetery embraces 161 acres of land, purchased for $158,746, on which nearly $300,000 has been expended for improvements. The old national cemetery at the Presidio of San Francisco will be completely filled with graves next month.

The Federal Housing Administration reports that 12,190 mortgage-insurance loans, aggregating $58,546,000 have been made to San Francisco home builders, and 29,149 loans totaling $11,837,000 to property owners in our city for modernization and repair of their homes.

SAN FRANCISCO GRATEFUL

During 1939 and 1940 the Public Works Administration, which is now completing its work, has participated in financing five large public improvements in San Francisco at an estimated total cost of $12,448,663. Grants aggregating $4,874,663 and loans of $633,000 were advanced on these projects out of funds provided by this Congress. The projects include the new junior college buildings, the new waterfront warehouse, a sewage-disposal plant, hospitals, and schools.

Seven low-cost housing projects have been approved in San Francisco during the past 2 years by the United States Housing Authority, and the loan contracts executed for these projects amount to $9,428,000.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the people of San Francisco have much reason to be grateful to this Congress and to our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, for the magnificent measures adopted for the strengthening of our local defenses, which are essentially national in character, and for the great material benefits which will be enjoyed by business and labor from the history-making program of ship building which has just been inaugurated.

REMARKS

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the general public is of necessity interested in a national land policy and a permanent system of agricultural production. History reveals that any great country is one with a large amount of rich, fertile, productive land. Anyone who is familiar with soils is well aware of the millions of acres of land in the United States, with its natural, inherent fertility. This is the foundation of our country and one of the factors of its greatness.

In order for any country to have a permanent agricultural system it is necessary, first, to have a constructive land policy; second, to have a general understanding of scientific and practical agricultural processes; and, third, to have long-term loans available to the farmers of the country.

The following table shows the number and amount of Federal loans in the United States since the inception of this Federal program:

Federal land banks and Land Bank Commissioner, number and amount of loans closed, 1917 to June 30, 1940

Farm Credit Administration, Division of Finance and Accounts.

There are many lessons to be learned from a study of this table, even if the reader had never had any contact or personal experience with the Farm Credit Administration.

In order to approach this problem correctly, one must present his philosophy of government and governmental agencies. First of all, we hear one side say "We do not want the Government in business," and the other side say, "We want the Government to run all business."

What applies to the Government in the farm-loan business, no doubt is applicable to other branches of the Government. Most people believe in a governmental "cushion" for agriculture, business, and labor.

Some 30 years ago I heard Sir Horace Plunkett of Ireland give a talk on The Land Policy of Ireland. He went on to tell about the long-term leases and the long-term loans. He told of the stability of a country where the farmer knows when he wakes up in the morning where he will sleep the following night. You well know the improvement that took place in Ireland after they had an acceptable land policy in that country.

For over 30 years I have studied, watched, and sometimes nearly prayed that our country adopt a sane land policy and a farm-loan program that was in keeping with the needs of our people.

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK

The Federal land bank, upon its inception, went steadily ahead with its loans, as you will note, until the 1920's when troubles began to arise as shown in the number of loans made. These troubles were a reflection of the effect of the 50,000,000 additional acres put into wartime production. The number of loans made in 1922 was 10 times the number made 10 years later. The effects of the world and domestic depression is also shown in the foregoing table. Then, again, note that in 1935 there were 18 times more loans made than in 1939.

I do not care to enter into a political discussion in regard to any of the facts shown by this table, but will set forth the following observations:

First. I want to make this very evident observation, and that is that in 1932 or 1939 when the farmers really needed credit facilities in order to finance farms, this was not available from the governmental agency which had been charged with this responsibility. In other words the system "bogged down" due to certain economic and other reasons.

Second. Most rural-minded people believe that the Government was wise in the establishment of the farm land-bank system. Most rural-minded people do not wish to see the Federal Government as the only source of farm loans. Most rural-minded people think of the Federal land bank as a cushion for farm credit. They feel that when economic conditions are bad in any community, due to droughts, storms, or low agricultural prices, the farmers of this country should have this avenue of credit, not only for their own personal benefit, but for the benefit of society as a whole, as well.

Third. Most thoughtful rural-minded people want these loans at a fair rate of interest and in keeping with the value of money and crops and in keeping with the rates of interest paid by other groups of society. In a period of years, the prices which the farmer receives for his product determines what interest rate, if any, he can pay.

Fourth. Most rural-minded people believe that we should have a relatively definite land and loan policy, and that with 23 years of Federal loan experience such a program could and should be agreed upon. Policies and interest rates should be established on a permanent long-time basis and not be left to the particular attitude of a certain Congress that happens to be in session when the rates and policies are subject to change.

Fifth. The farm-credit situation should not be a political question or football for any political party, and a long-term program would eliminate the politics materially.

Sixth. The farmers themselves should be given a greater voice in the operations of the Federal loan system. With thousands of agricultural college graduates in the land, with thousands of Smith-Hughes teachers, and with thousands of agricultural extension workers and county agents, I am most certain that a sufficient number of capable agricultural men can be secured to more properly help administer the farm-loan program of the future. I am firmly convinced that they will perform their duties as efficiently as the other groups handle their duties in the other branches of the Government.

Seventh. Though some people accuse the present Farm Credit Administration of playing politics with the present loan policies, I do not care to discuss that point. I will say this, however, that the time has come when the people of this country should realize that the farm people of this Nation are entitled to the same consideration an any other group of our people.

Eighth. During the past 7 years, 91,135 farmers have lost their homes. There was an average loan of $2,800 and the interest was about $100 per loan per year. These farmers were driven onto W. P. A., the relief rolls, and into migratory camps in great numbers at a great expense to society. During this same time the U. S. H. A. built 90,436 housing units for their city cousins with an average cost of $4,359 per unit. In addition, these housing units are subsidized by the Government for $28,000,000 per year for 60 years. This is an average of $193 per unit per year for 60 years.

Ninth. In other words, we have seen 91,135 farmers driven from their homes because they could not pay $100 a year interest, while at the same time we were building $4,359 homes for our city cousins and paying $193 of their rent each year so they could have a home that cost considerably more than the farmer's farm and home combined. We did not hear so much about soft loans when this U. S. H. A. program was being pushed through Congress.

Tenth. Rich, fertile, productive farm land is still the basis of real wealth of this or any other country. Some say that the recently adopted policy of the present Farm Credit Administration is for political or vote-buying purposes. Common sense is usually good politics, and this new interest in handling these delinquent loans and foreclosures so far has the earmarks not only of common sense but also of common justice. Over 25 percent of the Federal farm loans of the United States are delinquent and over 50 percent of the loans of my district are delinquent. We have had year after year of drought and low prices. If the farmers of my district could not carry the load with 14- to 17-cent cheese, how are they to carry it with 12- to 13-cent cheese? The problem of delinquent loans must be met with a deep understanding and an appreciation of the fundamental facts.

I am happy to have had the opportunity to have been instrumental in equalizing and reducing the interest rates so that tens of thousands of dollars will be saved the farmers of my district and millions of dollars saved for the farmers of the Nation. This equalization was a matter of equity and justice. Other adjustments should in time be included.

No one, regardless of political party, can question the spirit of the employees of the Farm Credit office, and I sincerely hope that regardless of the outcome of the November elections we can look forward to finding a sympathetic, fair, just, and common-sense Federal loan policy inaugurated and maintained.

Secretary Ickes Averts Big Tax Increase in San Francisco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to report that Secretary of the Interior Ickes, by a voluntary exercise of authority vested in him by act of Congress, has acted to save the people of San Francisco from a threatened increase of about 22 cents in the annual tax rate which is about to be adopted in my home city.

One week ago, Mr. Speaker, I addressed the following letter to the Secretary of the Interior:

AUGUST, 5, 1940.

Hon. HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Ever since I was first elected to public office in San Francisco, 15 years ago, I have believed that municipal distribution of the hydroelectric power generated on the Hetch Hetchy project would be for the best interest of the people of the city, and have contended that the sale of this power to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. through a so-called agency contract was a violation of the Raker Act. I have believed also that your action in declaring the contract to be illegal was in strict conformity with the duties imposed upon you by the Raker Act, which made the Secretary of the Interior responsible for the enforcement of its provisions. The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court declaring the contract to be illegal completely upheld the propriety of your action in this matter.

Since the Supreme Court rendered its decision you have twice requested the Department of Justice and the United States district court to defer the enforcement of an injunction against the continued illegal sale of this power in order to permit the city of San Francisco to work out the terms of a compliance with the Raker Act in accordance with the Supreme Court ruling. I believe that all right-thinking citizens of San Francisco will applaud your consent to these extensions as eminently fair.

However, because of certain technical provisions of the city charter which regulate the fixing of the annual tax rate, the people of San Francisco are now confronted, as a result of your extensions of time, with a financial problem of major importance. The San Francisco tax rate must be fixed by the board of supervisors not later than September 15 of each year. In estimating the amount of the tax rate the supervisors cannot take into account any revenues which are not legally assured throughout the rest of the fiscal year.

The last extension of time which you have granted for the continuance of negotiations for a lease of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s distribution system will expire on October 1. But even if a lease were approved by you on that date, the supervisors could not take advantage of the continued revenues from power which the city might enjoy thereafter. In other words, the only Hetch Hetchy power revenues from which the taxpayers of San Francisco can get any benefit in the present situation are limited by the expiration date of any extension to which you and the Federal court may stipulate. Therefore, unless you can agree prior to September 15 to a further extension of the effective date of the injunction, even though the lease negotiations should be successful after that date, taxes will have to be levied on the property owners of San Francisco sufficient to raise a revenue of approximately $1,800,000, which is the estimated amount of power income to be received from the existing contract from October 1 to the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1941. This would necessitate an increase in the San Francisco tax rate of approximately 22½ cents on each $100 of assessed property value.

For many years the obligations of San Francisco under the Hetch Hetchy grant, which is embodied in the Raker Act, were misrepresented to the people by propagandists acting for private power interests, and as a result a large number of our taxpayers and voters were honestly confused. Now that the Supreme Court has removed all doubt as to the exact nature of the city's obligations, I am confident that the people of San Francisco will, at the earliest possible date, proceed to comply with the law. In the meantime, I earnestly hope that it may be possible to relieve them from any penalty of increased taxation.

May I, therefore, respectfully request your consideration of a recommendation for a further extension of the effective date of the injunction against the agency contract until July 1, 1941, the beginning of the next fiscal year. This would avoid the necessity of levying any additional taxes upon the people of San Francisco to replace power revenues, and would give them ample opportunity to work out and put into effect a satisfactory compliance with the Raker Act as constructed by the Supreme Court. Our people are already confronted with the certainty of an increase in taxes this year from causes entirely unrelated to Hetch Hetchy power, and I am sure that they will be permanently grateful to you and to the Federal Government if they can be saved from this additional burden.

Sincerely,

FRANCK R. HAVENNER,
Member of Congress.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I have received a reply from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he expresses a desire to relieve the people of San Francisco from any penalty of increased taxation, and states that he will explore the possibilities of working out a stipulation which will justify him in recommending a further stay of the injunction against sale of the Hetch Hetchy power.

Secretary Ickes letter follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 10, 1940.

Hon. FRANCK R. HAVENNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAVENNER: I have received your letter of August 5, in which you urge that I recommend a further extension until July 1, 1941, of the injunction in the Hetch Hetchy litigation. I need not review with you the circumstances which have led to the present situation since you know them fully.

I am acutely aware of the problem with which the taxpayers of San Francisco are faced, and I agree with you that, if it can be legitimately avoided, there should be no penalty of increased taxation on them. I have always felt that the people of San Francisco would overwhelmingly support a program for compliance with the Raker Act if the true facts were made available to them so that they could exercise an informed judgment.

My problem lies in the necessity for securing compliance with the act and the Supreme Court's decision in the most expeditious possible manner. I am asked to recommend a stay of the injunction which will extend well beyond a year from the date of the Supreme Court decision. Under the Raker Act it is my duty to secure compliance with its provisions and it would be entirely inconsistent with that duty to agree to an extended continuation of an arrangement which has already been declared illegal by the highest Court. Consequently, I feel that I can recommend a stay of the injunction only if there is some binding obligation on the part of the city to take the steps necessary to effectuate compliance with the act immediately. I think it is important also, because of the past history of this matter, to secure commitments from the press and civic leaders of San Francisco that they will support and give vigorous publicity to the facts supporting a program for compliance with the act.

I realize the need for moving speedily on this matter. I hope that the assurances which I seek will be forthcoming promptly, and on the assumption that they will be I am proceeding to explore the possibility of working out a stipulation binding upon San Francisco which may serve to justify a recommendation for the further stay of the injunction.

For your information I am enclosing copies of letters dealing with this subject, which I am sending to Mayor Rossi and to Mr. E. D. Coblentz, publisher of the San Francisco Call-Bulletin.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Americans Will Volunteer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD W. LANDIS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, never have I risen to address the House with a greater sense of responsibility than at this moment. I do want to be recorded in this critical hour of our Republic as being opposed to peacetime conscription. It should be adopted only after all other methods have failed. Future generations may turn back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and find that there were some Members of the House who believed the idea of conscription in time of peace was completely foreign to the fundamental principles of democracy and the American way of life. It is my sincere belief that Americans will willingly fight for their own country, but they will have to be drafted to fight for European countries.

There must be something wrong with an administration that cannot raise a peacetime Army without conscription. One of the significant reasons is—thousands of those who would be forced to serve under a compulsory plan are sons of World War veterans. These boys have been told by their dads how they were promised their old jobs back after it was over "over there." Upon their return, however, they found that their jobs had been taken by others. These same young men are also not blind to the fact that the present administration, for 7 long years, has been most unfriendly to the veterans of our Nation. Their memories are still freshened with the enaction of the Economy Act in 1933, in which thousands of deserving defenders of our country, under the guise of economy, were shamefully treated.

Mr. Speaker, it is yet to be convincingly demonstrated that voluntary enlistments will not provide sufficient numbers of recruits to keep abreast with our defense program. Until this has been proven beyond the shadow of a doubt, I can see no real justification for drafting the services of America's young manhood. So far, under our present enlistment program, the enlistments have exceeded the quotas set by the officials of the Army and Navy. The June quota for the Army was 15,000 and by the end of June the enlistments had reached 23,000. There were over 30,000 recruits for the month of July. The June quota for the navy was 4,300. The June enlistments totaled 4,329, while the number for July was 4,500.

I believe that we can obtain the necessary men for home defense by voluntary 1-year enlistments, and by increasing the basic rate of pay from $21 to $30 per month. The cost of one battleship would pay the increase of 600,000 Army volunteers. Young men can enlist in the C. C. C. for 1 year and draw $30 a month. We pay good wages for police and fire protection. We are spending billions for equipment. Why not spend a few additional millions to increase the pay of our Army and Navy volunteers?

What could we do with an Army of 1,200,000 men at present? According to our Army experts, we have a shortage of uniforms, tanks, antitank guns, antiaircraft guns, and other equipment. I believe we should fully equip our Regular Army and National Guard before we assume the task of conscripting 1,200,000 young men. In support of this contention, I would like to submit some statements from our experts who appeared before the Senate subcommittee on appropriations:

SHORTAGE OF UNIFORMS

General MARSHALL. The fact remains that, if it should become necessary to mobilize the National Guard at peace strength, we would not have on hand the cloth to commence the manufacture of uniforms for the additional 85,000 men, I would say, for possibly 4 or 5 months. When you think of such a situation in terms of morale, you can see what it would mean. Some might say that they could wear overalls. Well, they would in any event wear overalls while training, but human nature being what it is, and parents and constituents being what they are, there would be an unfortunate reaction if we should have to leave our men in that ignominious plight for 4 or 5 months. I am quite certain that the War Department would be very severely criticized.

ANTITANK GUNS

General MARSHALL. We have a serious situation in the length of time required to produce the antitank gun. Our total requirements are 1,556. We have on hand—218, and on order—526, on which deliveries will not be completed until June 1941.

ANTIAIRCRAFT GUNS

General MARSHALL. We have on hand the 3-inch guns for but 26 regiments, and directors and height finders for 27 regiments. By the end of 1941 we will have guns, directors, and height finders for 34 regiments.

TANKS

General MOORE. There are two kinds of tanks. Of the light new tanks, we had actually on hand on May 1, only 10. We have under order enough to provide 402.

They have ordered 734 light tanks and 194 medium tanks.

According to the information set forth by these two Army experts, you can readily understand that the Army would be unable to train and equip 1,200,000 men at this time.

I believe that our Regular Army should be thoroughly trained in modern warfare first. They will then be ready to teach new recruits to meet future needs.

Congress has followed Executive recommendation until there remains no hope of finding safety in that path. It is time for Congress to decide a few things for itself.

I for one want an army, navy, and air force designed for home defense, but not an oversized army for overseas service.

I will never vote to send American boys across the seas to fight in another European struggle.

The people have repeatedly demonstrated their desire for Congress to remain in session, and to solve the problems so sorely perplexing our democracy. It behooves each of us to stand faithful to this solemn charge entrusted to us. May we be given the courage, the human understanding, and the strength of character to solve these problems in a manner which will not be detrimental to the best interests of the American people.

One-Year Enlistments in Regular Army Now Authorized by Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, during the last few weeks I have received numerous letters opposing military conscription in peacetimes and urging that the term of enlistment in the Regular Army be reduced from 3 years to 1 year in an endeavor to get the required number of men through the process of voluntary enlistment.

These writers apparently do not realize that it is possible now to enlist "in the Regular Army for a period of 1 or 3 years at the option of the soldier."

Few Members of Congress apparently realize that this is the law and that 1-year enlistments are being received and have been received in the Regular Army each year at least since 1930. I am satisfied, however, that the general "option" has not been given to the young men desiring to enlist. In short, the 1-year enlistment period has not been publicized and in fact has been discouraged by the War Department through the recruiting stations. In view of this situation on August 2, 1940, I addressed a letter to the Adjutant General of the War Department which was in part as follows:

I am not clear on the present provisions of the law and the regulations of the Department concerning the length of enlistments in the Regular Army at this time.

Will you please give me an immediate answer to the following questions:

1. Does the Army accept 1-year enlistments in the Regular Service at this time?

2. If so, from what date have such enlistments been accepted?

3. If 1-year enlistments are accepted at this time, please give me the law authorizing such enlistments, and the extent to which it has been publicized.

This matter is urgent and important because I am receiving numerous letters from constituents urging that the voluntary enlistment period in the Regular Army be reduced from 3 years to 1 year during the present emergency.

On August 8 I received a reply from the Adjutant General which is as follows:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of August 2, 1940, requesting information on the present provisions of the law and the regulations of the Department concerning the length of enlistments in the Regular Army at this time.

The act of June 4, 1920, authorized original enlistments in the Regular Army for a period of 1 or 3 years at the option of the soldier.

The Army regulations contain the following provisions:

"Original enlistments in the Regular Army are authorized to be made for 1- or 3-year periods but all reenlistments therein are restricted by law to 3-year periods. Men enlisted for 1-year periods will not be given original assignments or subsequent transfers where sea travel is involved, and assignments and transfers involving rail transportation may be made only as specifically authorized by the War Department. A man with any prior Regular Army enlisted service is not eligible for a 1-year enlistment in the Regular Army; however, prior service in the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard is not a bar to the 1-year enlistment."

In recent years 1-year enlistments have not been encouraged since an efficient military force depends not only on the training of the individual soldier but also, and to a greater degree, on the coordinated training of all combat units that make up the fighting force. The rapid turnover and the short period of training that would result should 1-year enlistments be general for the Regular Army of 375,000 men would seriously hamper the development of efficient combat units in that component.

The War Department has recommended bringing into service for 1 year's training approximately 800,000 men in two increments. Only by bringing these trainees into the service in large groups can graduated instructions be given from the training of the individual through training of combat teams of all echelons. The staggering incident to any voluntary system would necessitate many classes of instruction throughout the year and seriously hamper efficient training.

I am enclosing a table showing the number of 1-year enlistments made since 1930.

Very respectfully,

E. S. ADAMS,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

One-year enlistments

	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937	1938	1939	1940
July	15	12	93	242	171	293	239	210	242	267
August	9	3			2	4			1
September	1	1	1	2		1	3	1	4
October				3	3	1	1	2	5	1
November	1		1	5	2		1		1
December		1		1
January	2	1		1					1
February	1						28
March				1			23		1
April	3		2		1		17		1
May	4						31		1
June	36	30		2	1		56	2	1
Total	72	48	97	257	180	299	399	215	258	268

It will be observed that the law specifically provides for enlistments "for a period of 1 or 3 years at the option of the soldier." It will further be observed that the Army regulations provide that "original enlistments in the Regular Army are authorized to be made for a 1- or a 3-year period."

Attention is called to the fact that "in recent years 1-year enlistments have not been encouraged."

The above table, however, shows that some 1-year enlistments have been received even though this possibility of enlistment has not been publicized and has been discouraged by the War Department.

After receiving the above letter from the Adjutant General, I called up the United States Army recruiting station on Pennsylvania Avenue, in the city of Washington, by telephone, advising that I was a young man who wanted to enlist in the Army for a period of 1 year during this emergency. I was promptly told that 1-year enlistments were not being received by the recruiting stations and that the shortest period for which I could enlist was 3 years. I called the attention of the officer to the letter from the Adjutant General's office which I have included in these remarks, and then I told the recruiting officer who I was and he then admitted that 1-year enlistments were possible under the law, but gave me the substance of the regulations and advised that recruiting stations discouraged 1-year enlistments. It is apparent that the War Department does not want 1-year enlistments in the Regular Army in peacetimes. There is possibly a very good reason for this attitude. Yet, if the Army needs additional peacetime soldiers for wartime training, and only contemplates keeping these soldiers in the Army for a 1-year period of training, then it is difficult to understand why an effort should not be made to secure this quota through the usual voluntary enlistment method and under existing law.

The Congress has authorized a mechanized army. In other words, the weapons of defense are "on order." This mechanization must be implemented. Machines without trained men are useless in national defense. I think we all realize that we must have additional men in the Regular Army. I am hopeful that immediate and enthusiastic cooperation on the part of the War Department will result in sufficient voluntary enlistments not only for 3 years but for 1 year to take care of present needs.

National Defense and the International Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND, OF ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with unanimous consent therefor heretofore granted, I offer for incorporation in the RECORD a radio address made by me on July 12, 1940. It is as follows:

Question. Mr. DIMOND, the whole attention of the country is now centered on national defense, and it appears that some work of that nature is being undertaken in Alaska. Is there any necessity for it?

Mr. DIMOND. Not only is there necessity for defense works in Alaska at the present time but those installations should have been undertaken years ago. While most people are not aware of it, the southern coast of Alaska, which is free of ice and open the year round, fronts for 2,500 miles on the north Pacific Ocean, from the city of Ketchikan in the east to Attu Island in the extreme west, and Attu Island is less than 700 miles distant from the north end of the Japanese archipelago, and, of course, much nearer to Russian territory. The late great Gen. William Mitchell, who was court-martialed and dismissed from the Army for vigorously advocating views with respect to national defense which have since been proven to be 100 percent right, in testifying before the House Military Affairs Committee on one occasion, said that Alaska is the most important strategic area in the world. It is important because the nation that controls Alaska controls the north Pacific Ocean, and thus controls the short route between the United States and the Orient. Any hostile nation in possession of Alaska would constitute an immense and an immediately serious threat to the United States, because southeastern Alaska is less than 750 miles from the State of Washington. The possession of Alaska by a hostile force would outflank and seriously impair the value of our great defensive works, both naval and military, in Hawaii, because it is 2,400 miles from the United States to Hawaii, and it is less than 750 miles from the United States to Alaska. Just as in the times of Alexander the Great, and Julius Caesar, and Napoleon, the force that controls the short interior lines always has an immense military advantage.

Question. But, Mr. DIMOND, you speak as though Alaska were now totally without defense. Surely there must be some defense works or forces in Alaska.

Mr. DIMOND. Unfortunately, there is little in Alaska at the present time deserving of the name of defense. We have about 300 infantrymen at Chilkoot Barracks, in southeastern Alaska, but they haven't a single airplane.

Approximately 750 troops of various types have recently been transferred to the new military post proposed for Anchorage. Altogether they are too few to do much alone. There are, also, several Navy planes at Sitka, but they are not sufficient in number to undertake any real defense against an attacking force. Like many others familiar with the situation, I have for years urged upon Congress the need for the installation of defense works in Alaska, but it is only recently that anything at all was attempted.

Question. What is being done now for the defense of Alaska?

Mr. DIMOND. In the first place, let me say that the defense of Alaska means the defense of the United States. At the present time work is being pushed as rapidly as possible in the building of naval air bases at Sitka, in southeastern Alaska, and at Kodiak, in southwestern Alaska; and in the construction of a substantial Army air base at Anchorage, in south-central Alaska, and a subsidiary Army air station at Fairbanks in the great Yukon Valley in central Alaska. Congress recently authorized and appropriated money for the construction of an additional Navy air base at Unalaska, which is in the eastern end of the Aleutian Islands. In this connection it is worthy of comment that so-called Hepburn Board, set up by the Navy Department, has recommended the building of submarine bases at both Kodiak and Unalaska. In addition, Congress has authorized and appropriated money for the construction of a military post at Anchorage at an expense of something more than $6,000,000. This post, as I understand, is designed to accommodate 3,000 troops of various types—light artillery, including an antiaircraft force, infantry, and some engineers. Of course, this post is designed primarily for the protection of the air bases against parachutists or other attacks from the air.

Question. In your judgment, Mr. DIMOND, with all of the present works completed, will Alaska be adequately defended?

Mr. DIMOND. The answer to that question, in my judgment, must be "no"; but that answer should be qualified by saying that I am confident that as soon as this work now under way can be brought near to completion, Congress will appropriate additional money for an enlargement and expansion of the defense works of Alaska, which probably will be largely by way of air defense with just sufficient ground force to repel attacks against the air bases. In my opinion there should be facilities in Alaska, centering perhaps in Anchorage, for the accommodation of at least 1,000 airplanes of all kinds. It might never be necessary to keep any such number of planes in Alaska, because they could be flown in there on 24 hours' notice from bases in the States, but accommodations must be prepared beforehand to take care of such a force in Alaska. With a minimum of 1,000 fighting, pursuit, and bombing planes in Alaska, it would be difficult and, we hope, impossible, for any enemy to effect and maintain a landing in the Territory. In this case, as in every case, it is folly raised to the *n*th power to have just a second-best defensive air force. Our forces in Alaska should incontestably be superior to any force that is likely to be brought against it. Moreover, we have learned in the present European war that a land-based air force may be of controlling influence in naval battles. And again I invite your attention to the fact that any hostile advance against the United States is likely to come by way of Alaska and not by way of the Hawaiian Islands, which we have really adequately fortified and defended.

Question. But, Mr. DIMOND, does not our fleet control the Pacific, and, if our fleet does control the Pacific, how can any enemy effect and maintain a landing in Alaska?

Mr. DIMOND. It is true that at the present moment our fleet controls the Pacific, so far as the surface of the ocean goes, from the Hawaiian Islands east. Of course, it does not continuously and cannot pretend to effectually dominate any considerable part of the ocean west of the Hawaiian Islands. Moreover the fleet may not control the air over the Pacific, and we have now learned by what happened in Norway and in Holland and Belgium and France and Poland, that attacks in modern wars are all too likely to come by air and that whole divisions of troops with machine guns and probably with light artillery and even tanks can be successfully transported and supplied by air. There is another answer to your question, sir, and that answer is that although our fleet in the Pacific is probably now superior to the combined fleets of Japan and Russia, the day may not be far distant, and, in fact, it may be next week, that our fleet will be obliged to go to the Atlantic and thus leave the Pacific and Alaska almost totally without defense. With our fleet in the Atlantic, Alaska lies wide open at the present time to any foe which may care to exercise itself sufficiently to take over the Territory. And again I say that with Alaska in the possession of an enemy the United States is in jeopardy.

Question. Mr. DIMOND, you have spoken of the possibility of transferring our fleet to the Atlantic Ocean. If the fleet does go to the Atlantic and is obliged to remain there, how can our bases in Alaska be supplied with food and gasoline and ammunition and bombs and all of the other numerous things which are required at military and naval bases?

Mr. DIMOND. In that question you have put your finger upon what I consider the one weak spot in the present plans of Alaskan defense. Now, I assume that care will be taken to have all of the Army and Navy posts and bases in Alaska supplied sufficiently well so that they will be able to maintain themselves for at least 6 months without any additional supplies of any kind. Just plain common sense underlies that assumption. But in the event of war, which will take our fleet to the Atlantic to remain, and we are simultaneously attacked in the Pacific, it will be necessary eventually to supply these posts and air bases, and with the fleet in the Atlantic there are at the present time only two ways in which the supplies can be brought in, and those two ways are by air and by transports convoyed by airplanes. It is gravely doubtful whether any transportation attempted with the convoy of airplanes only would be reasonably safe. The hazards of such operation would be enormous. The supply of Alaska bases or airplanes alone would be difficult; at present impossible for lack of planes. And if transportation failed, all Alaska would necessarily go under. But there is a way our defense bases in Alaska could be supplied, and that is through the construction of a road through Canada and into Alaska to connect with the Alaska Railroad at Fairbanks and with the Richardson Highway near Fairbanks. With such a road built it would be a simple matter to supply all of our defense posts and bases on the mainland of Alaska, which would exclude, of course, those on Kodiak Island and at Unalaska, on Unalaska Island. However, if the Anchorage and Fairbanks bases could be supplied, it would be a relatively simple matter to supply Kodiak by air, and even, perhaps, to reach out to Unalaska. We should think, too, of the civilian population of Alaska, who must be supplied in case of war.

Question. Where would such a road be located and how much time would be required to construct it?

Mr. DIMOND. Such a road, which has been contemplated for many years for commercial purposes, would be built northwesterly from Hazelton, in British Columbia, into Alaska. The total mileage to be constructed is about 1,200. The cost of it, even under forced construction, would not exceed $25,000,000, and it could easily be completed in 18 months. It might even be possible to do the job in a year. The road system of British Columbia, which connects with our own system of roads in the United States, now extends as far north as Hazelton.

Question. Do you consider the building of this road is of great importance to the Alaska defense program?

Mr. DIMOND. In my opinion, the building of this road in order to insure the continuous supply of our military posts and bases in Alaska is not only of great, but of outstanding, importance. I think it is absolutely vital to start the construction of the road right away and to rush it to completion. Otherwise we may some day find ourselves with some perfectly good defense works, by way of air bases, in Alaska, but without any adequate means of supplying them. The road ought to be built, and built without delay. Our national safety may possibly depend upon it. Of course, it will be also necessary to connect Anchorage, where the Army air base is now under construction, with a road to the Richardson Highway, and thus with the highway to the United States, and I believe that Cordova should have like road connection with the Richardson Highway by way of Chitina. These connecting roads will inevitably be built when the road from the States to Alaska is constructed.

Question. You say a part of this road will be built through Canada, will the Canadians consent to having the United States build the road and use it for military purposes?

Mr. DIMOND. Well, sir, of course, I cannot answer what the Canadians will or will not do, but if the Canadians will not facilitate in every possible way the construction of such a road, they are the biggest star-spangled fools on this earth, because the building of that road means just as much for the defense and protection of Canada as it means for the defense and protection of the United States. I have every confidence in the traditional good sense and sound judgment and spirit of cooperation of our Canadian friends.

Question. Mr. DIMOND, would you care to make any further statement, not perhaps in answer to any specific question.

Mr. DIMOND. Many people seem to rely upon the unwarranted assumption that in the event we are attacked by a hostile nation, and thus involved in war, we shall be obliged to fight on one front only—the Atlantic side—to repel a threatened invasion either of our own territory or of Canada, or Greenland, or of Iceland, or Newfoundland, or of one of the nations lying to the south of us—Mexico or one of the Central or South American countries. Such an assumption may only be the result of failure to face the facts, or an indulgence in wishful thinking. The strong probabilities are quite otherwise. It is highly probable that, if an attack is launched against us, we shall be compelled to face the combined might of the totalitarian powers of the world, not only in the Atlantic but also in the Pacific. Events of recent months have more and more strongly indicated an aggressive understanding between Germany and Japan, with Russia, if not a participant, at least to them a benevolent neutral. The military and naval installations of Russia along the Siberian coast, in the Kommandorsky Islands, and lately on Big Diomede Island, which lies in the very throat of Bering Strait, have for us a clear meaning which can add nothing to our peace of mind or sense of safety.

The dense population and the great wealth concentrated on our eastern seaboard will almost inevitably act as a magnet to draw the fleet to the Atlantic in case of serious trouble. No man can assure us of the continuous operation of the Panama Canal; and that is one reason why, in case of war, there will be an irresistable demand that the fleet be stationed in the Atlantic. It is not necessary to draw upon fantasy to foresee the time when the Pacific Ocean may largely fall under the temporary rulership of some power other than our own, and in that event I again ask how the military and naval forces and the civilian population in Alaska are to be supplied unless we build, and build immediately, the highway to Alaska. If we had airplanes of the proper types and in sufficient numbers, it might, conceivably, be done by air. But even then the hazards would be great on account of the long distances involved, and the capital investment necessary would be simply enormous as compared with the cost of building the highway.

A wise commander makes provision for every reasonable contingency. The contingency to which I have invited attention is entirely within reason; and every sensible man must know, upon an examination of conditions, that within 18 months or less that contingency may be the naked fact. The time to prepare is not tomorrow or the next day, or next month or next year, but now; and thus we may spare ourselves the sad lament of all of those brave peoples who have lately gone into servitude—the lament of "too little and too late."

United States Still Buying Huge Gold Hoards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Associated Press report contained in the New York Times of August 11, 1940. The United States is rapidly accumulating the entire gold supply of the world as these figures would indicate. The article follows:

GOLD IMPORTS OFF SHARPLY IN MONTH—SHIPMENTS RECEIVED IN JULY AMOUNTED TO $519,974,000 OR $644,241,000 BELOW JUNE—GREAT BRITAIN BIG SHIPPER—PORTUGAL, SPAIN, AND SEVERAL LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES ALSO IMPORTANT SENDERS

WASHINGTON, August 10.—The Department of Commerce reported today that gold imports in July amounted to $519,974,000, nearly half of which was in foreign coin.

The July imports were $644,241,000 below those of June. The total for the first 7 months of 1940 was $3,265,573,000, an increase of $966,295,000 over the same period last year.

The amount of gold earmarked for foreign account in July increased by $55,064,000 and compared with an increase of $437,234,000 in June.

The United Kingdom, as usual, was the largest shipper of gold to this country with $301,737,000, while Canada was second with $172,272,000. France, a heavy shipper in the early months of the war, was missing from the list for the first time as a result of capitulation to Germany in June.

Several Latin American countries and Portugal and Spain were among the more important shippers of gold, which included these amounts:

Portugal, $6,607,638; Spain, $2,147,070; Sweden, $3,157,962; Yugoslavia, $2,636,135; Nicaragua, $522,305; Mexico, $1,890,671; Brazil, $6,306,933; Colombia, $5,855,910; Peru, $1,519,206; Philippine Islands, $2,830,857; Australia, $5,262,101; Union of South Africa, $3,432,995.

Exports of gold amounted to only $8,000, compared with $1,249,000 in June.

Silver imports were valued at $5,378,000, an increase of $705,000 over June. Among the heavier receipts were $1,639,000 from Mexico, $1,499,000 from Burma, and $820,000 from Canada. Exports totaled only $15,000.

Exports and imports of gold during July compare as follows with preceding years, (+) indicating excess of imports and (−) indicating excess of exports:

Year	Exports	Imports	Excess
1940	$8,000	$519,974,000	+$519,966,000
1939	8,561	278,644,761	+278,636,200

Soviet Russia and Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, under permission duly granted, I am offering for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article written by the famous newspaper correspondent, Hallett Abend, for the New York Times, as it appears in condensed form in the Washington Post of August 11, 1940. The complete article appears in the issue of the New York Times of the same date.

Mr. Abend is one of the best-informed men in the world upon conditions in eastern Asia and upon their relations with the dominant nations of that region, namely, Japan and Soviet Russia. In this article, as will be evident from a reading of it, he invites attention to the extraordinary military activities of the Soviet Government in northeastern Siberia immediately opposite Alaska and, what is perhaps more important, to the claim which is now being advanced through the Soviet press which, as we all know, is completely under the domination and control of the government, for reclaiming Alaska as a part of Russia. In this article Mr. Abend refers to a statement attributed to me concerning work being done on Big Diomede Island. That island lies almost in the middle of Bering Strait. It is a part of Soviet Russia. A short distance away is Little Diomede Island, which is a part of Alaska and so a part of the United States.

During the past spring the Eskimos on Little Diomede Island, which is our territory, noted great activity on Big Diomede, and one of our Eskimos who came to the mainland reported that there appeared to be thousands of new people on Big Diomede. Since Big Diomede is closely guarded, it is not possible for us to find out precisely what is being done there. In making a statement to the press on June 14, I was careful to state the source of my information and that it was not then possible of confirmation. Nor has it been possible of confirmation since, except that we know by further similar reports that there is considerable new activity being carried on by the Russians on Big Diomede Island. However, Big Diomede is so close to the Siberian mainland that I personally doubt if any really large military establishment is to be located there.

What is more alarming is the building up in the last few years at a number of places in eastern Siberia, and particularly on Bering Island—which is one of the Komandorskie group and which lies relatively close to our own Aleutian Islands—of substantial military, naval, and air bases of various types. As Mr. Abend has pointed out, these posts are so located that they can scarcely be conceived as being offensively aimed at Japan, or constructed and maintained from any defense policy having any relation to Japan. Accordingly, we are well justified in concluding and, in fact, almost forced to conclude that the military activity of Russia in that region has relation to Alaska and not to Japan.

The Russians know that we would not take any of their territory on the other side of Bering Strait if it were offered to us. We do not want any territory on the other side of the Pacific. Many people think our interests now existing in the islands off the Asiatic mainland or on the mainland itself are more than we should undertake to maintain, and that the sooner we get out of China and the Philippines the better. In any event, neither Russia nor Japan nor anyone else even suspects that we are trying to enlarge our interests in that area. Knowing as they do our determination in that respect, we are justified in viewing with wonder and with amazed concern the construction of such powerful military establishments as have lately come into existence in eastern and northeastern Siberia and in the Komandorskie Islands. The presence in those islands of large numbers of Germans is a further significant circumstance.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, so far as the United States is concerned, it can all be boiled down to a warning that we should speed our defense measures in Alaska without delay. There is no time to lose. So far as we can judge the future by the past, peace can be maintained by us only by being so strong, so well armed, and so well prepared that even the most aggressive and powerful and ruthless nations will refrain from attacking us. Not hysteria or fright but only plain, hard, common sense impels me to join with those who say that we should be prepared at the earliest possible moment to defend our way of life, our liberties, and even our existence against the combined hostile power of all of those nations which are daily demonstrating before our eyes their uniformity and close coordination of purpose and of power to bring to destruction and under servitude all of the free peoples of the earth.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I desire to invite particular attention to the last paragraph of Mr. Abend's article, wherein he quotes from the Soviet monthly review, Economy and Industry, announcing that in this vast region near Alaska, Moscow has more than 6,000 research parties in operation, partly engaged in seeking mineral deposits. Much as we detest and despise the slave mentality which finds its most perfect expression in the Soviet form of government, it must be admitted that the Soviet Government has shown much more intelligence and foresight than has our own Government in recognizing the value of its northern regions and taking adequate steps for the economic development of those regions.

Let me give just one illustration. On our side of Bering Strait and Bering Sea in Alaska extends a considerable area perhaps 400 miles long and 100 miles broad in which relatively small quantities of the most common tin ore, cassiterite, are found mixed with the placer gravels. In fact, there is sufficient of this ore in places, as at Tin City near Bering Strait, that some of it is mined by one of the more ordinary placer-gravel-mining methods. Tin is a vital necessity for our industrial well-being and equally necessary in time of war. We import practically all we use. And yet until this year our Government has declined to make the slightest effort to determine whether or not a domestic source of tin measurably sufficient for our needs may be developed in northwestern Alaska, the only place in the United States which offers any substantial promise for production of tin. We can at least properly emulate the Russians to the extent of attempting to find out whether it will be possible to end our dependence upon foreign sources of supply of this vital and strategic mineral by developing a domestic source in Alaska.

Mr. Abend's article, condensed as appearing in the Washington Post, is as follows:

SOVIET PAPERS TALK OF GETTING ALASKA BACK—THOUSANDS SETTLING IN NEARBY SIBERIA; GUNS, FORTS ERECTED

(By Hallett Abend)

SHANGHAI (special correspondence).—When on June 14 Alaska's delegate to Congress, ANTHONY J. DIMOND, announced in Washington that thousands of Russians, supposedly colonists, were being settled on Big Diomede Island in Bering Strait, only 5 miles from Little Diomede, an American island, he sounded an alarm for the American position in Alaska.

From confidential information, and an official Soviet war map, it appears that the United States Army and Navy should take alarm, too.

Working in secrecy, the Soviet Government during the last 6 years had deported all the natives from the Bering district and has sent tens of thousands of trained young Soviet soldiers and workmen into this far northern area.

GUNS, AIRFIELDS SET UP

Simultaneously a string of nearly a dozen "Soviet bases of culture," which include army and navy contingents, have been established in this region, fortresses have been built, coast-defense guns have been mounted, submarine bases are being built, airfields have been completed, and all foreigners are rigorously excluded from the whole area.

The United States does not threaten Russia's position in the northeastern part of Asia, and the region is far from Japan's plans for Asiatic mainland expansion. In the opinion of military and naval men here, this vast and secret military development can mean only a Soviet design against sparsely populated and poorly defended Alaska, which was Russian territory before the United States bought it.

Soviet newspapers and magazines have been devoting much space to Alaska and its riches, while articles extol the deeds of Czarist generals and admirals of a century ago. There is an intensification of the campaign for "recovery of rich lands that once belonged to Russia but do not belong to the United Soviet Socialist Republics because they were ineptly lost or corruptly sold later when the dynasty became decadent."

THOUSANDS SETTLING

Since the only territory that Czarist Russia ever sold outright was Alaska, the implications are plain.

The thousands of young Russian men and women who are being settled in northeast Siberia are all representatives of the "younger generation" that has matured entirely under Soviet control. They are said to be carried away with the idea that they are to be the glorious conquerors of the world, that they must sow the seeds of revolution everywhere, and that, to quote from a Vladivostok newspaper, their mission "first of all is to get their hands on Alaska, which so idiotically was sold to capitalist America by the Czarist Government."

These far northern outposts of Soviet empire are not isolated and inaccessible. They have good sources of supplies and are rapidly developing more supply lines for civilian needs and for military necessaries.

ARCTIC ROUTE DEVELOPED

From time to time during the last 2 years there have appeared relatively obscure news items about trips of Soviet warships, submarines, and merchantmen from Murmansk and Archangel on the White Sea to Vladivostok. Soviet newspapers now corroborate the news that a far-northern route has been developed that is feasible despite ice floes.

A branch of the warm Japan current appears to be deflected along the coast of north Kamchatka, and then pushes through the Bering Strait before turning westward. This warm ocean flow makes navigation possible in regions far north of portions of the Siberian coast, which are icebound half the year.

The Soviet monthly review, Economy and Industry, announces that in this vast region near Alaska, Moscow has more than 6,000 research parties in operation, their activities running all the way from looking for gold, coal, iron, and other mineral deposits, to organizing punitive expeditions for the extermination of illegal settlements of Russian peasants and native tribesmen. No outsider may live in this area. At least 80,000 Chinese and Koreans have been deported westward to work on railway projects.

Willkie in Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CENTERVILLE (IOWA) DAILY IOWEGIAN

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Centerville (Iowa) Daily Iowegian of August 6, 1940:

WILLKIE IN IOWA

Iowans who saw and heard Wendell Willkie in Des Moines Monday were convinced that a new type of candidate has appeared on the scene. He made it plain that he did not set himself above the people with whom he had grown up in a midwest agricultural environment. But he was glad to have the opportunity of a place of leadership where he hoped he could do the job of restoring the country to the ways of life for which it was founded. He saw as the great fundamental issue in this campaign the restoration of such ideals. He was hunting for the best approach to the farm problem, proposing to hold on to all that is good and find the things that are better. He tried to make it plain that he is approaching the whole matter, not as a theorist, but as one who has been next to the soil. Asked whether he could pick out the farm on which he once husked corn north of Ottumwa, he said he believed he could, but did not remember the name. He was strong for bringing industry and the farm closer together by decentralizing industry from the large cities and putting it into many smaller cities such as are to be found in Iowa. He sees the big job of the future as that of getting unity instead of discord among the various elements in American life. He believes Government should be the great coordinator working for justice to all, and not an instrument for setting class against class.

Mr. Willkie was not making campaign speeches in Des Moines. His addresses were brief. In his press and other conferences he answered many questions with sincerity and plainly. Some he said he preferred to leave for his acceptance speech and later addresses. He promised to return to Iowa.

It was a rather odd spectacle to see this man who, until a few months ago had not figured in politics, now the candidate for President. He has qualities of leadership that caused the American people to become his advocates and demand his nomination. He is the champion of the fair deal in government, and he believes in the ability of the American people to meet all obstacles and carry on to greater achievements, if they are not hampered by unwise laws and burdened with unbearable taxes and debt.

America—On Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the Nation is now witnessing a repetition of the scenes and occurrences of 1917, when wild-eyed zealots and loud-mouthed exponents of intolerance undertook immediately to impugn the motives and to blast the reputation of anyone who disagreed with their demand that this Nation go to war. One of the most vociferous and hot-tempered bigots of them all was a certain Detroit industrialist whose business organization later secured fat war contracts on a cost-plus-10-percent basis. After the war this same business organization was compelled by this Government to restore to the Treasury more than $1,500,000 which a Government audit disclosed had been overpaid on its contracts. This instance is only one of many of like character which occurred at that time.

There are still in the United States Congress men who were then branded as traitors to their country because they dared to advocate caution and coolness in sending American boys to spill their blood and give up their lives on the fields of France. We all know of the dreadful injustices and persecutions which occurred under the hysteria of war in those days, persecutions and injustices which have been regretted ever since by every right-thinking American citizen.

Yet today the same mistakes are being repeated, the same injustices are being wrought, the same intolerance is being shown, not alone in connection with the foreign policy being followed by the administration but also in connection with the political campaign.

Men of high standing, of outstanding achievements, of unquestioned patriotism and of proven experience and ability, such as Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, are being bitterly attacked by spokesmen for the administration because they dare to differ with the views of the little crowd of exploiters and opportunists surrounding the President.

"Fifth columnist" has become a common epithet in the vocabulary of those who would again lead this country into war on a wave of hysteria and manufactured fear.

The President himself is now bitterly condemning those who refuse to agree to his third-term aspirations. Even his early supporters, who, after finding the trends and the tendencies of this New Deal administration, had to part company with it, are not safe from the acid of his denunciations. Men who, while they were supporting him, the President declared to be the greatest patriots in the Nation, regardless of whether they were Republicans or Democrats or Socialists or Communists, he is now quick to condemn if they disagree either with his policies or with his ambitions.

There is one trait that has been common to all dictators throughout history. It is common of all dictators today. That trait is intolerance of criticism, disagreement, or opposition to their policies. Every dictator history has ever known has crushed out as quickly as he could every agency of criticism or opposition as soon as he attained to sufficient power.

No well-read person can deny that we have witnessed in this Nation attempt after attempt to crush out newspapers,

Members of Congress—any sort of opposition or criticism of New Deal policies and acts.

It is time for the American people to awaken to the danger that is indicated by these significant attacks which are so quickly made by spokesmen of the administration on those who dare to disagree with their policies or their acts.

In that day when any political party in America rises above criticism we can prepare for the dictator to come. Whenever it becomes un-American, unpatriotic, or unsafe for any citizen, from the most humble farmer to the highest figure in industry or finance honestly to criticize the policies and the acts of the public servants, in that day the American way is ended and dictatorship has begun.

There are people in this country, people in places of power and influence who want to take this Nation into war. They want to embroil us in the conflict now going on in Europe. And they, of course, want no opposition; they want no criticism; they will spare no effort to impugn the motives and if necessary to assassinate the character of anyone who opposes them.

But it still remains a fact that in the United States of America we can say what we think, and so long as we have that privilege the plotters cannot too easily persuade us into war.

But the American people must constantly be on guard.

Labor and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, OF NEW YORK, AND AN ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN FEDERATIONIST

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an article entitled "Exploding a Myth," appearing in the American Federationist, official publication of the American Federation of Labor, issue of August 1940, together with an article by myself from the American Forum, entitled "Does National Defense Require Modification of Existing Labor Laws?" appearing in the Washington Daily News for June 22, 1940.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Federationist for August 1940]

EXPLODING A MYTH

In these incredible times, when the events of today telescope into those of yesterday, when world-shaking upheavals pile upon one another between sunrise and sunset, the vision of the keenest observer is easily blurred by the rapidity of developments.

When there is little time to plot the cross-currents underlying the trend of events or to chart their direction, even skilled observers may find it hard to sort out fact from fiction and check the reliability of their sources.

In this tense atmosphere in which powerful forces seek to sway public opinion, in which gigantic interests strive for recognition and struggle for preservation of their special domain, it is easy for a false rumor to spread and gain acceptance and for fabricated fiction to be mistaken for solid fact.

SLY ANTILABOR PROPAGANDA

It is not surprising that under these conditions, when our people are mobilizing their every resource for the gigantic task of national defense, subtle propaganda is widely used to reinforce covert attacks against labor.

An outstanding example of this is a widespread assault against American labor standards recently launched from several quarters under a flimsy cover of pretense that the maintenance of fair labor standards is an obstacle to our defense activity.

The ink was not yet dry on the bills embodying the first defense measures and congressional committees had not yet met to consider them, when the first shout went up from groups determined to make the most of the emergency for their own profit, in blind disregard of the welfare and real interests of the American people.

"Repeal the wage and hour law," was the outcry. "Amend all statutes protecting labor standards. Make room for unlimited hours of work."

The demand was promptly echoed by columnists and editorial writers throughout the length and breadth of the land. This demand was widely repeated because the argument used to back it sounded so plausible.

First of all, it was argued that the wage and hour law, Walsh-Healey Act, and other statutes limiting the work week to 42 or 40 hours made it impossible to produce the airplanes, warships, tanks, and guns necessary for national defense quickly enough and in sufficiently large quantities.

Maximum hours imposed by these laws, it was said, would cause critical shortages of skilled workers and would create bottlenecks in defense production.

To clinch the argument, those marshaling the attack on labor standards made a sweeping comparison between our maximum-hour laws and the French 40-hour law of 1936. Thus a great legend was created overnight.

According to this legend, the French 40-hour-week law made it impossible to produce the war materials needed for defense and was thus the primary cause of the French defeat. Our laws are the same, it was claimed, and, being therefore equally destructive, should be stricken at once from the statute books.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

The issue raised by these allegations goes to the vital roots of our whole problem of national security. Its dominant importance in shaping the policies which will determine the destiny of our Nation demands a searching examination of the facts.

Just what was the French maximum-hour legislation? How did it operate? What was its relation to the French production program? How did it compare with our wage and hour law and other American laws providing for maximum hours of work?

The French labor law in question was a decree promulgated on June 21, 1936, soon after the popular-front government of Leon Blum came into power. It was part of a legislative program which in its entirety was Marxian-Socialist in orientation and was frankly aimed to curb and even stifle private enterprise.

In its very direction the French legislation differed fundamentally from the American labor legislation of recent years. For the French law represented the attitude of antagonism toward a system of free enterprise and private profit, while the American labor laws were based on the principle of cooperation of labor, management, and Government and were designed to improve the mechanism of our competitive system by offsetting the destructive effects of the depression.

The principle of the maximum hours of work was by no means new in France. From the end of the nineteenth century French workers were protected by maximum-hour laws which generally provided for a 48-hour workweek.

The law of 1936 established a rigid maximum workweek of 40 hours in industry and of 38 hours and 40 minutes in underground mining. The law provided that workers should receive the same regular weekly wage despite the reduction in maximum hours.

NO PROVISIONS FOR READJUSTMENTS

This meant a 20-percent increase in hourly wage rates for nearly all French workers—an increase applied abruptly, without providing an opportunity for necessary readjustment.

The decree itself was merely a statement of legislative policy which left the method of application to the council of ministers. This was done by means of supplementary decrees effecuating the basic law in each industry.

For the bulk of employees in basic industries the maximum hours were rigidly applied, permitting no overtime whatsoever. In continuous-operation industries, split shifts, rotation of work, and other devices necessary to insure continuity of production were forbidden. Only in a few isolated industries was an attempt made to accomplish the transition slowly. In a vast majority of industries the hours were cut in one operation.

There are several vital differences between the French law and the American laws applying to the hours of work.

With but a few minor exceptions, the French law prohibited all work beyond the maximum limit set, while our laws make possible unrestricted overtime work and merely require that overtime compensation be paid for excessive hours of work.

The French law not only established a rigid maximum but, except in a few instances, accomplished the reduction in a single drastic readjustment. Our Fair Labor Standards Act lowered the overtime pay limit in three gradual steps, each spaced a year apart.

The most important difference is found in the fact that, while the French law established a maximum which drastically curtailed the prevailing normal hours, our laws placed the overtime requirement at a level actually above the average workweek prevailing in the industry.

In most of the French industries the workweek was reduced from 48, and in some industries from 56, to 40 hours per week. In contrast with this effective reduction of from 8 to 16 hours per week in actual hours of work, our wage and hour law merely placed an overtime-pay requirement at the final limit of 40 hours per week when the average workweek in the entire industry was averaging considerably less than 40 hours.

With the basic decree enacted in June 1936 and supplementary decrees issued at varying intervals, the French maximum-hour law did not become fully effective until the summer of 1937. Its complete application to French industry lasted less than a year.

By the spring of 1938 the popular-front government was no longer in office. The process of liberalizing the rigid standards of the law was begun with the decree of May 24, 1938, which permitted increases beyond the maximum of as much as 8 hours per week.

By August 1938 another decree was promulgated, authorizing further lengthening of the workweek in all establishments connected with national defense, safety, or public service.

After Munich the Daladier-Reynaud law was formulated, and it was put into effect on November 12, 1938. This law extended the workweek to 50 hours.

Following the decree of March 20, 1939, and a general decree issued in April 1939, as part of the defense program, the wartime enactment of September 1, 1939, authorized a general 60-hour week, with a week as long as 72 hours in certain national-defense and public-service operations.

This brief chronicle of the rise and fall of the French labor law makes it clear that there was no connection between its provisions and the defense of the French Republic. The authors of the French labor-law myth have clearly strayed from the facts in urging their conclusions.

They did so also when they claimed that among the reasons for the French defeat was the fact that German workers were toiling 84 hours a week for 5 years preceding the war while the French were easing along at a 40-hour pace.

Of course, these statements are equally untrue. From July 6, 1934, to January 1, 1939, German industry was on a 48-hour week. This means that 9 months before the war broke out, the French allowed industry to work longer hours than the Germans.

EVEN HITLER FOUND OUT

The Nazis introduced a 60-hour week in January 1939.

In certain munitions industries longer hours were permitted, but the Nazis soon discovered, as did others before them, that long hours tended to destroy efficiency instead of improving it. The back-breaking schedules had to be cut down to reasonable length in order to maintain maximum production per worker.

To quote from the Monthly Labor Review:

"Production began to fall off rapidly, accompanied by such an alarming increase of industrial accidents and stoppages as to attract the serious attention of the governmental authorities. * * * The government applied the sternest measures against the suspected saboteurs, but also began to lighten somewhat the hard labor conditions."

As Colonel Fleming, the Wage and Hour Administrator, tersely put it:

"The Nazis could shoot the lagging worker, but they couldn't stand outraged Mother Nature up against the wall. Fatigue is still fatigue in any language. This accords with common sense and the experience of every other industrial nation.

"The fact is that no important nation in the world today, whether democratic, Fascist, or Communist, believes that it is possible for a modern industrial system to operate in peace or war without social and labor regulation."

In England, too, they pushed defense production to the hilt. In many war factories workers were put on the schedule of as many as 78 hours a week. Current experience has shown, however, that this did not help meet the maximum production requirements.

On July 18, 1940, the Minister of Labor, Ernest Bevin, stated that "excessive overtime in war factories is retarding rather than increasing production." He announced that because long weekly hours not only impaired production schedules but also injured the health of workers, beginning August 1 maximum-hour schedules designed to yield maximum production would be put into effect.

OUR OWN EXPERIENCE

This squares with the experience in our own country. During the last war our Army was as desperately in need of supplies as it is today. The Army's primary concern was not reemployment, or welfare, or leisure of the workers. Its foremost consideration was that of efficiency.

Remembering this, let us look at General Order No. 13, issued by the Chief of Ordnance and by the Quartermaster General of the United States Army on November 15, 1917, 7 months after we had entered the war.

In the words of the ranking officers of the Army responsible for supply and production of munitions, addressed to arsenal commanders and manufacturers:

"Industrial history proves that reasonable hours, fair working conditions, and a proper wage scale are essential to high production. The pressing argument for maintaining industrial safeguards in the present emergency is that they actually contribute to efficiency. To waive them would be a short-sighted policy, leading gradually but inevitably toward lowered production.

"It might be expected that an individual working 10 hours a day, instead of 8, would turn out more goods. He can—for the first few days.

"But experience shows us that in a few weeks, or a few months, the output will be the same, or even less, than it was during the shorter day."

Suppose we put the accuracy of this statement to a practical test and lengthen the hours. Here is what happens when that is done, as illustrated by a thoroughgoing study of the British Health of Munitions Workers Commission during the last war:

In a munitions plant women workers were employed in turning fuse bodies. At 47½ hours per week each worker produced 169 pieces per hour. When the hours were 54½, each worker produced 131 pieces. At 66 hours per week the hourly output per worker was cut down to 108 pieces.

Did the lengthening of hours result in increased weekly production? No, the lengthening of hours did not help a bit. The weekly output of the worker at 47½ hours was 8,028 fuse bodies. At 66 hours per week it was only 7,128.

The maintenance of the standards of hours of work laid down in the Fair Labor Standards Act, in the Healey-Walsh Act, and in other statutes now in effect in the United States is thus clearly imperative. Not only as a means of reemployment for the still enormous reservoir of jobless workers, not only as a welfare measure concerned with the health of workers and with prevention of industrial accidents, but above all as a measure dictated by the stern considerations of productive efficiency.

Our laws are flexible. They place no compulsory maximum on hours per week or per day. They merely require that for excessively long hours workers be compensated at the rate of time and one-half the regular rate of pay.

The heavy demands of defense production bring the operations in the industries concerned to near capacity. To these industries capacity production on defense orders means profitable production.

In special situations in which the nature of operations requires overtime work, manufacturers filling defense orders can more than afford to pay the overtime required by law. They have been paying such overtime and will continue to pay it under voluntary union agreements with most of the skilled craftsmen they employ.

The semiskilled and unskilled workers who are not equally well organized and among whom unemployment is more widespread should not be deprived of the protection of overtime pay extended to them by law.

The story of the French law which has been so widely heralded and repeated with such credulity can be dismissed for all time as a chimeric myth.

NO EFFECT ON FRENCH MIGHT

Neither did the French law resemble our labor legislation nor did its short life affect the industrial strength of France. Certainly the French experience with maximum hours in 1936–37 offers no valid ground for modification of our laws.

In the words of the Wage and Hour Administrator, Colonel Fleming: "No relaxation of the wage and hour law is necessary at this time, nor is it desirable. Legitimate businessmen themselves are not asking for it, because they know perfectly well that it does not handicap them.

"The law is fair, because if upon labor is laid the burden of long hours, a corresponding burden is laid upon the employer who must pay for that overtime. The wage and hour law represents a part of that fair, equitable, democratic order of which we are so proud and which we are resolved to defend at any cost.

"Certainly no sane man defends his most priceless possessions by throwing them away as he gets ready to fight for them."

[From the Washington Daily News of June 22, 1940]

THE AMERICAN FORUM: DOES NATIONAL DEFENSE REQUIRE MODIFICATION OF EXISTING LABOR LAWS?

(By ROBERT F. WAGNER, United States Senator from New York)

Modern warfare embraces all the economic and human resources of the combatants. The conditions on the home front, the services of supply, and productive efficiency of industry are all as important in a successful war effort as the maneuvers of armies on the battlefield. By the same token, successful preparation for national defense requires the maintenance of high morale and vigor in the economic system backing up the armed forces.

In a dictatorship, which can conscript labor and control every phase of industry and finance, these essentially human factors may not be all-important. They are decisive, however, in a democracy such as ours, which in peace or war has held fast to the principle that "the highest and best form of efficiency is the spontaneous cooperation of a free people."

That is why, in the name of national defense, apart from all other reasons, we must not weaken the social legislation which protects the masses of our working people against insecurity and exploitation. To relax those safeguards on the industrial front would provide fertile soil indeed for the termites of the "fifth column."

We could not be true to ourselves, and to the ideals we are preparing to defend against aggression from without, if we failed to press our drive to provide a democracy of opportunity within our gates for all the basic necessities of life.

STRONG INDUSTRIAL DEFENSES

In the last 7 years, we have built our industrial defenses well. In 1917, our industrial system was completely unprepared for the unprecedented demands that were made upon it. The Federal Government was compelled to improvise principle after principle, agency after agency. The remarkable fact is that the essential principles of industrial efficiency arrived at by trial-and-error methods during our participation in the World War, are now firmly established in our normal, peacetime economy.

The mobilization of our labor supply for armament production was then an extremely difficult and unwieldly operation. That task can now be readily achieved through the United States Employment Service. In meeting the housing requirements of expanding industrial areas, we need only increase the financial sinews of the United States Housing Authority, instead of hastily creating a new and untried agency as we did in 1918.

Standards for minimum wages, fair and healthful working conditions, and recognition of collective bargaining had to be worked out during the wartime emergency by the temporary War Labor Board, under the cochairmanship of William Howard Taft, former President and later Chief Justice. Comparable standards are now written into permanent law.

LABOR STABILIZED

Agencies for the adjustment and arbitration of labor disputes were established piecemeal during the last war, after most of the labor troubles arose. Today we have available the excellent facilities of the Railroad and Maritime Labor Boards and the expanded United States Conciliation Service. A final, powerful factor in the higher efficiency of our industrial machine at the present time is the stabilizing influence of collective-bargaining agreements, effective over a larger area of American industry than ever before.

The labor standards improvised during the last wartime emergency period proved so effective that Charles Evans Hughes, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, publicly declared after the armistice: "I trust there will be no more struggles in futile opposition to the right of collective bargaining on the part of employees. The recognition of the right of representation and the prompt hearing of grievances provide the open doors to reasonable and just settlements. And in returning to peace conditions there should be the utmost care to preserve every possible means which has been found helpful during the war for the investigation of the complaints of labor and for the adjustments of demands."

Failure to adopt this suggestion at the time contributed to the enormous increase in labor strife that followed. The number of workers involved in strikes during 1919 was greater than in any prior or subsequent year in our entire history.

INDUSTRIAL LIBERTY PREVAILS

The application of these principles of justice and fair play since the National Labor Relations Act was upheld in 1937 has brought increasing labor peace and increasing resort to the peaceful practices of collective bargaining. An even greater measure of industrial peace should continue to be sought in accordance with the tenets of democracy. But we do not want industrial peace on the Fascist and Communist model—peace purchased at the price of industrial liberty.

In expanding our armament production, it is important to recognize that the maximum-hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Walsh-Healey Act impose no restraints on productive efficiency or the use of the available labor supply for armament purposes. Both laws permit the maximum to be exceeded if time and a half for overtime is paid. This is a standard clause embodied in innumerable collective bargaining agreements.

For the Government to abandon that standard in its armament contracts would place fair employers at a competitive disadvantage in bidding for Government work, and in effect would levy a special tax on the wages of those who happen to be employed in defense industries. The more extensive the Government's expenditures, the more important it becomes that such expenditures be used to maintain wages, expand purchasing power, and uphold fair social standards of employment.

FLEXIBLE STATUTES

The much-discussed 40-hour week established in France in 1936, with limited exceptions, rigidly restricted the working time of the entire establishment and allowed no overtime by individual workers, at least in its inception. As already stated, our own recent statutes have carefully avoided those blunders. Moreover, to meet the labor requirements of naval construction, an 8-hour-day law, dating from the year 1892 and applicable to all public works, is now being properly adjusted to permit overtime work at the time and a half rate.

With this minor adjustment, our statutes will be flexible enough to meet our present defense requirements, while continuing the national policy of encouraging absorption of the unemployed by private industry.

There is no present shortage of labor, skilled or unskilled. Should such a shortage develop and the needs of national defense require relaxation of maximum-hour standards, labor's traditional patriotism guarantees that proper adjustments will be worked out through its representatives in our councils of national defense. But until that emergency presents itself, there is only one patriotic answer to those who clamor for relaxation of work week standards—an emphatic no.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM MOUNT STERLING (KY.) GAZETTE

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the fearless and well-edited Mount Sterling (Ky.) Gazette.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE LIKE HOLT NEEDED

What is needed at Washington in this hour of the Nation's "emergency," as Mr. Roosevelt calls it, is more men like United States Senator RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia. He is a real American, an honest-to-God fighter, and minces no words when he takes his position. It is men like Senator HOLT who will keep this country out of war, if it is kept out, and we need more Americans like him in the United States Senate. Here's hoping that he lives long to fight for the Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights, and for true American principles. It is a disgrace to the country that we do not have at Washington in the Congress—House and Senate—more real Americans who care more for the lives of the sturdy youths of America than for a trip across the "big pond" to meddle in something in which we have no interest. Senator HOLT, we salute you, and express the hope that you will continue to fight to keep the boys of the United States out of a war across seas.

Raising Willkie Campaign Funds by Chain-Letter Methods

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] talks about propaganda, and the new leader of the Republican Party, Mr. Wendell Willkie, complains about certain advertisements which he contends appear in a publication got out by the Democratic National Committee. I want to call attention to the latest departure, which is a chain-letter system to raise campaign funds for the Willkie candidacy. I have here one of these chain letters.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I have not the time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to tell the gentleman that is not official in any sense of the word.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know whether it is official or not, but I have here one of these letters signed by the head of a lumber publication, and it asks that everybody send in a certain amount of money and send numbers of these chain letters to other individuals for the same purpose and to address them to the Advertising Industrial Section, Willkie Campaign Fund, Roosevelt Hotel, Madison Avenue at Forty-fifth Street, New York City.

This chain letter reads as follows:

ADVERTISING INDUSTRY CHAIN LETTER

Here's an opportunity to participate in a chain letter that will really do all of us who enjoy life when business is moving forward a real service.

Mr. Wendell L. Willkie has said he does not want large individual campaign contributions. So—let those of us who are concerned with advertising, whether it be publishing, printing, typesetting, platemaking, papermaking, inkmaking, agency service, or managing advertising departments, start a chain-letter effort that will pour a flood of individual contributions of dollar bills into the Willkie campaign fund. Send your dollar bill in today in the attached envelope to:

Advertising Industry Section, Willkie Campaign Fund, Roosevelt Hotel, Madison Avenue at Forty-fifth Street, New York City.

Then send a copy of this letter to each of five men you know personally who earn a livelihood in the advertising industry, attaching an envelope made out to the above address. If you have already received and acted on an advertising industry chain letter, pass this one on to someone you know personally in the advertising business, whose name was not on your previous list.

Do this now: And Mr. Wendell L. Willkie will be able to finance his campaign in such a way that no large individual campaign contributions are necessary. Don't break this chain because it will help American business and that can't help but be beneficial to you. Don't break this chain because it will show that the right copy appeal to the right people will pull.

I understand that the Mr. Wood who signed this particular copy of this chain letter is the editor of the Lumber Journal.

If the Republican Party, under this new leadership, is going to criticize the Democratic Party for accepting advertisements in its campaign book, and yet permit these chain letters to be spread all over the country to raise funds in this way then the people of the country ought to know it, so they can manifest their disapproval in the proper way. [Applause.]

City, County, and State Officials, Not W. P. A., Responsible for Projects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, on August 7 the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] spread over two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD quotations from newspapers designed to show inefficiency and waste on the part of the Work Projects Administration. The W. P. A. activities upon which the accusations are based are located in New Bedford, Mass., and Los Angeles, Calif., and the data upon which these charges are based consist primarily of newspaper articles in papers not friendly to the administration.

The principal charge against the W. P. A. at New Bedford is that it is operating a project calling for the construction of watershed road improvements which are alleged to be unnecessary and wasteful, and for which the project authorization is said to be illegal.

I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts has been a member of the W. P. A. investigating committee for a sufficient period of time to have learned by now that W. P. A. does not conjure up the projects it operates by gazing into a crystal. He should know by now that W. P. A. operates no projects unless they are properly sponsored by local governmental units, and for which these local governments are required to put up an average of 25 percent of the total costs. In summing up his remarks on this subject, the gentleman from Massachusetts said, and I quote:

> I trust that the W. P. A. will investigate both matters thoroughly and deal with them as they deserve to be dealt with.

I am happy to inform the gentleman from Massachusetts that both of these matters are under investigation, and, while these investigations are not yet complete, certain facts have already been uncovered which should be of interest.

The New Bedford project is sponsored by the city of New Bedford, and the project proposal bears the signature of Leo E. J. Carney, mayor of New Bedford. The city of New Bedford is contributing $66,689 toward this allegedly inefficient and wasteful project. The official description of this project states:

> Improve roads in watershed area of New Bedford, including clearing, grubbing, excavating, filling, scarifying, grading, rolling, surfacing, draining, constructing tool sheds, and performing incidental and appurtenant work, all on publicly owned property.

According to the mayor of New Bedford, these roads are the only means of access to large areas of the watersheds bordering city-owned ponds. Mayor Carney states on this project proposal, and I quote:

> These roads must be kept open to permit the waterwork apparatus and watershed patrol to reach these vital sections. Should a fire start * * * severe damage would certainly result to city-owned property.

The National Board of Underwriters has recommended that this work be done and is on record as to its necessity and value.

The charge that this road construction will cost $14,000 per mile is without foundation in fact. The records show that the total cost per mile, together with other work, is running at approximately $6,500 per mile, which is a reasonable cost for the type of work being done.

There is substantial evidence to indicate that this whole thing is merely a partisan political attack on the W. P. A. growing out of a squabble between Mr. Howard C. Mandell, Chief Engineer of the New Bedford Water Department, and other local officials. Not one scintilla of evidence has been uncovered to indicate that this project is either wasteful, unnecessary, inefficient, or illegal.

As for the charges of inefficiency and waste in the Los Angeles case: These accusations are based upon articles appearing in the Los Angeles Times, a notoriously anti New Deal newspaper, that the W. P. A. permitted destruction of rubber boots, raincoats, rubber hose, galvanized buckets, and garbage cans, most of which were said to be still in good condition.

While this investigation likewise is not yet complete, it has disclosed already that the rubber hose and oilskin raincoats and hats had become deteriorated from many months of use so that they were no longer waterproof. The garbage cans had been used for several months as latrines on firebreak projects, and the buckets had been used on a syphilis-clinic project. I do not think that even the gentleman from Massachusetts would urge violating ordinary sanitary or health precautions by continuing the use of these objects. Another interesting aspect of this exposé is that when the first truckload of unusuable material arrived at the dump a photographer from the Los Angeles Times was on hand and waiting to snap a picture.

The facts as here presented, based upon preliminary investigations, indicate beyond a doubt that these accusations of waste and inefficiency are simply trumped-up charges promoted by anti-Administration newspapers, aided and abetted by local politicians, with the sole purpose of smearing the Work Projects Administration.

It can be said to the credit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], that he did say that he was not in possession of sufficient evidence to personally assail the projects or words to that effect. When the official report is received I hope he will place it in the RECORD because undoubtedly the Administrator will furnish him with a copy.

Mr. Speaker, during the campaign smear W. P. A. will be in evidence. Of course, we will be unable to answer every criticism but the public should remember if there are projects subject to criticism the criticism should be directed to the community and State officials who father the applications and who contribute toward their completion. Do not blame the Federal officials for useless projects, if there be such, but assail those who make the applications for such projects, city, county, and State officials

War Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

LETTER WRITTEN BY HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER, OF WISCONSIN, TO WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me to Mr. William Allen White:

AUGUST 8, 1940.

Mr. WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE,
Chairman, Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York City, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. WHITE: I acknowledge receipt of your committee's reprint from the Gallup poll, and wish to advise that from the reports which I receive, the Gallup poll, in favor of compulsory military service, is nothing but warmonger propaganda.

I note among the members of your committee a considerable number of wealthy men, as well as many who are under the 65-year-age limit contained in the Burke-Wadsworth compulsory military service bill which your committee supports.

There is no law to prohibit the members of your committee who desire to help the Allies from contributing any or all of their wealth to the British cause or to prevent them from leaving for Canada to enlist for active service in the new British Foreign Legion or the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Why do they not do this and stop trying to get the United States into a foreign war 3,000 miles across the sea and draft others under a compulsory military service program to do the fighting and the dying.

Your committee has flooded the country with expansive and expensive "stop Hitler" war intervention propaganda. Why don't its members and financial angels turn over their many millions to England and enlist in the Canadian Expeditionary Force without delay and go onward and forward to meet Mr. Hitler and his legions on the field of battle.

I notice in the headlines of this morning's press that "Canada omits allegiance oath so Americans can enlist in her land, sea, and air forces." Do not delay, Mr. White, as you ought to be a pretty good general in charge of collecting for and disbursing supplies and pay-check funds for your committee's foreign legion expeditionary force.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. SCHAFER.

The Third-Term Tradition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSE P. WOLCOTT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

LETTER FROM JOHN R. ROOD, ATTORNEY AT LAW

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Mr. John R. Rood, attorney at law, of Lapeer, Mich., former professor of law at the University of Michigan.

JOHN R. ROOD,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,
Lapeer, Mich., August 9, 1940.

Hon. JESSE P. WOLCOTT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WOLCOTT: There is a notion abroad that the only objection to the third term for President is the third-term tradition. May I ask you to correct this error through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? You have the ear of the public, and it is an important point needing attention at this time.

The danger to liberty from long continuance of the Chief Executive in one hand has been known since the most ancient times. Writing 350 years before Christ, Aristotle (from whom Alexander the Great learned the mysteries of statecraft) said: "By this means both aristocracies and democracies will be less liable to be corrupted into dynasties; because it will not be so easy for those who are magistrates for a little while to do as much mischief as they could in a long time; for it is from thence that tyrannies arise in democracies and oligarchies." (Aristotle on Politics, book V, ch. 8.)

By the laws of the Roman Republic the consul was permitted to hold office only 2 years; and Cicero in his Utopian system proposed: "No one shall hold the same office a second time except after an interval of 10 years." (DeLegibus Liber III, sec. 3.)

Julius Caesar violated the Roman code to cause himself to be reelected consul four times in succession, and after his campaign in Spain against the sons of Pompey, had himself elected for life, thus ending the Republic, and Augustus Caesar by force continued the Empire.

The Fundamental Orders of Connecticut (1639), the first American constitution adopted by the people, limited the chief magistrate's term to 1 year. (West's Source Book, sec. 93; Commager's Documents, p. 22.)

No people ever were so well informed on the science of government and the perils to liberty as the generation that wrote the United States Constitution. Nearly every one of the first State constitutions prohibited the chief executive to hold office longer than a short-named term. (Maryland, art. 31; North Carolina, art. 15; South Carolina, art. II, sec. 2; Georgia, art. 23; Delaware, art. 7; Virginia Bill of Rights, sec. 5; Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, sec. 8; Articles of Confederation, art. V, delegates to Congress being then the only executives.)

The prohibition was omitted from the United States Constitution because the members of the Convention had invented a system whereby the office of President would be nonpolitical—it would be impossible to influence the election of President, because he would be chosen by the best men in each State, meeting in their own States on the same day all over the country, men elected for the sole purpose of electing a President. As stated by William R. Davie, Delegate from North Carolina, in the Convention called to ratify the Constitution:

"It was urged that no undue influence could take place in his election; that as he was to be elected on the same day throughout the United States, no man could say to himself, 'I am the man'" (4 Elliot's Debates, p. 103).

When Thomas Jefferson discovered the omission, he wanted nine States to ratify the Constitution to make sure of the good it contained and the other four to reject it until this amendment could be made. Later, when the Legislatures of Vermont, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, and Georgia passed resolutions urging him to accept a third term, Jefferson replied:

"That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally 4 years, will in fact become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance."

In his autobiography Jefferson said:

"Should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views."

Andrew Jackson, another great Democratic President, in his message to Congress in 1830 urged Congress to submit an amendment to the United States Constitution to limit the President's term.

Dr. Herman V. Ames, in his learned treatise on The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History, says:

"Over 125 amendments have been submitted to change the term of President and fix the period of eligibility. These were brought out chiefly by the fear that the President would use the patronage of his office to secure reelection. More than 50 of these have been propositions to fix the term as 6 years. * * * This change has been advocated at different periods ever since, within recent years more frequently than ever before. All but 14 of these stipulated that the President should be ineligible to reelection" (Annual Report American Historical Soc. 1896, vol. 2, p. 123).

The omission of a constitutional prohibition against reelection of the President was due only to the belief that the system invented by the convention had disabled the President to influence his reelection; but you know the history of the electoral college, and how it has become a mere record of votes. It only illustrates once more how "The best laid schemes of mice and men," etc.

Lest we lose our liberties like the Romans did theirs by the election of a Caesar, please inform the voters that it is not merely a "third-term tradition."

RESOLUTION BY THE LEGISLATURE OF ALABAMA

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution adopted by the Legislature of Alabama with reference to the program of the President and Congress of the United States for an adequate national defense.

This resolution was introduced in the legislature and sponsored by the Honorable John G. White, representative from Perry County, Ala., in my district.

Whereas all the continents of the world except the Americas are torn by war; and

Whereas the totalitarian nations of the world, acting at the whim of their ruthless dictators, have almost completely overrun all the democratic nations of the world, except those in the Americas; and

Whereas the might of the military machines of the totalitarian nations have shocked the peoples of all the democratic powers of the world; and

Whereas the continued and ever increasing successes of the military machines of the totalitarian dictators present a most serious threat to all the democratic nations of the world, even those in the Americas; and

Whereas the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States have recently recognized these conditions and are rapidly taking sweeping steps to build up the defenses of the United States and to preserve the peace of the Americas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does wholeheartedly approve of this program of the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge a continuation of this program and pledge the wholehearted cooperation of the people of the State of Alabama to the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States in all of their efforts to prepare the Americas for peace; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, its Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, and the United States Senators and Members of Congress from the State of Alabama.

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY, on American Forum of the Air, Mutual Broadcasting System, Sunday, August 11, 1940:

Mr. TREADWAY. Chairman DOUGHTON and I have frequently crossed swords in political debate, both in the committee of which we are members and on the floor of the House of Representatives. Tonight, however, our subject is one which is directly connected with the defense program, with respect to which politics, as such, has been definitely adjourned. We are, therefore, meeting on a common ground, as patriotic citizens clothed with an official responsibility, to discuss the problem of how best to finance the vast national-defense expenditures which have been necessitated by the existing world situation.

During the present session of Congress, approximately $14,000,000,000 have been requested for national defense, as follows:

1. The President's Budget message of last January proposed the expenditure of nearly two billions for that purpose during the fiscal year beginning July 1.

2. On May 16, following the invasion of Belgium and Holland, the President personally appeared before Congress to request $1,182,000,000 of emergency defense appropriations.

3. Two weeks later, on May 31, the President requested a further sum of $1,278,000,000.

4. Subsequently, the Navy Department proposed the creation of a two-ocean navy at an estimated cost of approximately four and one-half billions of dollars over a 6-year period.

5. On July 10, the President sent a request to Congress for $4,800,000,000 of additional appropriations and authorizations for the Army and Navy.

While the expectation has been that each new request would be the last, the program continues to be expanded, and there is reason to believe that the end is not yet in sight. For the current fiscal year alone, actual appropriations and contract authorizations for national defense—enacted and pending—total $10,000,000,000. This stupendous sum has been voted with great speed and with almost unprecedented unanimity, for it is recognized that we as a nation are woefully unprepared to defend ourselves against aggression. Congress has practically taken the President's requests on faith without being able to find out the specific purposes for which the money was proposed to be spent, or what has been accomplished with the vast sums previously appropriated.

In authorizing the expenditure of billions of dollars for national defense, Congress has performed but half its task. The question still remains, Where are we going to get the money with which to finance the defense program? The President is reported to have said that this was a "minor detail." I thoroughly disagree. Without adequate revenue or borrowing power, the Treasury will be utterly unable to provide the money to meet the tremendous expenditures which must be made. During recent years, the Federal revenues have covered only half the cost of government, the balance having been provided for by the indiscriminate issuance of bonds. The resulting series of staggering annual deficits has doubled the national debt and virtually exhausted the previously authorized Federal borrowing power of forty-five billions.

Thus, as we face the task of preparing an adequate defense, we find the Treasury of the United States "broke," the public credit stretched to a dangerous and unprecedented level, and the available sources of revenue tapped almost to the limit. It is obvious that we must take immediate and drastic steps to put our financial house in order. The financial security of the Nation is the first requisite to real military security.

As we look to the uncertain future we naturally contrast our present unwholesome state of national finances with the situation which existed in 1916, when we were also embarking upon a preparedness program. At that time we had a national debt of only one and one-quarter billions of dollars, as compared with our present total of nearly forty-five billions. We had little difficulty then in raising twenty-five billions to provide for the emergency which subsequently faced us, but it might not be so easy now, and certainly it would jeopardize the public credit to increase the present debt by any such amount. As regards the available sources of revenue, they were largely unused in 1916, while today, as I have indicated; there are few places to which we can turn to raise any substantial amount of new taxes.

In our present situation we cannot, of course, finance the national-defense program entirely by borrowing, nor is it possible to raise sufficient additional revenue to pay for it as we go.

The question of how to provide the money for national defense has already been answered to a certain extent by the passage of the recent defense-tax bill, which became law on June 25. To my mind, the method therein provided offers the only practicable solution of the problem. That measure extends the present $45,000,000,000 debt limit by authorizing the issuance of four billions of special defense bonds. However, it also provides for their retirement over the next 5 years, and raises approximately $1,000,000,000 of new taxes annually during that period for this specific purpose.

By imposing new taxes to retire these defense bonds, Congress gives recognition to the fact that we cannot continue the past policy of constant borrowing without making some provision for paying off the obligations created.

The recent Defense Tax Act was intended to take care of the financing of the defense program as outlined in the President's Budget message of last January and in his messages of May 16 and May 31. No steps have as yet been taken, however, toward the financing of the four and one-half billion dollar supplemental naval program, nor the President's most recent request involving $4,800,000,000 of appropriations and authorizations, both of which proposals came after the tax bill had been drafted. Of course, it is as essential to raise the money for this part of the defense program as for the earlier phases, and it seems to me that the same method should be used.

We are at present faced with a crisis in Federal financing. The Treasury estimates that the deficit for the current fiscal year will be at least $5,700,000,000, which is more than the Treasury has authority to borrow, even with the recent $4,000,000,000 increase in the debt limit.

Where can we turn for additional Federal revenue? That question is one with which Congress must immediately concern itself.

At the present time, hearings are being held before the House Ways and Means Committee on a proposed excess-profits tax measure, the primary purpose of which is to prevent the making of any new millionaires out of the defense expenditures. While in the preparation of the pending proposal it has not been the purpose to raise any particular amount of revenue thereby, the fact is that a considerable sum will be realized, namely, from two hundred to three hundred million dollars annually.

Such amount of additional revenue as may be raised by this tax will of course help to provide for the financing of the President's most recent requests for supplemental defense appropriations, but still further revenue must be sought. The excess-profits tax alone will not do the job.

So far as I am aware, there are only two sources where any substantial amount may be realized. The first is by drastically increasing the normal income-tax rate, which at present is 4 percent, as compared with Great Britain's basic rate of 42½ percent. The second is by imposing a general sales tax.

One thing is certain about any new taxes that may be imposed in the future, and that is that they will inevitably fall on the great masses of the people. We now take as much as 79 cents out of every dollar of income received by the wealthy, and up to 70 cents out of every dollar they leave at death, and even if we absolutely confiscated the balance, the additional revenue which would be obtained would be but a "drop in the bucket" compared to what will actually be required. Moreover, we are now taxing corporations up to 20.9 percent under the regular income tax, which is nearly double the rate in effect during the last war, and we propose in the pending tax bill to add an excess-profits tax running up to 40 percent in addition. It must be obvious, therefore, that the average citizen will be the one to whom the Government will turn for further revenue, and Heaven knows he is already paying a heavy burden, particularly in indirect and hidden taxes, which are simply added to the cost of everything he buys.

Even when we have provided in full for national defense expenditures, we still have to consider the problem of financing the regular operating costs of the Government, which have been running far in the red for 10 years. My own advice would be to economize in expenditures before imposing any new taxes for nonmilitary expenditures. The people are being asked to "tighten up their belts" and get along with less in order to pay for national defense, and there is no reason why those departments of the Government which are not connected with the defense program should not be required to do likewise.

In conclusion, let me say that while the next few months will be a period of political discussion and activity, no partisanship will be found in connection with the much-needed and long-deferred national-defense program, although, of course, there may be honest differences of opinion as to details. Nevertheless, we are a united people in our determination to secure ourselves against aggression, and in our willingness to make every sacrifice or contribution necessary to make that security a reality. Finally, I wish to thank Mr. Graneck, who conducts the American Forum of the Air, for the opportunity of participating in this interesting hour. I hope the listeners over WOL and its coast-to-coast connections will obtain from my associates some ideas of the importance of the subject of financing national defense.

EDITORIAL FROM THE SAGINAW (MICH.) NEWS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, we have had some discussion here on legislation relative to a bridge, proposing the largest span in the world, across the Straits of Mackinac in my State of Michigan.

The Saginaw Daily News, a representative daily newspaper in Michigan and the largest paper in my district, is recognized for its sound editorials and generally voices the thoughts of the men and women in that area.

In an editorial on this straits bridge project appearing in its issue of August 8, the Saginaw News states "It would be nice to have but can we afford it?" That is the thought in the minds of a great throng of other Michigan people right now.

The editorial reads as follows:

[From the Saginaw (Mich.) News of August 8, 1940]

THE STRAITS BRIDGE

Two Michigan Congressmen distinguished themselves, whichever way one looks at it, when they joined hands in an unsuccessful attempt to block House approval of a bill to authorize construction of a gigantic bridge across the Straits of Mackinac.

From one viewpoint the two—Congressmen CRAWFORD and DONDERO—distinguished themselves as opponents of a great public improvement; from the other viewpoint they distinguished themselves as defenders of the public purse.

There undoubtedly is room for argument as to the need for the bridge. But the way Messrs. CRAWFORD and DONDERO look at it, it's like a lot of other things; it would be nice to have, but can we afford it?

A Saginaw professional man with a bent for statistics sat down for a few minutes with his pencil and produced these figures: The bridge would cost $37,000,000, to be financed by a bond issue bearing presumably at least 4-percent interest. The interest alone would be $1,080,000 the first year, tapering downward slowly; at least $1,000,000 a year would have to be set aside as an amortization fund; maintenance would cost approximately $160,000 a year. The total is $2,240,000 a year. The probable toll for use of the bridge: Fifty cents for an automobile, 10 cents for each of its occupants, probably an average of 80 cents for each car crossing the span. This would require 2,800,000 crossings a year to cover the financing; 7,946 cars a day, and with 3 occupants.

The Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority of Michigan has published a report on a "proposed crossing for the Straits of Mackinac" which shows that traffic volume across the straits is estimated for the current year at approximately 310,000 vehicles, 520,000 passengers. The comparative figures for 1939 are given as 280,000 vehicles, 480,000 passengers.

So it is not difficult to believe Representative DONDERO when he says it would cost the taxpayers of Michigan $1,500,000 a year to make up the annual deficit, nor easy to condemn Representative CRAWFORD when he protested against the bridge project as entailing "loose thinking, loose talking, loose spending."

Representative DONDERO had this to add: "The P. W. A. turned down this bridge project, and when one of this New Deal administration's agencies turns down a project upon which it can spend public money, one may rest assured that it is a project repugnant and offensive to the most callous of consciences."

Forest Problems in Oregon From the Standpoint of Land Utilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

ARTICLE BY F. H. BRUNDAGE

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following paper presented by F. H. Brundage, associate regional forester at Portland, Oreg., at meeting of State Land Use Planning Committee at Corvallis, Oreg., on June 28, 1940:

In the brief time available I am going to try to give you a picture of the forest situation in the State, particularly as related to privately owned forest lands, indicate some of the problems facing everyone in the State, and let you draw your own conclusions as to the relationship of these problems to land utilization. I hope that you will all agree that the growing of a new forest crop in order to make it possible for the present lumber industry to continue after our supply of privately owned old-growth timber now being utilized is gone, is one of the most urgent and important problems involved in the land-use planning.

You are all familiar with the social and economic importance of the lumber industry in the economy of the State. Transportation of forest products constitutes a large share of our railroad freight tonnage and one-third of the highway tonnage. Without this traffic the railroads, water, and other transportation facilities could operate only with greatly reduced facilities if at all. The 65 percent of the industrial pay roll derived from the manufacture of forest products is the lifeblood which keeps our local economy in a healthy condition. The industrial structure in most of our major towns and cities is squarely dependent upon the manufacture and utilization of forest products. Schools, churches, the public utilities, the homes of our working men and professional people, have been developed and are maintained in most of our communities located in or adjacent to forest areas by utilization of the forest resource. Utilization of our forest resource in the two States of Oregon and Washington stands on a par with all other agricultural production, and together they furnish three-fourths of the economic activity which supports all of the population.

You may not be quite so familiar with the broad pattern of development of the forest industry. Naturally the industry developed first in those areas close to water transportation where extensive and high quality stands of timber were available, such as Puget Sound, Grays Harbor, and Columbia River areas. Industry expanded to meet increasing demands throughout the years and the rate of cutting has been governed entirely by market demands. As the accessible supplies of timber were cut out, logging engineers and manufacturers developed mass-production methods which made more remote supplies available.

For 35 years Oregon or Washington has maintained the leadership among all the States in lumber production. During the last 3 or 4 years the cut in Washington has decreased and now Oregon is in the lead. This leadership has been won by applying to woods operations machinery and methods devised by ingenious logging engineers, building bigger and better sawmills and utilizing a forest resource, which is able to compete successfully in the markets of this country and the world at large. At the same time the industry has paid higher wages than those effective in other producing centers.

Chiefly due to the economic factors involved, the industry in the Douglas fir has been concentrated in the territories first developed and is only spreading southward as the available supplies elsewhere are depleted. Douglas County has 60,000,000,000 feet of timber, but only a small fraction of the desirable industrial development. In the ponderosa-pine territory east of the mountains some centers, such as the territory tributary to Baker, were first developed, but the industry has spread more rapidly, and all of the producing centers now have an excess of sawmill capacity installed and are utilizing the available timber supplies at a rate which cannot be permanently maintained.

The lumber industry has always been strongly competitive. Many industrial enterprises that depend upon utilization of the forest resource have been developed without control of any supply of standing timber, depending upon the general log market which has been developed in most areas. Where manufacturers owned or controlled timber supplies the usual practice has been to provide for a 20 to 30 years' supply for their own needs. Timber owners have found through the years that carrying charges on their investments, taxes, and other charges have increased faster than the general level of stumpage prices. Faced with losses, timber owners generally have endeavored to liquidate their holdings as promptly as possible. Judging by experience to date, and the present trends, it is apparent that privately owned timber will be put through the saw and converted into cash just as quickly as market conditions will permit. Every little bulge in the market demand is the occasion for an increase in liquidation pressure.

This wave of liquidation of privately owned timber is not limited to our old-growth supplies. Stands of second growth in the two States, which should, from the standpoint of public interest, furnish the supply 20 or 30 years from now, have been in some years liquidated at the rate of 500,000,000 board feet per year. Our industrial processes are disposing of our heifers and young ewes as well as the mature crop.

The liquidation cycle, which has run its course in the Lake States and in some other parts of the country, is in full swing here. This process is largely due to the economic set-up; and individual timber owners, while perhaps interested in a different method of operation, such as sustained yield, are governed by the competitive conditions and economic conditions under which they operate, and the possibilities of any major change affecting most operators are limited.

In 1934, under the Forest Code, industry as a whole did undertake to reduce fire losses, to leave cut-over lands in better condition for future fire protection, and to leave an adequate source of seed supply. Substantial benefits and improvements in conditions have been secured, particularly along fire-protection lines. The source of seed supply on which a new crop depends is far from adequate in many cases. It is true that many forest fires are started by the public and that the public as well as the industry should share in the protective effort to a much greater degree than is now the case. It is also true that the Tillamook burn of 1933 and the reburn of 1939 were both caused by lumber operations.

Fortunately, some private owners are showing an increasing interest in real forest practice and sustained yield operation where that can be worked out for private operations. At least one major pulp company, one large lumber company in the State of Washington in the Douglas fir, and one in the ponderosa pine are actively planning to apply forest practice and sustained yield management to their holdings. Quite a number of others are actively interested, particularly in areas where it is possible to work out joint management plans for both public and privately owned timber in the same operating unit. Where a major portion of the timber necessary for sustained yield operation is publicly owned, the financial difficulties and obstacles are greatly simplified and there is a much better opportunity for working out adequate management plans for the participating privately owned lands. However, it is better to face the fact that most of the present operations are on a liquidation basis and that there is little foundation that this system will be modified so far as most of the privately owned timber is concerned in the immediate future.

This liquidation cycle does vitally affect the economy of each producing area as the supply of timber available to that particular territory becomes depleted. There may be ample supplies to maintain the production in both States for a considerable period, but an overproduction in one area, such as Grays Harbor, and underproduction in another, such as Douglas County, does not contribute to a stable social or economic economy. Grays Harbor for years maintained a slogan: "Production of 2,000,000,000 feet or bust." They did reach a peak of 2,000,000,000 feet in production, but in the last 10 years the population has decreased by 5,000 people, or one-seventh of the total, and the general situation is such that unemployment rolls are at a peak, and labor and other difficulties are above normal. You are all familiar with the history in Clatsop and Columbia Counties and the problems which have faced the county administrations and the people on account of the decrease in the tax base. The process of depletion, while extreme, is in that area still not complete, and pay rolls are still being maintained, although on a diminished basis. The peak of the economic and social disturbance will not be experienced until timber production is sharply curtailed, and that will occur in a few years.

The situation in Bend is typical of most of the ponderosa pine producing areas. In some areas such as Klamath Falls the situation is more critical; in others such as the Ochoco territory an extreme situation has not developed. If in 1916 when operations in Bend first started, all operations there, both public and private timber, had been placed on a sustained yield basis using proper cutting methods, it would have been possible to have maintained the production of about 225,000,000 feet per annum on the average in that territory. Instead, the production has gone up and up until with the installation of additional mills it is estimated that the cut during 1940 will be about 350,000,000 feet. The mill capacity would permit a much greater cut if market conditions permitted. Up to the present time 325,000 acres of privately owned land have been cut over under cutting methods which will preclude additional supplies being secured from this area for at least 100 years, probably longer. If cutting at the rate of 350,000,000 feet per year is continued from the 306,000 acres of privately owned land still left uncut, and is supplemented by the sustained yield cut from the national forest of 83,000,000 feet, the privately owned timber supply will be exhausted in 15 to 16 years. Then the cut in that territory will decrease from 350,000,000 feet to approximately 83,000,000 feet sustained yield cut from the national forest, which is, as you know, like all of the other national forests, dedicated to the production of timber and other resources and benefits on a sustained-yield basis.

Now, of course, actually this will not happen. One new mill completed last year, which with the dependent community has involved the investment of roughly three quarters of a million dollars in town and mill facilities, owns a supply adequate for about 20 years, the life, of course, depending upon the rate of cutting. Other manufacturers have a supply varying from a few years to as much as 9 to 15 years. I would hesitate to forecast what the social and economic repercussions will be when the cut in the Bend territory is cut down to 83,000,000 feet per year, but inevitably the changes will be drastic and far-reaching.

In the Lake States the liquidation cycle of lumber production has given rise to many difficult social and economic problems which have challenged the best thought of all citizens in that area interested in or affected by these problems. State and Federal authorities are jointly engaged in the tremendous job of rehabilitation to restore the productive capacity of these lands by planting, fire protection, and other measures so that this territory can again contribute to the social and economic welfare of the States involved. It is perhaps significant that private effort is a very minor factor in this general rehabilitation effort because of the difficulties in that region.

In Oregon and Washington this liquidation process and transfer through tax delinquency from private to public ownership of cut-over and other nonprofitable timberlands has imposed heavy burdens on the counties, States, and other public agencies involved. It will be many years before a large percentage of these lands which are suitable for and needed for timber production will again be a factor in supplying commercial forest products. If the present liquidation process is continued, an increasing acreage each year is added to the burden which must be carried by public agencies. The area at present requiring rehabilitation challenges the financial and management abilities of the counties, State, and other public agencies interested in this problem. Any additional increase is certainly most undesirable.

For many years efforts have been made by those interested in these forest problems to improve economic conditions so that private owners could actually apply sustained yield management to their lands. The State reforestation law or State forest tax law, as it is more properly known, increased Federal aid on a substantial scale through outright appropriations under the Clarke-McNary law; and through the C. C. C. activity, development of a thoroughly effective code of forest-fire laws, efforts at modification of the ad valorem system of taxing mature timber, and many similar measures have either been actually applied or considered. Real progress has been made, but the actual results of these efforts over a period of many years in stopping this liquidation process and securing the application of better forest practice to privately owned lands have not been outstanding. Measures which will get at the heart of the problem are indicated.

There is one effective method to solve this liquidation problem quickly and permanently, and that is the public acquisition of those stands of privately owned timber which are pressing for liquidation. Orderly cutting and adequate forest management can be secured from forest resources which are publicly owned. Experience of many years indicates that under our present economic system only a relatively small percentage of our pulp or lumber companies can handle their lands so as to provide a source of continuous supply for industry and thereby protect social and economic stability of dependent communities as well as their own permanent source of supply. By and large, in this region public ownership, State or Federal, for much of the old growth is indicated as the one certain way to protect the public interest. Public ownership must be accompanied by some system providing for the support of local government such as the annual payment of 1 percent of the purchase price, which will in a reasonable way serve as a substitute for the withdrawal of the values involved from the tax rolls.

Continuance of private ownership in accordance with the traditional American pattern would, of course, be desirable. The economic burdens now involved in private ownership of timber are so heavy that desirable management methods and operation on a sustained-yield basis of privately owned holdings can in this territory only be secured in a few cases. Private ownership of any property is inevitably contingent upon either (1) a fairly dependable annual income over and above current operating expense, such as is the case with grazing or arable land with the production of an annual crop; or (2) a reasonable justification that an increase in values will occur above carrying charges which may be comparable to an annual income. Experience through the years clearly demonstrates that privately owned forest properties will not meet these specifications, in many cases even when they are handled on a liquidation basis. State or Federal ownership appears to be the only alternative if the public interest is to be adequately protected.

In these days when national defense is the first consideration in every activity, it is also apparent that, based on past experience, serious consideration should be given to public control as a defense measure. Forest resources, particularly spruce, Douglas fir, and other species as well, will play an important part in the national defense. It is desirable that use in the present pending emergency be secured with a minimum of damage to future supplies, and that the whole problem of timber supply be considered from the standpoint of national defense through the years. Plenty of material resource along these lines is available now, but will it be 30 or 40 years from now?

The growing of a forest crop is a long-term enterprise, a minimum of 40 to 50 years on the best localities for pulp, 70 to 120 years for Douglas fir, and 180 years for ponderosa pine. Stability of land use is vital. Areas to be used for production of timber crop should be carefully determined, and once dedicated must be continuously used for that purpose.

If our forest industry is to be permanently maintained as an important factor in the economy of the local producing areas scattered throughout the State, and the State as a whole, this general situation must be solved in a manner which will insure continued production from present stands until a new crop can be made available. With the situation as it is, the State of Oregon will inevitably be the foremost State in the production of forest products for many years. Action can be taken which will insure that timber products and woods work will remain its leading industry. This is the only State left in the Union where there is an adequate supply of old-growth timber bequeathed to us by nature to make it possible to grow a new supply while the mature crop is being harvested.

G. O. P. CERTAIN TO CAPTURE HOUSE IN NOVEMBER POLL—REPUBLICANS NEED ONLY FORTY-EIGHT SEATS TO REGAIN CONTROL—SMALL MARGINS HOLD SEVENTY-ONE DISTRICTS IN WHICH CHANGES ARE EXPECTED

(By Cole E. Morgan)

WASHINGTON, August 3.—Regardless of the outcome of the Presidential election in November, indications are the House of Representatives in the Seventy-seventh Congress will be organized and controlled by the Republican Party.

The Republicans, now lacking 48 seats to control the lower branch of Congress, appear not only to be able to wipe out that deficiency, but to increase their membership to a safe working majority of not less than 39 Members over the combined Democratic and third party total—if there should be any third-party Representatives left after November 5.

Today the House, including three death vacancies, divides 170 Republicans, 261 Democrats, and 4 minor-party Members.

The Republicans need an additional 48 seats to acquire the 218 bare majority of the 435 total, elect the Speaker, other House officers, and give them the chairmanship and working-majority representation on all the 47 standing committees.

There are exactly 100 of the 265 Democratic and third party seats now held by less than 60 percent of the vote cast for all parties in 1938. Of these 71 are held by such small margins that a turn-over of 5 percent or less of the total votes in those districts would pull them into the Republican column. They were all carried in 1938 by not exceeding 55 percent of the votes cast.

ELEVEN WON BY LESS THAN 50 PERCENT

Eleven of the 71 were won by less than 50 percent, due to the effect of third party tickets in the field. Those 11 districts are in the industrial East and the Middle West farm belt. The incumbents, the districts they represent, the major cities they embrace, and the 1938 vote percentages are:

Third Connecticut, JAMES A. SHANLEY, New Haven, 43.4; Fifth Connecticut, J. JOSEPH SMITH, Waterbury, 42.0; Sixth Pennsylvania, FRANCIS J. MYERS, Philadelphia, 49.9; Fourteenth Pennsylvania, GUY L. MOSER, Berks County, 46.7; Twenty-fourth New York, JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, Bronx, 49.3; Forty-second New York, PIUS L. SCHWERT, Buffalo, 45.8; State at large, CAROLINE O'DAY, Rye, 49.5, and MATTHEW J. MERRITT, Flushing, 49.5; Ninth Iowa, VINCENT F. HARRINGTON, Sioux City, 49.6; Second Minnesota, ELMER J. RYAN, South St. Paul, 43.6; and Ninth Minnesota, RICHARD P. BUCKLER, Farmer-Labor, Crookston, 42.0.

REPUBLICANS CONTROL ELECTION MACHINERY

Next comes a group of 37 Democratic and third party seats where the incumbents received only from 50.0 to 52.5 percent of the votes cast 2 years ago. Nineteen of these are in States that in 1938 elected Republican Governors and State administration, giving that party control of the election machinery. The other 18 are in States under Democratic control. The 19 are scattered from Massachusetts to Colorado, but 16 of them are in the industrial East and Central States. They are:

Third Massachusetts, JOSEPH E. CASEY, Worcester County, 51.5; Second Pennsylvania, JAMES P. MCGRANERY, Philadelphia, 52.4; Third Pennsylvania, MICHAEL J. BRADLEY, Philadelphia, 52; Fourth Pennsylvania, JOHN E. SHERIDAN, Philadelphia, 51.8; Eleventh Pennsylvania, PATRICK J. BOLAND, Scranton, majority whip of the House, 52.5; Twelfth Pennsylvania, J. HAROLD FLANNERY, Pittston, 51.2; Twenty-first Pennsylvania, FRANK E. WALTER, Allentown, 50.2; Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania, J. BUELL SNYDER, Connellsville, 51.2; Thirty-third Pennsylvania, JOSEPH A. MCARDLE, Pittsburgh, 51.6; and Thirty-fourth Pennsylvania, MATTHEW A. DUNN, Pittsburgh, 50; Sixth Ohio, JAMES G. POLK, Portsmouth, 50.5; Ninth Ohio, JOHN F. HUNTER, Toledo, 50.4; Eleventh Ohio, HAROLD K. CLAYPOOL, Chillicothe, 52.1; Fifteenth Ohio, ROBERT T. SECREST, Marietta, 52.3; Nineteenth Ohio, MICHAEL J. KIRWAN, Youngstown, 52.4; Twelfth Michigan, FRANK E. HOOK, Calumet, 51.7; Second Iowa, WILLIAM S. JACOBSEN, Davenport, 50.4; Fifth Kansas, JOHN M. HOUSTON, Wichita, 50.3; and Second Colorado, FRED CUMMINGS, Fort Collins, 51.7.

DEMOCRATS GOVERN 18 DISTRICTS

The 18 districts of the Democratic governed States in the 50 to 52.5 percent range reach from New York to Washington State, but 14 of them are east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Potomac. They are:

Sixth New York, ANDREW L. SOMERS, Brooklyn, 52; Sixteenth New York, JAMES H. FAY, Manhattan, 51.3; Twenty-third New York, CHARLES A. BUCKLEY, Bronx, 50.8; Third New Jersey, WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN, Asbury Park, 50.5; Fourth Maryland, AMBROSE J. KENNEDY, Baltimore, 50.2; Sixth Maryland, WILLIAM D. BYRON, Cumberland, 50.8; Ninth Indiana, EUGENE B. CROWE, Columbus, 52.1; Eleventh Indiana, WILLIAM H. LARRABEE, Anderson, 51.6; Twenty-first Illinois, FRANK W. FRIES, Springfield, 50.2; Twenty-second Illinois, EDWIN M. SCHAEFER, East St. Louis, 52.4; Twenty-fourth Illinois, CLAUDE V. PARSONS, Harrisburg, 51.1; Twenty-fifth Illinois, KENT E. KELLER, Cairo, 52.3; Illinois, State at large, T. V. SMITH, Chicago, 51.5, and JOHN C. MARTIN, Salem, 51.5; Sixth Missouri, REUBEN T. WOOD, Springfield, 50.5; Twelfth Missouri, C. ARTHUR ANDERSON, St. Louis, 52.2; Eighth Oklahoma, PHIL FERGUSON, Alva, 50.2; and Fourth Washington, KNUTE HILL, Prosser, 50.4.

The foregoing groups total 48, exactly the number that the Republicans need, in addition to their present holdings, to give them a 218 bare majority. They need but to hold their own and take these 48 from the opposition to win control.

But such a clean sweep without a single loss is expecting a little bit too much. Based on the performance in 1938 as compared with 1936, however, the Republicans should take 40 of the 48 in the 52.5 and less percent field.

G. O. P. EXPECTS GAINS ALL OVER NATION

There is another group of 23 districts which the Democrats hold by a 52.5 to 55 percent of the vote of all parties in 1938. On the basis of past performance, the Republicans are due to get 11 of these 23. In 1938 they took 17 of 37 that the opposition had captured in 1936 in that percentage range. These 23 districts are scattered from Massachusetts to California, but there are only 3 west of the Mississippi, the other 20 being concentrated chiefly in the eastern and central industrial areas. These 23 are:

Eighth Massachusetts, ARTHUR D. HEALEY, Somerville, 55.0; Eighth New York, DONALD L. O'TOOLE, Brooklyn, 54.6; Ninth New York, EUGENE J. KEOGH, Brooklyn, 54.1; Nineteenth New York, SOL BLOOM, Manhattan, 53.3; First Pennsylvania, LEON SACKS, Philadelphia, 53.5; Twenty-fifth Pennsylvania, CHARLES I. FADDIS, Washington, 53.7; Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, ROBERT G. ALLEN, Westmoreland County, 53.9; Second West Virginia, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, Elkins, 54.7; Fourth West Virginia, GEORGE W. JOHNSON, Parkersburg, 52.9; Seventh Kentucky, ANDREW J. MAY, Prestonburg, 53.2; Fourteenth Ohio, Dow W. HARTER, Akron, 53.3; Fifteenth Michigan, JOHN D. DINGELL, Detroit, 54.2.

First Indiana, WILLIAM T. SCHULTE, Gary, 54.9; Twelfth Indiana, LOUIS LUDLOW, Indianapolis, 53.7; First Illinois, ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, Chicago, 53.4; Second Illinois, RAYMOND S. MCKEOUGH, Chicago, 54.2; Seventh Illinois, LEONARD W. SCHUETZ, Chicago, 54.3; Ninth Illinois, JAMES MCANDREWS, Chicago, 52.7; Twenty-third Illinois, LAURENCE F. ARNOLD, Centralia, 53.8; North Wisconsin, MERLIN HULL, Progressive, Eau Claire, 53.4; First Missouri, MILTON A. ROMJUE, Kirksville, 54.7; Second Montana, JAMES F. O'CONNOR, Billings, 53.8; and Nineteenth California, HARRY R. SHEPPARD, San Bernardino, 53.3.

BIG SHIFT FORECAST IN CONGRESS VOTE

Next there are 15 districts which the Democrats and third parties hold by 55 to 57.5 percent of the 1938 vote. In 1938 the Republicans took 13 of 31 districts, which the Democrats had carried in 1938 within the 55 to 57.5 range. On the basis of that performance, the Republicans should get six of these 15, to bring their prospective gain to 57 out of 86. These districts are:

Third Maryland, THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, Baltimore, 56.6; Third West Virginia, ANDREW EDMISTON, Weston, 55.3; Sixth Virginia, CLIFTON A. WOODRUM, Roanoke, 56.1; Eighth North Carolina, WILLIAM O. BURGIN, Lexington, 55.2; Tenth North Carolina, A. L. BULWINKLE, Charlotte, 56.5; Sixteenth Michigan, JOHN LESINSKI, Detroit, 55.1; Eighth Indiana, JOHN W. BOEHNE, Evansville, 56.4; Third Illinois, EDWARD A. KELLY, Chicago, 55.9; Twentieth Illinois, JAMES M. BARNES, Jacksonville, 55.4; Tenth Wisconsin, BERNARD J. GEHRMANN, Progressive, Superior, 57.5; Third Missouri, RICHARD M. DUNCAN, St. Joseph, 55.3; Eighth Missouri, CLYDE WILLIAMS, Farmington, 55.3; Second Nebraska, CHARLES MCLAUGHLIN, Omaha, 57.3; and Third Colorado, John A. Martin (died December 23, 1939, seat now vacant), Pueblo, 57.4.

The Democrats and third parties now hold 14 more House seats by between 57.5 and 60 percent of the 1938 total votes. In 1938 the Republicans took 10 of 35 districts carried by the Democrats in that percentage range in 1936. Based on that past performance the Republicans should take 4 of this group of 14. These districts are:

Fifth New York, MARCELLUS H. EVANS, Brooklyn, 58.3; Seventh New York, JOHN J. DELANEY, Brooklyn, 59.6; Eleventh New York, JAMES J. O'LEARY, Staten Island, 58.9; Twentieth New York, VITO MARCANTONIO, American Labor, 59.7; Fourth Kentucky, EDWARD W. CREAL, Hodgenville, 59.2; Eighth Kentucky, JOE B. BATES, Ashland, 58.8; Fourteenth Michigan, LOUIS C. RABAUT, Detroit, 57.6; Sixth Illinois, A. F. MACIEJEWSKI, Chicago, 58.4; Second Missouri, WILLIAM L. NELSON, Columbia, 58; Tenth Missouri, ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN, Poplar Bluff, 58.9; First Utah, ABE MURDOCK, Ogden, 59.7; New Mexico, State at large, JOHN J. DEMPSEY, Santa Fe, 58.5; Seventeenth California, LEE E. GEYER, Los Angeles, 58.6, and Fifth Washington, CHARLES H. LEAVY, Spokane, 57.47.

On top of all these, the Republicans on their past performance record have a chance of taking 6 more districts won by the Democrats in 1938 by more than 60 percent of the votes. There are 165 of these districts. In 1936 the Democrats carried 204 districts by better than 60 percent of the total votes. In 1938 the Republicans won 7 of that 204. Hence the prediction that this year they will take over 6 in the 60 percent and over bracket of 1938.

Summing up this analysis, the Republicans this year stand to recover 61 of the 100 districts which the Democrats and minor party won in 1938 by less than 60 percent of the total vote cast, and in addition 6 of the 165 won by the Democrats with better than 60 percent of the votes 2 years ago.

This would mean a total Republican gain of 67, which added to their 170 seats in the present House, would bring their membership in the next House to 237, or a clear majority of 19 of the 435 total House membership and a plurality over the opposition of 39.

With a working margin of 39 Members, the Republicans should have no difficulty in keeping their organization in line and absolutely controlling every piece of legislation passing through the House, regardless of the political complexion of the Senate or who might be occupying the White House after next January 20.

When it is considered that the Constitution requires that all legislation for the levying of taxes and for the appropriation of money for spending must originate in the House, it is not difficult to comprehend what an effective weapon the Republicans would have through control of the House in shaping the course of the next administration.

American Foreign Trade and the International Situation in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

SPEECH BY JUDGE JOHN W. HAUSSERMANN

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include a speech delivered in San Francisco, Calif., before the annual convention of the National Foreign Trade Council, by Judge John W. Haussermann, known as the first American citizen in the Philippines and the leading gold and chrome miner in those islands.

The speech contains timely and novel suggestions for the maintenance of the American foreign trade, including a discussion of the well-nigh forgotten Webb-Pomerene Act and the possibility of revitalizing it to meet the commercial competition that is offered by totalitarian countries.

The speech also presents the international situation in the Far East, the so-called Japanese Monroe Doctrine and the possibility of a new realinement of colonial powers in the Far East in which the speaker advanced the theory that Germany might reenter the Far East and occupy the Netherlands East Indies and French Indochina.

Finally, Judge Haussermann, a friend of the Filipino people and a loyal American, discusses Philippine independence, expressing the hope that the American flag, with the consent of the Filipino people, should not be hauled down in the Philippines for the good of both the United States and the Philippines and for the stability of the Pacific region.

SOME ECONOMIC PROBLEMS—THE ORIENT AND THE PHILIPPINES

This annual convention of the National Foreign Trade Council here in San Francisco on the shores of the Pacific will be watched with more than ordinary attention on the other side of the water in the Far East.

Over there they have been hearing mostly of raging wars and preparations for possible future wars. This situation is being aided greatly by the rule that "bad news is good news and good news is no news at all." This convention and its proceedings should convince our neighbors across the Pacific that the works of peace—production, commerce, and peace itself—are the things that are largely engaging the thoughts and energies of the American people.

This convention should produce useful and constructive news; and I earnestly hope that the different instrumentalities of communication will find it advisable to carry a generous account of them to the peoples of the Far East. They would be our message of high hopes, of good neighborliness, and of peaceful intentions toward them.

Businessmen will discuss the problems of foreign trade. They will deal with competitive conditions and trade wars. But there is one fundamental fact upon which they will be unanimous, and that is, that international trade rests on international goodwill. So convinced, they will spare no efforts to work for its strengthening and perpetuation.

Trading between nations is without a doubt the closest and friendliest form of contact between them. It consists of millions of people in one country producing articles with the best genius that they possess to be offered for a valuable consideration to millions of people in another country who are willing to use them. This process repeated many times, year in and year out, is the best link of understanding, appreciation, and mutual benefit between nations.

So it is that the building and extension of foreign trade should be a major concern of a nation. He who minimizes its basic importance to the economy of and amity between nations understands but little the real nature of international relations.

There is pessimism in this country today as to the prospects of our trade abroad. Truly we are steeped in the most profound uncertainty. We hear of the prospective operation of European manufacturing and exporting cartels under a unified direction in a totalitarian country that would drive American goods from the world's markets and with it reduce American influence to the vanishing point.

I would not despair in the face of such impending possibilities. I would rather collect my wits and mobilize the genius, the resources, and the experience of American industry, finance, agriculture, commerce, and management and meet the competitor primarily on the basis of service and quality and price of goods.

The situation that is developing before our eyes today compels a closer and more sympathetic cooperation between government and business. The time is long overdue when government and business should realize that they are interdependent and that any basic divergence between them would rebound to the great injury of the people.

Minds more fertile than mine will undoubtedly produce a multiplicity of ideas as to how to grapple with foreign competition, particularly in Latin America, with which our Nation desires to establish some sort of economic unity, not only for the purpose of commerce but, more importantly, for its political and strategic significance in relation to the maintenance and implementation of the Monroe Doctrine in the Western Hemisphere.

But I do believe that the Government, in conjunction with business, should immediately make an inquiry into two propositions as a first step to the formulation of a program of action: First, the exploration of areas of cooperation between Government and business to coordinate their efforts; and, second, an investigation of the failure of the Webb-Pomerene Act and pertinent acts.

The Webb-Pomerene Act was enacted by Congress years ago to meet a situation roughly similar to that we are facing today. Its central idea is that American manufacturers and exporters could fix prices and conditions without infringing on the antitrust laws. The extent to which the bilateral trade-agreement program has affected that legislation is a logical subject for investigation. The comparative smallness of our investments abroad, as distinguished from loans, is another. The absence of mandatory provisions to enjoin collaboration between American firms is still another. In any event, the investigation is pertinent and timely and should produce the facts that may or may not justify the revision and revitalization of the Webb-Pomerene Act and its financial complement, the Edge Act.

It is not overestimating the economic potency of the American people when I say that whether there will be a greater or less international trade in the world in the coming years depends chiefly on what the American Government will adopt as its international economic policy.

The American people possess five things that are vital to international commerce and finance. First, they have four-fifths of the world's gold, valued at over twenty and one-half billion dollars; second, they have now probably three-fourths of the world's total banking resources; third, they have the most complete and efficient machinery for production; fourth, they have tremendous and varied natural wealth; and, fifth, they are far and away the largest consuming unit in the world of both domestic and imported goods.

Believing that the tendency of the American people is toward liberalism in every sphere of human relationships, and believing further that they realize that for their own good and the good of others they will have to assume the leadership in the rehabilitation of the war-wrecked world, the United States, I think, may be expected to pursue a liberal policy in international commercial and financial relations, and that would mean more extensive economic intercourse between nations and hence more prosperity throughout the earth.

I should like to say a few words concerning the gold holdings of our Government as they have affected and as they may affect in the future the trade between nations. I shall not delve into the Government's monetary policy as such, nor the future disposal of the gold holdings, nor the policy of gold sterilization, nor the function of gold in the Government's fiscal and financial schemes.

Under the authorization of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 our Government bought gold as a commodity, paying $15 an ounce more than the then existing world price. I am not stopping here to explain or justify why the Government did that, but I want to say that that extra price totaled to date to roughly $6,000,000,000. That enormous amount constitutes the number of American dollars we paid foreigners which, in turn, constitutes dollar exchanges here in their favor. Putting it in another way, we gave them that much additional buying power.

Do you realize what that means? It means that foreign countries would have to sell us at least $60,000,000,000 worth of goods to make that profit of $6,000,000,000. Based on trade statistics, it would take those foreign countries about 20 years to sell the equivalent quantity of goods if they can do so at all over and above their normal sales to the United States.

I wish to reiterate the fact that the result of the gold-purchase policy has been to give buying power to foreign countries. This item is, in my opinion, the largest single support of international trade during the last few years. This trade would have contracted to comparative insignificance if this supply of American dollars, which otherwise would have remained idle, had not been made available.

I wish now to discuss oriental affairs as they concern the United States in connection with the prospects of peace and trade.

The Orient is the home of more than a billion people, or approximately one-half of the world's population. One-half of the oriental peoples are politically associated with the western nations. China with its more than 400,000,000 souls is still an independent nation. Now under attack by a neighbor, China professes a greater friendship and attachment to the United States.

Momentous events are in the offing in the Orient. Japan has promulgated a new policy known as the New Orient in East Asia. It is otherwise known as the Japanese Monroe Doctrine. However, Secretary of State Cordell Hull has pointed out that in motive, method, and objective it is entirely different from the American Monroe Doctrine, asserting in effect that the Japanese vintage is nothing but a verbal smoke screen for the conquest of other oriental countries by force of arms.

There is a general belief that the Orient is in revolt against the west, that the oriental peoples are united in that movement, and that the United States, for one, should fold up its flag, particularly in the Philippines, and lose no time in withdrawing from that region. This point of view was given apparent confirmation by a recent statement emanating from the White House favoring three regional Monroe Doctrines—one for Asia, one for Europe, and one for the Western Hemisphere. This statement produced satisfaction in Japan but disappointment in China and elsewhere. Subsequently, the statement was elucidated and it was asserted that it contained nothing that would not be on all fours with the statement on the same subject of Secretary Cordell Hull.

There is an immense amount of solid good will in the Orient for western nations, epecially for the United States. The Far East does not consider the west good riddance, especially when they realize that a less liberal oriental nation is ready to take their place.

I am not countenancing for a moment acts of exploitation, mistreatment, and just old-fashioned imperialism, but I do believe that by and large the west has earned the admiration and gratitude of the Orient. True, the west has reaped material benefits, but in the process it also benefited the oriental peoples by making their countries more habitable through the work of institutions for their social and intellectual amelioration and by elevating their standard of living through the creation of wealth where there was little or none before.

When the time comes when Japan promulgates an honest-to-goodness Monroe Doctrine in the Orient, the United States would not be under any obligation of consistency to withdraw from that region, particularly in the Philippines. When our own Monroe Doctrine was announced in 1823, England, France, Holland, and Spain were sovereign in certain parts in North, Central, and South America as well as in the Caribbean, and their sovereign status quo was recognized and they remained as sovereigns. So it is perfectly compatible with a Japanese Monroe Doctrine for the United States to remain as sovereign in the Philippines if she chooses so to do.

European nations having dominions or possessions in the Western Hemisphere have naval bases and military establishments there. But the United States never considered them as a menace to her. The Philippines is working out a modest defense program and the United States has a naval base in Manila Bay and there is a plan, I understand, to fortify Guam and some islets in mid-Pacific. By the same token, Japan has no valid reason to consider these defenses as a menace to her safety.

The United States will maintain the open-door policy in Asia. She will defend her rights in the Orient as elsewhere. At the same time she will scrupulously respect the rights of other nations. And at all times she is ready to take cooperative action in everything that would lead to peace, amity, and prosperity.

With these points clear, there is a general desire, I think, in this country for the genuine improvement of Japanese-American relations. It is hoped that in the near future the Japanese-American treaty of commerce and navigation which expired last January will be renewed. There are so many points of common interest and so few causes of divergence between the United States and Japan that a war between them would be an unalloyed act of madness that would decide nothing. Instead of being inevitable, a war between the two countries is easily avoidable, and it has been avoided with little effort ever since the two countries heard of each other for the first time centuries ago.

Any cooperation between the United States and Japan to bring about better relations, greater trade, and more stability in the Orient will have to encompass China and its legitimate position as an independent nation. I believe that this is possible only if, with Japan determined to treat China sincerely as an equal, China herself would face realities and decide once and for all that, having given proof that the Chinese people will fight valiantly for their country and repel any invader with all their eternal might, they will be ready to meet Japan half way.

The danger is that Japan might not welcome the United States to a multilateral plan of cooperation because it might strengthen American influence with the Chinese as well as other Oriental peoples. The Japanese will realize that the Chinese people are more friendly to the United States than to Japan. But the United States, in the name of all good American principles and policies, does not have the slightest intention of establishing her sovereignty on the mainland of Asia. The Japanese will recall that it was an American President who called Japan and Russia 35 years ago to cease fighting and conclude peace at Portsmouth. Today there is a hope in this country that Japan and China may soon compose their differences and reestablish peaceful relations.

Our interest is peace, for peace is blessed and beneficent; and we desire to build up trade, bring more prosperity to all concerned, and once again resume that tranquillity around the rim of the Pacific that is so necessary for human betterment.

There is today lodged in the realm of pure speculation another possible realinement in the Orient which will have vital repercussions in the international sphere. It has to do with the course of the present European war and the post-bellum settlements.

Holland and France have possessions in the Far East, the Netherland East Indies, and French Indochina, respectively. These two colonies are tremendously rich in natural resources and have between them about 100,000,000 inhabitants. What will happen to them at the conclusion of the war is the great interrogation mark.

The press reports the activities of the Japanese presumably directed to the eventual occupation of those possessions. The United States has expressed to Japan that she looks with disfavor at the alteration of the international status quo in the Pacific region, and Japan gave her word of acquiescence with the American point of view. But the news persists that Japan will soon gravitate to those Dutch and French possessions.

I have a theory—and it is nothing but a theory—that it is both possible and probable that Germany, which had possessions in the Far East before the first World War, might occupy the Netherland East Indies and French Indochina, especially the former, herself. Today she has more color of authority than has Japan, for German political logicians could allege that having become supreme in Holland and France, she automatically becomes supreme in their colonial possessions and dependencies. That allegation is for Japan to rebut. Japan's case is with Germany, her de facto ally.

If Germany reenters the Far East as a colonial power, two results may be envisaged. First, she will checkmate, if not frustrate, the Japanese plan of expansion to the south of the Japanese Empire. And second—and I consider this of the most basic significance to the United States—much of the expected German activities in Latin America would be deflected from the Western Hemisphere to the Far East which, from the standpoint of potential economic importance, is much more promising than Latin America.

Finally, I should like to devote my concluding remarks to the subject of Philippine-American relations.

Let me stress the fact that the United States is still supreme and sovereign in the Philippines and will be so until 1946. That date may be postponed or eliminated by the voluntary action of our Government or by request of the Filipinos agreed to by our Government, or by simultaneous, spontaneous action by the American and Philippine peoples directing their respective governments to take steps to have the American flag remain in the Philippines.

There is a movement among thoughtful and patriotic Filipinos for the postponement of complete Philippine independence. They realize now that the safety and welfare of their country lie in the continuation of the present political relations with the United States. I hope and trust—and I am sure I am right in this—that the American people, who have been generous and magnanimous with the Philippine people, will give sympathetic consideration to any Philippine suggestion in good faith to put off the complete separation of the Philippines from the United States.

I am now going to discuss Philippine-American trade, and I am doing so because this is a trade convention and not because I am placing trade and other economic considerations as paramount in my advocacy of continued Philippine-American political relations. I am much more concerned with the magnificent idealism that our country has displayed in the Philippines, an idealism that has brought untold blessings to the Philippine people—our language, our ideas and ideals, our civilization, our democratic institutions, and our effective aid in bringing about the reconstruction and regeneration of a race of people who have come under our care as by the dictate of fate.

The Philippine-American trade is roughly $200,000,000 a year. In 1939 the Philippines ranked fifth as an export market of the United States, outranked only by the United Kingdom, Canada, Japan, and France. In that year the purchases of the Philippines of American goods amounted to over $100,000,000 worth.

A freight train of 100 cars moved these goods every day of that year from points in the interior, comprising the majority of the States, to ports of shipment on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and the Gulf of Mexico. According to the United States Department of Commerce, 105 American products find the Philippines their best buyer abroad and 55 other products find that country their second-best buyer.

There is a great future in trade with the Philippines, for that country is rich in natural resources, both agricultural and mineral. It can produce farm and forest products natural to a tropical country that will not compete with American production and which our country now imports from foreign sources. The Philippines is valuable to us not only for their wealth but also for the fact that if we let another nation get control of those islands, we would be giving a competitor in the international political and economic field a tremendous economic asset.

The exports of the Philippines to the United States, entering this country duty-free, constitute the very foundation of the Philippine economic structure. The Philippines is a country dependent on foreign markets for its economic existence.

One out of every 3 of the 16,000,000 Filipinos is engaged in the production, handling, or exportation of goods for overseas markets. Considering that a good number of the people is not gainfully employed, it may be logically stated that the active members of the entire Philippine population are connected directly or remotely with the foreign trade of the country.

I am happy to observe that American and other economic interests are not as hostile to the free entry of certain Philippine products as they used to be. Philippine sugar, coconut oil, and other products are already under a quantitative limitation in the United States. Their competitive nature is now better understood and found inconsequential. Being the principal support of Philippine buying power for American goods, their entry in the United States should be encouraged rather than discouraged.

I wish to point out now what might possibly happen to Philippine sugar and coconut oil when the United States-Latin American economic unity is established. Brazil, for instance, might ask for a wider market in the United States for her vegetable oils, especially the babasu-nut oil, which is supposed to contain the essential ingredients of coconut oil. Other South American and Caribbean countries might ask the United States to admit more of their sugar. These matters are of vital significance to the Philippines and the Filipinos should include their consideration in their future plans.

There is in the Philippines a rising hope that Latin America might offer a market for Philippine products. This hope has no foundation in economic logic. What the Philippines produce are, or can be, produced in the tropical and semitropical sections of Latin America. And, in turn, Latin America does not have manufactures which the Philippines can import advantageously. Latin America is the coming trade cockpit of the world where financial and commercial giants will vie with each other, and there is no place for the Philippines in that situation.

I cannot conclude this paper without saying that the record of our country in the Philippines during the last 41 years is one of unselfish and constructive devotion to the best interests of the Filipino people. We have made the Philippines more healthful, more bountiful, and more beautiful. And the Filipino of today is a happier, stronger, richer, more ambitious, and more self-respecting individual.

Under our flag today the Philippines has as much self-government as the States of the American Union. The Filipinos have civil liberty and individual freedom; they have a representative government by themselves; they have the mighty protection of the United States; and, withal, their national self-respect is absolutely intact under that flag.

The Filipinos are friendly and loyal to us. They are our allies. We can depend on them in any emergency. They are a worthy and promising people, and our aid and protection in all these years have not been lost on them. I hope that they will use the attributes that God gave them and consider seriously if they want to separate from us for good. They will have to decide that for themselves. Their decision must be voluntary.

I shall end as I started, and that is that this convention of foreign traders, bankers, and allied activities should produce useful and constructive ideas that, based on practical and genuine good will, could be powerfully instrumental not only in creating a greater exchange of goods and services but also in bringing about a better understanding and a closer friendship between the nations of the world.

Mackinac Straits Bridge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PONTIAC (MICH.) DAILY PRESS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD by including therein an editorial from the Pontiac Daily Press of Pontiac, Mich., August 10, 1940, having reference to the Mackinac Straits Bridge across the Straits of Mackinac in Michigan, entitled, "Strait Into the Red."

[From the Pontiac (Mich.) Daily Press of August 8, 1940]

STRAIT INTO THE RED

A bridge linking the Lower Peninsula to the Upper Peninsula might be desirable if traffic demands it and if the State can afford it. For some time there has been efforts thus to connect the two peninsulas, and at last some headway seems to have been made. A bill is on its way through Congress, or may be passed by this time, which will authorize construction of a bridge, or a series of bridges, to cost no more than $35,000,000. It provides further for interest on bonds of not more than 5 percent and a retirement period of not more than 40 years. Presumably the money is to be obtained from the R. F. C. or bonds will be sold to pay back the loan.

It is assumed that if a $35,000,000 expenditure is authorized, that amount will be spent, but its proponents talk more about $30,000,000 costs. Whatever the sum, it is incumbent upon Mr. John Q. Public, who has to pay the bill, to do some straight thinking about the proposed straits span. Taking the smaller sum of $30,000,000, the annual interest charges at 5 percent would amount to $1,500,000, or if money could be secured at 3 or 4 percent it would amount to $900,000 or $1,200,000 yearly.

On a basis of the 274,749 cars crossing on the straits ferries in 1937, the charge per car for interest alone at 3 percent would be $3.27, at 4 per cent $4.36, and at 5 percent $5.45.

Given a bridge life of 100 years, 1 percent ($300,000) per year must be added to the total fixed charges for depreciation. Another little Ethiopian in the bridge pilings is the added cost of maintenance. A minimum of one-tenth of 1 percent ($30,000) per year would have to be jotted down for maintenance. Then there are additional costs for personnel, lighting, and terminal offices with which to reckon.

Adding all these together on the basis of the 1937 level it would take 120 years to retire the debt, and the toll per car would have to be $5.72 on the 3-percent basis, $6.81 at the 4-percent basis, and $7.90 at 5 percent.

But the retirement period is fixed at 40 years so an increase in these rates would have to be made to liquidate the loan in that time. Presumably the bonds might be extended but before the bridge was paid for it would be outworn and a new one demanded.

Of course no such tolls as these would be levied. It would wreck that fractional part of the tourist industry above the Straits which the proposed bridge is designed to aid. Our tourist traffic has not shown the rate of growth to justify any great added expense. While 274,749 cars were ferried across in 1937, only 280,243 cars crossed in 1939, an increase of less than 6,000 vehicles in 2 years.

We can get a fine example of the cost of bridges by the tunnel under the Detroit River and the Ambassador Bridge. There, where the traffic flows from a great metropolitan center and will be much heavier than can be expected at the Mackinac Straits, both these projects went into bankruptcy, and the international bridge at Port Huron is not carrying the traffic which will retire its costs.

To all appearances we are planning an 8-mile monument to fiduciary folly. Maybe it is justified. We've thrown away money in worse ways. But if we engage in this undertaking it is well to estimate the costs to the State, the investor, and the individual user of this connecting link and know exactly what we are attempting.

With the Nation facing a $14,000,000,000 defense program, it may be a poor time to consider any project unless there are reasons for its use and means to finance it without putting another red entry on the ledger.

Sugar Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

LETTERS FROM HON. HENRY A. WALLACE, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, TO HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN, OF LOUISIANA, AND TO HON. E. D. SMITH, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a letter addressed by the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, to the Honorable A. LEONARD ALLEN, a Representative from Louisiana, as well as a letter addressed by the Secretary of Agriculture to the Honorable E. D. SMITH, chairman, Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate.

JUNE 22, 1940.

Hon. A. LEONARD ALLEN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. ALLEN: Acknowledgment is made of your letter to me of June 11, 1940, which you had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 12, 1940, under the heading, "An Appeal to Secretary Wallace on Behalf of Sugarcane." In this letter you express the view that action should be taken by this Department to permit a group of Louisiana sugarcane growers having excess acreage above their proportionate share allotments under the provisions of the Sugar Act to harvest such acreage.

It is clear that you have not been informed about the recommendations of this Department on this problem. I therefore enclose for your information a copy of my letter of April 13, 1940, to the Honorable E. D. SMITH, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in which the views of this Department were given on S. J. Res. 225, introduced by Senator ELLENDER of Louisiana, on March 7, 1940. Perhaps I should also direct your attention to the fact that a companion bill was introduced in the House (H. J. Res. 500), by Congressman MOUTON, of Louisiana, on March 27, 1940.

If it is your desire to help the group of Louisiana sugarcane growers who have excess acreage, it is necessary that Congressional approval be obtained of H. J. Res. 500 and S. J. Res. 225, which have been approved by this Department and which have been pending before the Congress for several months. These measures will permit the harvest of excess sugarcane acreage without loss of producers' payments upon the condition that certain deductions be made from the Government payments.

If the Congress is unwilling to pass these bills permitting payments to noncomplying producers with certain deductions, I am sure you will readily appreciate the impossibility of our making payment in full to such producers under existing legislation. I assume you are aware of the fact that any producer who is willing to forego the conditional payments may harvest all his acreage.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

The following is the text of Secretary Wallace's report to Senator ELLISON D. SMITH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, containing the Department of Agriculture's views on Senate Joint Resolution 225, introduced in the Senate by Senator ELLENDER, of Louisiana, on March 7, 1940:

APRIL 13, 1940.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: Reference is made to your request for the views of this Department on Senate Joint Resolution 225, introduced by Senator ELLENDER, of Louisiana, on March 7, 1940.

Since the above bill was sent to this Department Senator ELLENDER proposed a substitute bill as an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. This bill appears on page 5014 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 22, 1940, and reads as follows:

"On page 82, line 14, before the period insert a colon and the following: 'Provided further, That no payment under the Sugar Act of 1937 with respect to the 1940 crop shall be withheld from any producer in the mainland cane-sugar area because of the marketing (or processing) of sugarcane in excess of the proportionate share for the farm, if the acreage of sugarcane grown on the farm and marketed (or processed) for sugar in the crop year 1940 is not in excess of the acreage of sugarcane for sugar planted prior to January 1, 1940, but payments shall be made only with respect to the proportionate share acreage established for the farm under the provisions of such act, and the following deductions shall be made from such payments on account of any acreage of sugarcane grown on the farm and marketed (or processed) for sugar in the crop year 1940 which is in excess of (1) 110 percent of the proportionate share for the farm, or (2) the proportionate share for the farm plus 25 acres, whichever is the greater; for so much of such excess as does not exceed 500 acres, a deduction of $10 per acre; for so much of such excess as exceeds 500 acres, a deduction of $20 per acre.'"

In our report to you of February 28, 1940, on Senate Joint Resolution 190, which was introduced in the Senate by Senator ELLENDER on January 4, 1940, we explained the problems involved in the proposal to permit harvesting of the excess sugarcane acreage in the mainland cane area. In that report it was stated:

"Under the proposed legislation producers of sugarcane in the continental United States who, under existing determinations of this Department, pursuant to the Sugar Act of 1937, were permitted to defer adjustment of acreage from the 1939 crop to the 1940 crop would now be permitted to obtain the payments contemplated by the act for the 1940 crop without making the required adjustments.

"A large number of the sugarcane growers having more than 10 acres complied with the acreage reductions in the 1939 crop, while other producers whose acreage consisted principally of plant and first ratoon cane took advantage of the option provided in the proportionate share determinations of this Department, copies of which are enclosed, to defer their adjustments into 1940. Enactment of the proposed legislation would therefore be unjust to the many producers who made the required acreage adjustment in 1939."

With the provisions contained in Senate Joint Resolution 225 limiting payments to producers on the 1940 crop to their proportionate shares or acreage allotments and the supplemental provision introduced by Senator ELLENDER on March 22, 1940, establishing certain deductions from the base rates of payments to growers for any excess acreage above 110 percent of their proportionate shares or the proportionate shares plus 25 acres, whichever is the greater, it is the opinion of this Department that the principal objection to the former proposal for harvesting the excess acreage has been met. For this reason and in view of the hardships which would fall upon producers without such amendment, this Department recommends enactment of this legislation.

As required by Budget Circular 344, this matter was referred to the Bureau of the Budget on April 4, 1940, and under date of April 8, 1940, the Assistant Director thereof advised this Department that there would be no objection to the submission of this report to the committee.

Sincerely,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Compulsory Conscription in Time of Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that any plan of compulsory conscription of our men and boys for military service in time of peace is wholly unnecessary. May I say that I am not without information upon this subject of compulsory conscription, because I knew it in the last World War; while in the service of my Government I saw its operation, and I saw and knew of its gruesome ills and its disastrous effects. As a captain of infantry, during that period, I witnessed some of the injustices which obtained. That was in time of war. But we are not at war now. Who will attack the United States of America? I am convinced we are not going to attack any nation. If we are not going to attack any country, and if our operations are limited to our own defense of our country, then we really wonder, Mr. Speaker, why all of this madness—why all of the apparent hysteria—regarding war?

Our Nation has never resorted to a compulsory conscription of men and boys for military service in time of peace until the Burke-Wadsworth bill was introduced in the Congress. I am advised that this bill is the outgrowth of the President's desire; he has approved of this bill; the President wants this compulsory conscription of our men and boys for military service passed. In other words, the President is for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, there has not been any good-faith effort on the part of the War Department, or the Navy Department, to secure voluntary enlistments for the military or naval service. I am convinced that every American is truly patriotic, and that they will respond voluntarily for the defense of our country. Compulsory conscription is wholly unnecessary in order to obtain the necessary manpower for training and military purposes for our defense of this country. Give the men and boys a fair chance to enlist voluntarily, under an assurance, upon which they can rely, that they will not be shipped across the ocean into some foreign land to help fight the battles of some foreign country; and reduce the time of the enlistment to 1 year and give them at least the same compensation that was paid during the last World War, which is the same amount now paid to the boys in the C. C. C. camps—who are entirely safe from every danger of war—and I am confident all of the ranks which it is desired to fill will be promptly and completely filled, and this proposed plan of compulsory conscription, in time of peace, will be wholly unnecessary.

The President wants this compulsory conscription bill passed. He has so stated. The people in my section of the country are largely opposed to the passage of the Burke-Wadsworth bill in time of peace. We reflect for the moment on the hardships suffered and the loss of jobs—the financial losses sustained—and the general disruption of business, industry, and agriculture in the event this proposed compulsory conscription plan is enacted into law. Who will be required to suffer? The people of this country will sustain the loss and they will be required to suffer. All of this will obtain at a time when this Nation is at peace. They keymen will, in all probability, be drawn from industry and business—men upon whom that branch of national defense must rely—yet when their numbers are drawn they must respond. It appears that those who would force this compulsory conscription of our men and boys for military purposes upon our people in time of peace should be the very first who would have to respond to the gruesome and unwholesome provisions of the iniquitous law.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed the compulsory conscription of men and boys for military purposes, in time of peace, in Europe; that is the first and outstanding policy of a dictatorship. That policy was inaugurated by Hitler, it was closely followed by Stalin, and Mussolini pursued his course along the same pathway; that is the policy of the dictator. To control and dominate the people is their watchword; that power of control is exercised through the force of law and might, and by it the will of the people is dominated. Therefore, in those countries, now under a dictatorship, resort is had to compulsory conscription for military service in time of peace.

In our country, in which liberty and freedom have been our watchword, we have never resorted to those drastic methods before. The patriotism of every American is outstanding, and we know that in the time of need, for the defense of our country, our homes, and our institutions, every able-bodied American will respond voluntarily. Compulsory methods should not be resorted to because they are unnecessary. Every American has the love of country in his heart—he will fight in the defense of his country because of that love—therefore compulsory conscription is unnecessary in time of peace in our Nation. The Burke-Wadsworth bill, which is now proposed for passage, is a direct challenge of the patriotism of every American who is subject to military service. If this bill is enacted into law, the patriotic fervor of our people will vanish, and there will be substituted the command by our Government to our people to enter the military service. That is dictation. That is merely another form of regimentation in our land. That plan destroys patriotism and conveys the power to command into the hands of those who are in control of our Government. This plan is not in keeping with our American traditions, and that policy is not in accord with the will and the judgment of our people.

Mr. Speaker, we are in favor of an adequate national defense—a defense which is both sound and strong—sufficient to repel the attack of any foe. However, this administration has utterly failed to secure the proper equipment for our national defense, although great and huge appropriations were made for that very purpose. The people have offered a protest because of that miserable failure on the part of this administration, and, not long ago, the President in another fireside chat attempted to tell of the military preparedness of our Nation—the larger part of which, he was forced to admit, was "on order" and was not available for any use in the defense of our country. War munitions which are "on order" will not be helpful in case of an attack and will not be helpful to the men and boys who are selected for military training. It was observed very recently that the National Guard outfits which are now training were using wooden guns in place of regulation equipment, and were using motor-trucks in place of Army tanks, all because our Government has failed to provide the necessary equipment for such use. If this compulsory conscription bill should pass, and the men and boys should be rushed into the Army camps at an early date, which is contemplated, they would be without uniforms and without training equipment in very large part; they would be without housing facilities and without fieldpieces; they would sit down and await the completion of the order for their uniforms, tanks, guns, and equipment. In the face of this appalling situation and the lack of training material, it is sought to rush the Burke-Wadsworth bill through the Congress to final passage to compel our men and boys to engage in military activities, in time of peace, as their numbers are drawn.

Let us smite this un-American policy of compulsory conscription in time of peace for our Military Establishment. I am confident the good judgment of our people and their representatives will not lead us along the path of the dictator. May it lead us along the pathway of liberty and freedom in this Nation.

Pungent Facts for the Public to Ponder Over

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, everybody is after the almighty dollar, and rightly so, because it pays debts, interest, and taxes, and its accumulation enables us to provide the comforts and conveniences of life in our declining years after our earning power ceases. We should understand that money is a necessity in civilization. Civilization cannot exist without it. To be a part of society money is as necessary to one as air and water are to animal life. One can live longer without money than without air and water, but one cannot be a part of civilization without it; therefore, when a government permits a small class of men who deal in money for profit to dictate its monetary and banking system it may be expected to end in the money dealers owning and controlling practically all the money, thereby controlling credit and inflating and deflating the price of property, labor, and commodities at will. The fundamental cause of all financial panics and depressions is the lack of money, and this country is suffering from a lack of money.

Make this statement to a hundred people, and 99 would say you are wrong, that the banks are loaded with money. When I speak of money, I mean real money—"In God We Trust" dollars—full legal tender for all debts, public and private—not fictitious bankers' check-book money which constitutes 90 percent of our so-called money that vanishes into thin air in major panics, as in 1921, and 1929 to 1933 when banks by the thousands closed their doors for lack of real money to pay their depositors.

To prove to the gullible public that they are being misled by subtle and insidious propaganda to the belief that the banks are loaded with money, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury for information on this subject and my letter and questions were answered as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, May 13, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM LEMKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LEMKE: Referring to your letter of May 9, there is shown below the information you desire with regard to banks in the United States and possessions as of December 30, 1939:

	Number of banks	Total deposits[1]	Cash in vaults[1]	Balances with other banks, including reserve balances[1]
Member banks of the Federal Reserve System	6,362	$49,340,152	$841,215	$18,941,039
Nonmember banks of the Federal Reserve System	8,734	19,225,891	355,324	3,256,896
Total, all banks	15,096	68,566,043	1,196,539	22,197,935
Banks not insured by Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation	1,510	11,080,286	129,384	1,256,875
Banks insured by Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation	13,586	57,485,757	1,067,155	20,941,060

[1] 000 omitted.

It will be noted that the above statement includes a fourth column showing figures covering the amount of balances with other banks, including reserve balances. Such balances reported for banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, however, include cash in vaults of 51 insured mutual savings banks, the amount of which is not available separately.

Very truly yours,

C. B. UPHAM,
Acting Comptroller of the Currency.

Breaking down the above official information contained in the letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, it shows the following amount in cash in the vaults of the banks on the 1st day of January 1940:

Member banks:
Total deposits	$49,340,152,000
Cash in vaults	$841,215,000
Percentage of cash in vaults against total deposits ($1.70 cash in vault on each $100 deposit)	1.704
Nonmember banks:
Total deposits	$19,225,891,000
Cash in vaults	$355,324,000
Percentage of cash in vaults against total deposits ($1.85 cash in vault on each $100 deposit)	1.848
Total, all banks:
Total deposits	$68,566,043,000
Total cash in vaults	$1,196,539,000
Total percentage of cash in vaults against total deposits ($1.75 cash in vault on each $100 deposit)	1.745
Banks not insured by F. D. I. C.:
Total deposits	$11,080,286,000
Cash in vaults	$129,384,000
Percentage of cash in vaults against total deposits ($1.17 cash in vault on each $100 deposit)	1.167
Banks insured by F. D. I. C.:
Total deposits	$57,485,757,000
Cash in vaults	$1,067,155,000
Percentage of cash in vaults against total deposits ($1.86 cash in vault on each $100 deposit)	1.856

To carry information on this subject further, the monthly report of the Treasury Department shows that on January 1, 1940, $7,483,011,701 was in circulation. This included all kinds of money from copper cents to $10,000 bills. If the actual amount on deposit, $68,566,043,000, as shown by the above report of the Comptroller of the Currency, were divided pro rata among the depositors, each would get a fraction less than $10 for each $100 he had on deposit. I want to ask, in all fairness, with the above irrefutable facts staring you in the face, do you believe the banks are loaded with money?

On March 6, 1933, 2 days after Roosevelt was inaugurated, he declared a bank holiday, existing from Monday, the 6th day of March, until Thursday, the 9th day of March. On March 9 he issued a proclamation extending the holiday indefinitely, or until another proclamation was issued. On April 5, 1933, the President issued an order requiring all individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations to deliver to the Federal Reserve bank or member banks on or before May 1, 1933, all gold coin, gold bullion, and gold certificates at that time owned by them. Subsequently other orders were issued by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to expedite the delivery of gold certificates, and so forth. Under this operation, the Federal Reserve bank collected approximately $3,600,000,000 of gold and gold certificates by exchanging Federal Reserve notes to the owners of the gold and gold certificates and transferring it to the Treasury and receiving from the Treasury, or placed to the credit of the Federal Reserve bank, the same amount in gold certificates.

On January 31, 1934, after all the gold and gold certificates of record had been turned in to the Treasury—with the exception of about $70,000,000 which had never been turned in and is now carried as money in circulation—amounting to approximately $3,600,000,000, the President, by proclamation, revalued the gold ounce from $20.67 to $35 per ounce, which automatically reduced the content of the gold dollar from $25\frac{8}{10}$ grains—nine-tenths fine—to $15\frac{5}{21}$ grains—nine-tenths fine—which reduced the content of pure gold in the dollar from $23\frac{22}{100}$ grains to approximately $13\frac{71}{100}$ grains. This increase in the price of the gold ounce applied only to foreign gold and newly mined gold in this country.

As a result the Treasury received gold in great quantities for which they paid $35 an ounce. As fast as the gold arrived the Treasury would issue gold certificates to the Federal Reserve bank and then check on the Federal Reserve bank for the amount of certificates issued. As a result the circulating statement (United States money) issued by the Treasury Department June 30, 1940, shows the total amount of gold bullion held by the Treasury to be $19,963,090,869. Of this amount the Treasury has issued to the Federal Reserve bank $14,938,894,942. In other words, of the total amount of gold certificates issued by the Treasury, the Federal Reserve bank owns $14,938,894,942 with the exception of approximately $70,000,000 which has never been turned in to the Treasury and is carried as money in circulation.

With the foregoing facts before us, we are told, and most of us believe, the Government owns the gold, when, in fact, the Federal Reserve bank, a private corporation, owned more than 70 percent of all gold in the Treasury on June 30, 1940, which is evidenced by the amount of gold certificates they now hold.

For my information, and that of the general public, I addressed the following letter to Mr. Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System:

JUNE 24, 1940.

MR. MARRINER S. ECCLES,
Chairman, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Kindly furnish me the following information:

What was the total amount paid the Government as a franchise tax, as provided by law, by the Federal Reserve bank from December 23, 1913, to the date that the amendment to section 7 of the original law (Public, No. 329, 65th Cong.) became effective and the capital stock of the Federal Reserve bank on that date?

What was the total amount paid the Government by the Federal Reserve bank as a franchise tax from the date that the amendment to the original became effective to July 1, 1932, and what was the capital stock of the Federal Reserve bank at the latter date?

What was the total amount of surplus of the Federal Reserve bank on July 1, 1932?

What was the total amount of surplus of the Federal Reserve bank on the first day of January 1940, and what was the capital stock on that date?

Do the Federal Reserve regional banks own their office buildings, and, if so, what is the value of each and how were the funds acquired to pay for them?

Thanking you in advance for this information, I am

Very sincerely yours,

_____.

In reply I received the following letter, which is self-explanatory:

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, July 3, 1940.

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEMKE: Replying to your letter of June 24, 1940, the total amount paid to the United States Treasury by the Federal Reserve banks as a franchise tax, is as follows:

1913–1918	$1,134,234
1919–1932	148,004,066
Total	149,138,300

The paid-in capital stock of the Federal Reserve banks amounted to $80,767,000 on December 31, 1918, and to $151,292,000 on December 31, 1932. The surplus of the Federal Reserve banks on July 1, 1932, amounted to $259,431,000. On the first day of January 1940 paid-in capital stock of the Federal Reserve banks amounted to $135,599,000 and their surplus (sec. 7), to $151,720,000. You will recall that at the same time the franchise tax provision of the Federal Reserve Act was repealed the Federal Reserve banks were required to pay over an amount equal to one-half their surplus ($278,599,000) on January 1, 1933, for nondividend capital stock of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. This payment amounted to $139,299,557.

All the Federal Reserve banks and their branches now occupy their own office buildings except the branches at Cincinnati, Charlotte, Portland, and Seattle and the Savannah agency, which occupy rented quarters. There is enclosed a table giving the total cost of the various Federal Reserve bank and branch buildings and their net book value, i. e., cost less depreciation and charge-offs. The figures in the table do not include the cost of certain properties, totaling $2,697,947, and having a net book value at December 31, 1939, of $1,266,392, which were acquired for banking-house purposes but are not at present so used. Funds used by the Federal Reserve banks to purchase land and construct buildings came from the capital paid in by member banks under the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act, and their accumulated surplus.

Very truly yours,

MARRINER S. ECCLES, Chairman.

You will note in the first paragraph of Mr. Eccles' letter he states that the Government, from 1913 to 1932, was paid by the Federal Reserve bank, as a franchise tax, $149,138,300, in compliance with the original law which provided that a part of the net earnings of the bank be paid to the Government as a franchise tax. For some reason, best known to Congress, that provision was amended so as to eliminate the Government's participation in the earned surplus of the Federal Reserve bank, which simply means that since 1932 all of the net earnings of the Federal Reserve bank has gone into its surplus. Mr. Eccles' letter shows that the Federal Reserve bank has been very prosperous. Not only has it paid out of its earnings $94,144,463 for office buildings, but it has invested out of its surplus $139,299,557 for stock in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; paid the Government $149,138,300 as an excise tax; and, on January 1, 1940, had a surplus of $151,720,000 on a paid-in capital stock of $135,599,000.

The Federal Reserve Act provides:

Federal Reserve banks, including the capital stock and surplus therein, and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from Federal, State, and local taxation, except taxes upon real estate.

I would like to know by what method of reasoning the most prosperous bank in the United States should be exempt from taxation?

From the foundation of the Government until the close of the Civil War the Government never issued a bond payable in any specific kind of money—just money of the United States. From the day war was declared, April 15, 1861, until March 3, 1865, the Government issued Government bonds totaling $2,351,699,479.26. Of the foregoing amount—before specie payment was suspended January 1, 1862—the Government sold approximately $99,000,000 of Government bonds for gold at a discount of $7,358,544.19. That was the graft which the international bankers got in buying these bonds. It must be understood that the bankers in this country had comparatively little gold except that which was owned and controlled by the international bankers.

The total amount of Government bonds sold during the Civil War, as heretofore mentioned, less the $99,000,000 that was sold for gold, was sold and paid for with United States notes—Lincoln greenbacks.

When the Government's supply of gold, including the amount received for the $99,000,000 of bonds, was about exhausted, President Lincoln appealed to the bankers to loan him their gold on Government bonds in order that he could carry on the war. The bankers told the President, as related in the Appleton Cyclopedia 1861, page 296, "Well, war is a hazardous business, but we can let you have it at from 24 to 36 percent." Lincoln branded their terms as outrageous, scandalous, and unpatriotic. He was greatly disturbed as to what to do to get money to prosecute the war, and feed and clothe the soldiers and sailors who were giving their lives to save the Union, while the money sharks stayed at home and were growing rich by usurious interest.

In dire extremities Lincoln appealed to Congress to give him authority to issue Government currency to carry on the war, and Congress yielded to his request, and as a result the first paper money ever issued by the Government of the United States was authorized in 1861. The notes issued were called demand notes and were made full legal tender. The total amount authorized and issued was $60,000,000 and was always on a parity with gold.

The issue of demand notes ceased; however, Congress authorized the issue of $450,000,000 of United States notes (commonly known as Lincoln greenbacks) and provided for the retirement of demand notes by exchanging United States notes for them. The United States notes were full legal tender for all debts, both public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. This exception clause relative to United States notes depreciated them greatly, as measured in gold, but did not affect their legal-tender value for the payment of all other obligations, both public and private; in fact, all Government bonds, the total of which I have heretofore mentioned (except the first issue of $99,000,000, which was sold for gold) were bought and paid for with United States notes. In fact, the war was fought and won with United States notes (Lincoln greenbacks), as it was the only money in current circulation.

What is the difference between a thousand-dollar Government bond and a thousand-dollar bill (Government currency)? Both are obligations of the Government, and both are good as long as the Government is solvent. Government bonds have, in the past, depreciated on the open market 25 percent, a thousand-dollar bond selling for $750, the money paid for the bond being Government currency. This Government never issued a legal-tender dollar that did not pay a dollar of debt, interest, or taxes. I am going to give you a concrete example of the difference between the Government's issue of bonds and the Government's issue of full legal-tender money. At the close of the war the volume of United States notes (Lincoln greenbacks) was reduced to $346,681,016, which has been in circulation ever since, in denominations of $1 to $10,000 bills.

In order to draw a comparison between the cost to the Government of issuing Government money and the cost of issuing Government interest-bearing bonds, Hon. South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives, addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting him to compute the interest on $346,681,016 at 5 percent, compounded semi-annually, from January 1, 1863, to January 1, 1936, this being the amount of greenbacks now and continuously in circulation ever since the war. Mr. Trimble received the following reply from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which is self-explanatory and shows that if 5-percent bonds had been issued instead of United States notes, the compound interest on said bonds would have been $12,406,000,000:

JANUARY 30, 1936.

HON. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TRIMBLE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 25, 1936, pertaining to the interest calculation which you requested in an earlier letter.

The amount of interest accruing on $346,681,016 at 5 percent, compounded semiannually, from January 1, 1863, to January 1, 1936, is $12,406,000,000.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT E. GASTON,
Assistant to the Secretary.

This interest calculation up to July 1, 1940, would amount to $15,926,351,079. This astounding illustration of the expense of interest-bearing bonds should arouse the people of this country to the sense of danger that confronts them, as we soon will have $50,000,000,000 of outstanding interest-bearing bonds.

The Federal Reserve Bank Act became a law on December 23, 1913, during President Wilson's first term, and was a wonderful improvement over the old banking system. It did yeoman service during the World War. The Democrats were exceedingly and enthusiastically proud of it, as evidenced by the financial plank in their 1916 platform, viz:

1916: Democratic: Our archaic banking and currency system, prolific of panic and disaster under Republican administrations—long the refuge of the Money Trust—has been supplanted by the Federal Reserve Act, a true democracy of credit under Government control, already proved a financial bulwark in a world crisis, mobilizing our resources, placing abundant credit at the disposal of legitimate industry, and making a currency panic impossible.

Note the last five words, "making a currency panic impossible." If the act were properly and justly administered for the welfare of all the people instead of the favored few, financial panics could not occur. The administrations of the Federal Reserve System, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, have been tragic and almost criminal—absolutely responsible for the panics of 1921 and 1929, as well as the recent so-called recession, from which the country is still suffering.

I am incorporating in my remarks excerpts from a very interesting, instructive, and illuminating speech made in the Senate on April 11, 1939, by Senator KEY PITTMAN, which proves conclusively and shows from Federal Reserve bank reports, how and why the recession was brought about:

MR. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I never have been able to see how borrowing money by our Government, and its expenditure for work-relief labor, could ever raise commodity prices in this country to the level of 1936, which we seek. In fact, it has not done so. I think the time should very quickly come when this policy should cease; but I do not believe it ever will cease unless some action is taken by Congress to restore the price level of commodities in this country.

If one cannot make a profit on his business, there will be no income from it. We cannot increase income without increasing profits or at least assuring some profits to the producers of commodities and to those engaged in industry.

Again we find that a certain amount of national income is essential to prosperity. We now face, on our national income, the maximum amount that we can afford to pay in the form of taxation. What disturbs me is that we are constantly arguing about these enormous expenditures of borrowed money, and the only intimation we give out that our action is going to affect commodity prices is that if we stop the spending, private industry will spend. I do not think that naturally follows by any means. Private capital will not invest, no matter what the taxes are, during deflation or threat of deflation. It always invests during inflation. I can understand, of course, that the five or six billion dollars we might spend of the Government's borrowed money would be only a drop in the bucket if private industry did not join in with its capital and its money; but I do not know what Congress has done or is doing to retard deflation and to increase commodity prices.

We certainly have some control over our monetary agents in this country. It would seem that we should have some control over the Federal Reserve Board and some control over the Treasury Department. If we have not, we should have. It is perfectly evident that the Federal Reserve Board, in connection with the Secretary of the Treasury, in the latter part of 1936 and the early part of 1937, caused the recession of 1938, as it is called, and did it deliberately.

In the latter part of 1936 and the early part of 1937 commodity prices in this country had reached nearly the parity of 1926. As a matter of fact, farm commodity prices had reached 96, as compared with a hundred, which meant that the purchasing power of the dollar was down to 101.

Within a few months after that commodity prices were driven down 24 percent, and they are down at that point now. The general prices of agricultural products were driven down more than 24 percent, and they are there now.

We have tried every kind of scheme to save agriculture. We have paid the farmers to reduce their production; we have paid them bonuses in the form of loans. Yet it has not affected their commodity prices at all, and unless something is done to affect commodity prices, the present condition is bound to last forever.

Let us look at what Mr. Eccles, the great genius in charge of the Federal Reserve Board, said in his report at the end of 1936. This is a splendid report. In 1936 it looked as though we were not going to have any unemployment in 1937 and 1938; it looked as though the prices of all commodities would reach 100.

I want Senators to listen to this report for just a moment. On page 3 of the Annual Report of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board for 1936 we find the following:

"Progress in industry and trade was substantial in 1936. Production of durable goods increased considerably, and output of nondurable products also showed growth, particularly in the latter half of the year."

I am reading from a great monetary and economic genius, and I hope to conclude in a moment:

"The increase in durable-goods production reflected purchases of equipment both by industry and by individuals, as well as further expansion in construction. There was a general rise in employment, and income in both urban and rural areas was considerably larger than in other recent years. Capital values increased during the year, and in the latter part of the year there was a general advance in commodity prices. Total national income rose to $63,800,000,000 for the year as compared with $55,000,000,000 in 1935 and a low of $39,500,000,000 in 1932."

That was a splendid showing. On page 2 of the report we find the following:

"During 1936, however, business drew upon the banks and upon investors' funds to a considerably larger extent. Commercial loans to bank customers, after 3 years of little change, increased by $1,000,000,000, and securities issued by corporations to obtain new capital (as distinct from refunding issues) amounted to $1,200,000,000, or more than the aggregate for the previous 4 years combined."

The same story of prosperity proceeds. On page 1 of the report for the year 1937 we find the following:

"At the opening of 1937 economic activity was increasing rapidly. The output of mines and factories, after a steady rise for 2 years, had reached the average level of 1929. Increased activity was manifested both in the industries producing goods for immediate consumption and in those producing durable goods. Capital expenditures by manufacturing industries were increasing rapidly, in line with output and profits. There was some revival in residential construction, which had dwindled to a very low level during the depression and was still far from normal. Employment was expanding and wage payments were rising even more rapidly as the result both of reduction in part-time employment and of increases in hourly wage rates. Increased farm income, a large volume of dividend disbursements, and larger wage payments resulted in an increase in retail and wholesale distributions. Prices of securities were at the highest level since the early part of the depression; yields on bonds, both Government and corporate, had reached exceptionally low levels, and capital issues of corporations were in the largest volume of the recovery years. Many commodity prices were rising rapidly. Advances were particularly pronounced in agricultural and other raw materials; prices of finished goods were also rising. Increased domestic demand, together with a considerable volume of foreign demand, contributed to the advance. A wave of buying was in progress. * * *

"Relative to bank loans and the expansion of deposit currency, the Board reports as follows from page 2: 'The total volume of bank deposits and currency continued to grow and at the beginning of 1937 was at the highest level in the country's history. Bank loans to trade and industry had increased considerably and were growing. New York City banks were reducing their holdings of Government securities, but total investments of banks had changed little in the last half of 1936. Idle funds in the hands of institutions and individual investors continued large, and long-term money rates were exceptionally low.'"

On page 3 of the 1937 report we find the following assertion:

"Currency outside of banks had increased by about $2,000,000,000 between 1930 and 1937."

That is where currency must be to have any effect.

Now comes the report of the destruction of that prosperity, an admission on the part of Mr. Eccles that the Board deliberately destroyed that prosperity.

Yet I have never heard anything said in Congress against it. I have heard of no effort in Congress to control a situation of that kind. We are concerning ourselves with a feared waste of $50,000,000, when the act of the Federal Reserve Board struck down billions of dollars worth of capital in this country with one blow. We are talking now about saving the taxpayers' money, and, in my opinion, there is not a thing that we are talking about which has anything whatever to do with the restoration of the price level.

This is what the Federal Reserve Board did in conspiracy with the Treasury Department. On page 2 of the 1937 report we find the following:

"The rate of advance in business activity was, in fact, so fast that there were evidences of unsound developments."

There is the whole secret. There were evidences of unsound development. Prosperity was moving forward too rapidly to suit them, and there was threat of a boom. Yet there were 8,000,000 unemployed in this country at the time of that so-called threat of a boom. I read further:

"There was a large increase in forward orders in anticipation of further price and wage increases, together with uncertainties regarding deliveries, partly due to labor disputes, and shortages were developing in point and equipment and in some classes of skilled labor. Notwithstanding the fact that recovery was far from complete and that there was still a large amount of unemployment, boom conditions were developing in particular industries and boom psychology began to be manifested."

Then what happened? On page 1 of the report of 1936 we find that the Board took action to check the upswing. This is what it reported:

"In July 1936 and again in January 1937 the Board of Governors took action to increase reserve requirements and thereby to eliminate a large part of the excess reserves that had accumulated. The combined effect of these two actions of the Board was to double the reserve requirements of member banks. Thus the power conferred upon the Board by the Banking Act of 1935 to increase reserve requirements for the purpose of preventing injurious credit expansion was fully utilized.

"In December 1936 the United States Treasury inaugurated a policy of setting aside in an inactive stock all gold purchased subsequent to December 23, 1936, and thereby preventing the further acquisition of gold from increasing bank reserves. The Treasury and Federal Reserve measures taken together largely eliminated the basis of a potential credit expansion arising from the large movement of gold to this country which had begun in 1934 and had greatly expanded the credit base of the country."

Again, on page 2 of the 1937 report the Board reported that the Treasury Department joined in the program which had the effect of curtailing and checking the return of prosperity. I read:

"In December the United States Treasury, after consultation with the Board, adopted a policy of placing new gold acquisitions in an inactive account, thus preventing further gold imports from adding to the reserves of member banks."

On page 3 of the 1937 report we find the following:

"In August 1936 the Board of Governors had raised reserve requirements for member banks by 50 percent in order to absorb a part of the $3,000,000,000 of reserves in excess of requirements held by member banks. Under the law the Board has the responsibility of changing reserve requirements in order to prevent injurious credit expansion or contraction, and the Board had acted to eliminate from the credit base a part of the redundant reserves accumulated through a large volume of gold imports. The Board's action was in the nature of a precautionary measure to prevent an uncontrollable expansion of credit in the future. The policy of maintaining easy money and credit conditions pursued by the System since the beginning of the depression continued to be in effect."

On page 3 of the 1936 report we find the following:

"The Board, therefore, in January and March 1936, took action to increase the margin requirements applicable to security loans made by brokers and dealers in securities and in March also made these requirements, as increased, applicable to loans made by banks on stocks for the purpose of purchasing or carrying stocks registered on national securities exchanges. By these measures the Board undertook to check the growing use of borrowed funds for speculation in securities, without limiting the supply or raising the cost of credit available for commercial, industrial, or agricultural purposes."

Senators, watch the development and see what happens. See what happens with this control of our monetary system. I continue to read from the 1937 report, page 8:

"About the middle of March prices of stocks and of lower-grade corporate bonds began to decline from the high levels to which they had risen. Advance buying by industry and trade slackened and early in April prices of commodities traded on organized exchanges began to decline. During the summer increases in crop production contributed to the declines in prices of cotton and grains, while livestock prices advanced. Industrial output continued large, however, reflecting to a considerable extent the filling of orders previously received. In the spring months there was a decline in offerings of securities for refunding purposes which had been in record volume in the early part of 1936 when business organizations, particularly the public utilities, were taking advantage of the prevailing low level of money rates to reduce the cost of their indebtedness."

Here is the end of the story on page 10 of the 1937 report:

"As a consequence of these developments industrial production declined at an exceptionally rapid rate, and the Board's index, which had averaged 116 in the first 8 months of the year, fell to 84 in December. There were also sharp declines in factory employment and pay rolls. Movement of goods over the railroads was reduced and, with costs at a higher level, the earning prospects and financial positions of many railroads were impaired. In the commodity markets prices of raw materials and semifinished products showed widespread rapid declines, and prices of finished goods, which had risen somewhat further during the summer, also decreased. In December prices of some raw materials continued to decline, but others, including steel scrap and cotton, advanced. Reductions in incomes were reflected toward the end of the year in reduced consumer buying of automobiles, furniture, and other durable goods. Residential building, which earlier in the year had decreased as a consequence primarily of higher building costs, declined further in the autumn, as uncertainties arose regarding income prospects. At this time there were some reductions in building costs, but with business activity declining, people were reluctant to build new houses or buy old ones."

There is the history of the rise in 1936 and 1937, and there is the history of the decline down to the present time.

The Federal Reserve Board, which has extraordinary control over the monetary affairs of the United States, conceived in 1936, at a time when there were 8,000,000 unemployed persons in this country, at a time when the price levels had not yet reached those of 1926, that there was a boom, and that conditions were unsound, and the Board took every step in its power to stop the boom, and it did stop the boom, and put conditions where they are now, and since the conditions were brought to that point the Board has taken no action to overcome the wrong and the destruction it did. Instead of that, we have Mr. Eccles, in a very confused and pitiful way, writing a letter to the Committee on Banking and Currency, saying there have been very many disagreements on both sides, and that they would be very happy to have the Committee on Banking and Currency suggest to the Board what they should do.

* * * * * * *

So the Federal Reserve Board has absolute control over currency inflation and deflation. There can be no danger of currency inflation. Why not reflate?

I quote from the recent hearing before the special committee of the Senate upon the silver investigation:

"The CHAIRMAN. What do you call 'currency inflation?' Describe 'currency inflation.' I have heard the expression used quite a lot. I would like to know distinctly what it is.

"Mr. ECCLES. To me it would mean where the supply of money, bank deposits, and currency, in the hands of those that spend that money, is greater than a country's ability to produce the goods for the market. It would be a condition of overemployment, a condition of inability to produce the goods, so that the supply of money in the hands of those who spend it is in excess of a country's ability to supply the demands.

"The CHAIRMAN. What would be the effect, then?

"Mr. ECCLES. The effect would be the rapidly rising price level. It would be a diminution of the purchasing power of the dollar.

"The CHAIRMAN. Has not the Government been striving apparently for 6 years to lower the purchasing power of the dollar and to raise the price level of commodities? That has certainly been the effort of our Government for 6 years.

"Mr. ECCLES. Of course you speak of 'the Government.' It is difficult for me to say. There are different views with reference to it. There are some people in the Government, and I think practically everybody, felt that the prices should go up, it would be desirable to have higher prices certainly than they were in 1932, that the prices should bear certainly some relationship to fixed charges and debt structure. If it is possible to create that condition, I would think that was desirable.

"The CHAIRMAN. As I understand you now, and I hope I do, the effect of currency inflation would be to raise rapidly price levels; isn't that true?

"Mr. ECCLES. That is right.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then by 'currency inflation' you could bring the price levels up to what the Department of Labor fixes as parity. That is true, isn't it?

"Mr. ECCLES. You may get a great variation in prices. You may have some prices very low, and you may have other prices higher. Taking an average price level, I think that is true."

Read carefully and analyze the above colloquy between Senator PITTMAN and Mr. Eccles, and determine whether you want inflation and prosperity or deflation and poverty.

The Good Book says, "By their fruits ye shall know them"; therefore, it would be fair to judge the Federal Reserve bank by this standard. During its existence from 1913 to the present time, commodity prices have fluctuated more than during any comparable period in the country's history; commercial failures have been more numerous than ever before in a like period in the history of the Nation; as administered, the Federal Reserve Bank Act has been the greatest piece of legislation for the specially privileged that has ever been conceived in the legislative halls of the Nation. During its operation greater combinations of capital have been formed than the country has ever known, and the records show that at the peak of the present depression 15,000,000 men were walking the highways and byways for work they could not get; 25,000,000 men, women, and children—hungry, ragged, and wretched—were on relief; there were thousands upon thousands of bank failures, entailing the life savings of millions of people; and left in its deadly trail were bankrupt States, cities, counties, farmers, and businessmen—yet we were told that the Federal Reserve System would insure confidence and make financial panics impossible.

Congress is to be called on for authority to issue more bonds, interest-bearing nontaxable obligations of the Government, to sell for fictitious bank credit money, when in fact, the President has authority to issue $3,000,000,000 of United States notes, a full legal-tender circulating currency, real Government money, that bears no interest and is taxable. The Government has buried at West Point enough silver bullion, the Treasury informs, to issue 1,598,000,000 silver certificates, full legal-tender, circulating currency, and has authority to do so.

The May issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin states: "About $2,500,000,000 of gold in the Treasury has not been put into active use and is therefore at the free disposition of the Treasury." Every dollar of the above-mentioned $7,098,000,000 could be utilized by the Government with no interest cost and obviate the necessity of issuing nontaxable interest-bearing bonds. Why is it not done? I do not know, and have never been able to find anyone who could give me a sensible reason.

The current opinion is that the Government guarantees deposits of banks that have qualified for insurance up to $5,000, which is not a fact. The Government does not guarantee anything of the sort. The Government is a stockholder to the extent of $150,000,000 in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which is a quasi-governmental institution that levies an assessment on all insured banks of one-twelfth of 1 percent on their deposits to create a fund to pay depositors of closed insured banks to a maximum of $5,000. Should there be a major financial depression, as in 1921 and 1929 to 1933, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation would be forced to close its doors when its cash was exhausted—just like any commercial bank in the same predicament.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation does not guarantee deposits to any greater extent than any commercial bank guarantees deposits. Congress could and should pass a banking bill which would reduce bank failures 90 percent, and financial panics and depressions would become a memory of a dim and distant past. Will it ever be done? Not until the international bankers are shorn of their power—which by intrigue and Trojan-horse methods have enabled them ever since the Civil War to maintain a "fifth column" in many key positions of the Government.

The Federal Reserve Act (H. R. 7837), approved December 23, 1913, had the following caption:

An act to provide for the establishment of Federal Reserve banks, to furnish an elastic currency, to afford means of rediscounting commercial paper, to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes.

The last four words in the above caption, "and for other purposes," gave the Federal Reserve bank unlimited power to do anything it desired, and what it desired most was to control the monetary and credit system of the country, viz, the power to contract and expand the volume of money in circulation and bank credit at will—with the result that the operators of the Federal Reserve bank are absolutely responsible for two major depressions, 1921 and 1929, and the recent so-called recession, in the last 20 years.

I quote the admonition and prophecies of four great patriotic Americans who have long since passed over the Great Divide, but whose memories still live in the hearts of the people:

I believe that banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies. Already they have raised up a monetary aristocracy that has set the Government at defiance. The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the Government and the people, to whom it rightfully belongs. If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of all property until their children will wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered.—Thomas Jefferson.

Money is the creature of law; its creation and original issue should be maintained as an exclusive monopoly of the National Government. The needs of all can best be served by issuing national currency and credit through the operation of a national banking system.—Lincoln.

It is a terrible situation when the Government must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious value of gold. If our country can issue bonds it can also issue currency. Both are promises to pay, but one promise fattens the usurer, the other helps the people.—Edison.

The czars never had such power as the Federal Reserve.—Senator William E. Borah.

The name Federal Reserve bank is a deception and a fraud which has led 90 percent of the people to believe it is a Government bank, because Federal means Government, when, in fact, the Federal Reserve bank is a private corporation in which the Government has no financial interest. However, the Government has been very generous and kind to the Federal Reserve bank by issuing to it Federal Reserve notes free of cost of any kind, except the cost of material and printing, which is estimated to be about 30 cents per thousand dollars. Federal Reserve notes are obligations of the United States with the following inscription on each note:

This note is legal tender for all debts, public and private, and is redeemable in lawful money at the United States Treasury or in any Federal Reserve bank.

You will note that the inscription states: "Redeemable in lawful money," which is an admission that Federal Reserve notes are not lawful money.

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, on leave to extend my own remarks, I include an article in the Times-Herald of August 7, 1940.

Mr. Speaker, this article verifies statements which I have made during the 2 years I have been here in Congress. The National Broadcasting Co. is the station over which the Jewish vilifier, Walter Winchell, exhaled his poisonous defamatory remarks against any and all who believe in the fundamental principles of this Government. It does not matter to him who they are or what position they occupy, if they cannot see eye to eye with his own organized minority. They are all wrong, according to Mr. Winchell. The president of this station, Mr. Sarnoff, evidently is in accord with the statements made by Mr. Winchell, and he should be, because he is one of the same people, only he comes from Russia.

I have said many times that our national broadcasting stations and the national press are controlled and dominated by this minority, where nothing is broadcast or published except what is in accord with this minority viewpoint. It is because of this control the people have remained uninformed to date, and it is to enlighten them that I have made it my business to insert such information in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the people of this Nation should learn the truth.

As to Mr. Winchell himself, little can be said, or, rather, nothing should be said, as even the most contemptible expressions give him too much credit. The New Yorker carried an article in which it alleged that Edgar Hoover, of the F. B. I., furnished this "Charlie McCarthy" of the air two G-men for his protection. I often wonder why the people should be taxed to protect such accidents of humanity. I cannot imagine what they are saving him for. For what purpose can he serve, except as a mediocre mudslinger? It would be much more sensible to give him a shovel so that he may engage in respectable labor. He could at least in such occupation dig a pit for himself to fall in, and what a relief that would be to those who are tired of his diatribes and slander! This crowd, as the article clearly shows, lives on bribes. Benjamin Franklin had his contacts and troubles when he tried to finance the Revolutionary War, for he had dealings with those whose god is gold and whose savior is a bribe.

SARNOFF BOAST HE COULD "DEAL" WITH F. D. ALLEGED—HOUSE GROUP PROBES MANEUVERING OVER R. C. A. TRUST CASE

(By William Strand)

David Sarnoff, president of the Radio Corporation of America, told an associate back in 1932, it was charged before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee yesterday, that if he could delay prosecution of a Government antitrust case against the R. C. A. until after President Roosevelt's inauguration, he would have little trouble in "dealing" with Mr. Roosevelt.

The Interstate Commerce Committee is engaged in bringing in a report on the reappointment of Thad H. Brown to the Federal Communications Commission. During previous hearings it has been charged that Brown, a member of the F. C. C.'s monopoly committee, was derelict in his duty in not bringing to the fore evidence at his disposal concerning alleged monopolistic practices on the part of R. C. A.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MAN'S AFFIDAVIT

Sarnoff was called for questioning in connection with charges, which were first made on the floor of the House in 1938 by Representative W. D. McFarlane (Democrat), of Texas, that the corporation used political pressure in 1932 to sidetrack an antitrust suit.

Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY (Republican), of New Hampshire, introduced in evidence an affidavit signed by Edward O. Keller, a Washington real-estate operator, which gave a sensational version of how the suit was finally settled by the signing of a consent decree. It was this document that contained Sarnoff's alleged remarks about Mr. Roosevelt.

The R. C. A. president denied both that he had ever made such remarks about the President and the bulk of the details of the settlement as given by Keller.

SENATOR RETAINERS CHARGED

Keller asserted that the defendant corporations retained as counsel, former Senators Daniel O. Hastings (Republican), of Delaware, and George Moses (Republican), of New Hampshire, to aid in getting a month's continuance. He charged that Hastings and Moses accepted $5,000 each, paid by the R. C. A. at the insistence of Sarnoff while serving in the United States Senate. Keller also charged that a bribe of $15,000 was paid to H. C. Mahaffy, Jr., at that time clerk of the Wilmington, Del., Federal District Court, to issue the continuance order.

At the suggestion of Roger J. Whiteford, a Washington attorney, who was consulted by Keller, according to the latter's version, a meeting was arranged between Senator Moses and Sarnoff in a hotel at Concord, N. H. At this meeting, Keller stated, Senator Moses assured Sarnoff he would be able to "prevent the case from proceeding to trial."

SOUGHT MOSES' "ADVICE"

Sarnoff's version from the witness stand yesterday was that he visited the New Hampshire Senator to seek "advice."

"Rather an unusual procedure, wouldn't you say?" interposed Senator TOBEY, "making a pilgrimage to Concord, albeit a beautiful place, to ask a United States Senator, not even a lawyer, his advice?"

"Oh, he was a distinguished man in the Senate and occupied many important posts," Sarnoff replied. "We thought he would know about such matters."

Senator Moses, it was alleged, suggested that Senator Hastings be called into the case. Senator Hastings, in New York at the time, sent for Clerk Mahaffy, who agreed to issue the continuance order, the affidavit charged.

"After the postponement of this case, Mr. Whiteford and Mr. O'Callaghan and myself called on Mr. Sarnoff and informed him that it was necessary that some money should be paid immediately," the statement alleged. "Senator Moses was up for reelection and needed campaign funds very badly. Mr. Sarnoff authorized Robert D. O'Callaghan, R. C. A. counsel, to have two checks drawn, each for $5,000, to be paid to Senator Hastings and Senator Moses.

SARNOFF TALK DETAILED

"A year or so later when the Radio Corporation of America wished to secure a modification of the consent decree insofar as foreign communications were concerned they employed an attorney by the name of Mr. Mahaffy, whose brother was M. C. Mahaffy, Jr., clerk of the Federal Court at Wilmington, Del., paying him a fee of $50,000 and the modification sought was granted without an objection whatsoever.

"On my boat trip with Mr. Sarnoff, from New York to Boston, Mr. Sarnoff informed me that he and President Roosevelt had been very close friends since the inception of radio, and that Mr. Roosevelt had said to him, 'Dave, you are the father of radio but when I was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, I mothered it for you,' and that he believed Mr. Roosevelt would be elected in November and that if he were able to postpone this case until after the Roosevelt inauguration he would have no trouble in dealing with Mr. Roosevelt personally."

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. O. BURGIN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 12, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from North Carolina, the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, in the American Forum of the Air program of the Mutual Broadcasting System, delivered August 11, 1940:

The paramount and overshadowing question before the American people today is the problem of national defense. It is true that our danger is potential rather than immediate, and it is also true that actual conflict is fortunately still many miles from our shores. But to those who advise against elaborate and costly preparation for that which may never occur, I believe the proper answer to be that we have too much at stake to take chances.

Those who take a complacent view of our defense situation would have us gamble the security, the freedom, the happiness, and the wealth and welfare of every citizen of our Nation against the cost of a system of adequate defense. Fortunately, such persons constitute a very small portion of our entire citizenship. There were similar groups in Poland, in Norway, in Holland, in Belgium, and in France. The snuffing out of their national existence by the powerful war machine of the dictator nation has given us a tragic and terrible example of the results of complacency.

In times past we have relied upon the constantly shrinking Atlantic to protect us from European dangers, just as the French depended upon the Maginot line. Experience has shown the French defense to have been undependable and we now realize that the miles of ocean lying between our shores and Europe would not be a serious deterrent to any determined and well-equipped aggressor.

If we face our problem with unimpaired vision and courage, we can but realize that our only certain safety lies in a thoroughly adequate system of national defense. If we are fully prepared there is little likelihood that we shall ever have occasion to use our defense facilities. However, if our worst fears do materialize, there is no hope for national security unless our armed strength not only equals, but is superior to, any force, or combination of forces, which may confront us.

Machines of aggression must be met with even stronger weapons of defense. The rights which our forefathers established for us are too sacred—our own individual liberty and happiness too important—and the vast wealth and resources of our productive country too great to risk by leaving any chink in our armor unprotected. We must be prepared to meet large numbers of warships with even larger numbers of warships, planes with planes of superior power and swiftness, gunfire and tanks with weapons powerful and effective enough to overcome any opposing destructive effort.

Of these facts I believe the American people to be entirely convinced. They know that one concentrated attack upon our shores by the combined might of all of the engines of destruction, which are the weapons of modern warfare, might easily cost more in human lives and property damage than the entire cost of an adequate defense program. I am persuaded, and will believe until overwhelmingly convinced otherwise, that the American people will make every sacrifice to keep our shores inviolate from the greedy, clutching hands of any murderous and ruthless dictator. Those who have seen the slavery enforced upon the vanquished in other lands have every reason to put a special premium upon the liberties enjoyed here and will, I believe, sacrifice their very lives, if necessary, to preserve the rights and traditions which we hold so dear.

One by one we have seen the nations of Europe, whose state of preparedness was insufficient to meet the test, fall before the deadly efficient war machines of the dictator nations. In those countries whose citizens spent precious time arguing minute points of procedure, instead of carrying forward with speed and efficiency a competent defense program, defeat came with catastrophic swiftness. In the face of threats to their national existence, they allowed internal disputes and discord to so delay or defeat their preparation that they were entirely unable to resist their aggressor. We must not make their mistake.

In former crises the American people have shown a gratifying aptitude toward discarding their internal differences and presenting a united front to the common enemy.

In this emergency I can perceive no change in our traditional practice. Petty partisanship and disputes among ourselves, in which we might otherwise engage in an election year with our usual vigor and enthusiasm, seem to be set aside by mutual consent, in view of the broader and more compelling problem with which we find ourselves confronted.

The steps which have already been taken in our defense program have met with the almost unanimous approval of the American people. The speed and efficiency of our action have clearly demonstrated to the world that a democracy can function effectively in an emergency. In this respect we have hurled back at the dictators the challenge which has so often been made with respect to the incompetency of democratic action.

Our defense program has already required the appropriation of enormous sums of money, and as the necessity for additional defense facilities continues to be acute, these appropriations will be followed by even larger sums.

If we are to perpetuate our form of government and to make secure our national integrity and safety, no part of our defense armor can be neglected. To this end, our personal sacrifices must be ever greater.

With regard to the costs of our program of national defense the response of the people of this country has been magnificent. They have already demonstrated that their devotion to the democratic method goes much further than mere lip service and protestations of loyalty. More and more severe tests will be placed upon our patriotism as the emergency grows more acute.

We have talked a lot about our love for the American form of government and of our hatred and contempt for governments founded upon brute force and a ruthless disregard for the individual rights of its citizens and neighbors. There are numerous indications that we may soon be called upon to test the measure of our love and devotion. This is a time for action—for works rather than words—for the speedy completion of a well-planned and systematic program of national defense. Nothing is of such supreme importance.

There are two ways by which we may finance the expenditures necessary to adequately arm our defense forces. They may be met by increased borrowings, but I believe I speak for the great majority of our people when I say that we should, to as great an extent as possible, pay as we go. I believe that I speak the sentiment of almost every citizen when I say that we will contribute gladly to any program, no matter how huge, if we are convinced that it is necessary to our defense, and that the burden of supporting this program is distributed as fairly and equitably as is reasonably possible.

Earlier in the present session the Congress enacted the revenue bill of 1940, the purpose of which was to lay a generally increased tax burden equally upon all Federal taxpayers. This bill was designed to raise for national defense purposes additional revenue of $1,000,000,000 annually; the largest peacetime tax increase in our Nation's history.

The Congress is now engaged in furthering the tax portion of our national defense plan by the enactment of an excess-profits tax. There is pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I have the honor to be chairman, a measure which, through steeply graduated rates, would take a large percentage of those profits which are in excess of those normally received, or which are greater than a reasonable return on the taxpayer's investment.

While such a tax will allow reasonable and normal profits, free from excess-profits tax, it will, I believe, carry out our desire and firm determination of preventing the creation of new "war millionaires. However, through the allowance of special amortization, an accelerated method of depreciating the cost of production facilities, manufacturers are being encouraged to expand their plants and other facilities for the production of articles necessary to the national defense, and businessmen are being urged to exert their best efforts in order that our defense forces may be more rapidly and effectively equipped.

This tax bill, as did the Revenue Act of 1940, has as its chief aim the increase in our governmental revenues to cover a larger part of our defense expenditures. We all agree that these expenditures are urgent and necessary. Meeting this cost produces a stronger test of our patriotism. I am wondering if the time for payment will find any diminution of our patriotic spirit. Will the American people be as willing to pay the bills as they are to urge the expansion of defense facilities? The willingness and promptness with which we provide the tax revenues necessary to cover these vast expenditures will demonstrate our love for our country and our devotion to the democratic method much more convincingly than any assertions and protestations.

If we are thankful for our heritage—if we do realize that the price of liberty may be very dear, and that the payments we are called upon to make for the sake of freedom and democracy may be so high as to be prohibitive if for anything less precious—then I believe we will support gladly any program necessary to their preservation. Let us pay our tax bill without complaining, or without attempting evasion—thankful to our Maker that it is the kind of burden which we willingly impose upon ourselves through chosen representatives subject to the will of the governed.

Now is the time above all times to show our faith by our works and our patriotism by our sacrifices and action.

Legislation Muzzling American Patriots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 7, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to call attention to a type of legislation that, not having a better name, I have taken the liberty of calling subversive or unconstitutional. The Senate bill, S. 3876, is an example of such legislation and should in justice to our own people be thrown in the waste-paper basket. Our greatest national curse is too many laws, which will, if not corrected or repealed, result in another war for freedom as it did in 1776. In an attempt to reveal the danger which lurks within the pages of this bill, I shall now quote and discuss S. 3876.

An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "The term 'indecent,' within the intendment of this section, shall include matter of a character tending to incite arson, murder, or assassination or riot and also forgeries or matter of a character fraudulent, and scurrilous, tending to incite hate against any religious sect or creed or race."

This bill is to define the word "indecent" which, in my opinion, is an impossible task, because what may be decent to one, may be very indecent to another. I think the pictures in the Police Gazette are lewd and indecent, and others think they are passable and decent. Another example: In my town, a group of people thought it was decent to produce the Passion Play, but another group of people in the same community tried to stop its performance, because they evidently thought it was indecent. I, therefore, as a matter of justice, grant others the same rights in such determination as I should like to enjoy and which I consider my right. Those persons interested in S. 3876 do not reciprocate. In this law they provide protection for themselves and for elimination of those they fear might expose them in their insidious attempt to undermine America.

Please reread the bill and note this statement. "Indecent should include anything that might incite arson, murder, and so forth."

Who can say what might incite a person to burn a house, commit murder, or assassination? And why draw a distinction between murder and assassination when the ultimate object of both acts is the same? Why was death by poisoning left out of the bill? Who can say what might incite a person to start a riot, commit forgeries, or engage in fraud? What scurrilous matter might incite hate against a religious sect, creed, or race? Here, again, the bill shows lack of intelligent construction. A Mohammedan or Hindu need only to touch each other to start a riot. In view of this, is it not obvious that this silly attempt of defining the word "indecent" is actually a red herring to obscure its real purpose?

This bill is not to punish the person who commits the crime, for nothing is said about that. It is, instead, to put away those whom the parties interested in this legislation fear; and who are they? They are the patriotic American people who tell the truth and expose these contemptible termites. They are the patriotic Americans who have obligated themselves to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Government of the United States. It is to muzzle these patriots this legislation is provided, for it is the patriots who will be accused of inciting riot when they denounce those who are engaged in subversion and destruction of this Government.

Under this act, public discussion or reading the Constitution or the Bill of Rights may he held to be indecent, should a crowd of revolutionaries, who do not believe in these documents, start a riot in order to break up a meeting of patriotic American citizens. This bill is intended to muzzle patriotic Americans, and let no one tell you differently. The fools, who want this legislation enacted, do not realize that they would be run into the ocean should Congress pass and the Department of Justice attempt to enforce this most abominable law.

The full portent of evil in this bill is obvious when we consider it with H. R. 7604 and H. R. 10289, for these are the three measures which will, if passed by Congress, give the Department of Justice power to put every Christian gentile American patriot in jail for 21 years, so that Justice Brandeis' organized people may conquer America.

I shall now quote and discuss H. R. 7604.

SEC. 346. That whoever shall send or transmit, or shall cause to be sent or transmitted, in interstate or foreign commerce or through the mails any written, printed, or oral communication which is defamatory of any religious, racial, national, fraternal, industrial, commercial, labor, or any other group of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall be liable for imprisonment for a term not exceeding 1 year or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both.

This bill provides legal protection for the groups enumerated therein, but it does not provide any protection for the Constitution or for the Government of the United States. In other words, while this bill appears as a harmless domestic kitten, it is in reality like a tiger, a most vicious beast of the jungle. For example, it protects all national or alien groups, it protects fraternal or oriental secret societies, it protects labor, but much of labor today is radical or communistic.

As a pleasant vehicle for this poison, it appears to give protection to any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. However, this is not true, for it penalizes all loyal or patriotic American citizens who speak in defense of the Constitution or in defense of the Government of the United States. For example, should any patriotic citizen criticize or denounce any alien guest, members of secret oriental societies, members of the Communistic Party, or members of any other subversive group, he would in such defense of the Constitution and our own Government be subject to prosecution under this act. On the other hand, any one of the groups named in the bill, as well as alien guests like Harry Bridges, members of oriental secret societies, Socialists, Communists, and anarchists, may engage in the most subversive and radical destruction of our Government, under full protection of this law. The real purpose of the bill is to put all the patriots in penal institutions and leave the radicals in charge of the Government of the United States.

The resolution, H. R. 10289, is a bill which defines "fifth-column" activities and sabotage. This bill is the most vicious of the three and is a sequel to the other two. These three bills are without doubt drafted by the same person for they are all, as many others, un-American and unconstitutional.

Many things may happen to the American people under this bill, for it will penalize anyone who speaks, writes, or prints anything in the support of the Constitution or constitutional government. Such a person being tried in a New York Beth-din or in similar courts in other foreign cities in the United States, would most likely be found guilty. Anyone placed in such a predicament might shudder to read, as he entered the court, He who enters here leaves all hope behind for 21 years, for that is the sentence which this bill provides as a penalty for speaking on sound principles of our Government. In addition to this, the court may shake him down or frisk him for $5,000 inflated currency, all because he preferred to speak in behalf of his own Government, or if an official, in order to honor his oath of obligation.

Is it not a tragedy to tolerate people who will introduce such trash and call it legislation? I, of course, do not believe for one moment that any Member of Congress will place his stamp of approval on any one of these bills.

I shall now quote excerpts from the bill to attempt to define "fifth columnists," H. R. 10289:

(a) The terms "fifth-column activities" and "un-Americanism" means subversive activities, consisting of advocating, teaching, aiding, or abetting (1) the overthrow of constituted government; or (2) the commission of crime, sabotage, unlawful or treasonous acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing or effecting any political or governmental change or which undermines or weakens the military or naval strength of the United States; (3) inciting to riot or inciting racial or religious prejudice; or (4) aiding or comforting any foreign government to the injury or detriment of the United States; or (5) stirring or promoting internal discord within the United States by causing others to commit acts injurious to the Government of the United States; (6) engaging in any military activities not sanctioned by the Government of the United States or by one of the States of the United States or one of the subdivisions thereof.

(b) The term "sabotage" means any willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property.

SEC. 2. Whoever (a) engages in "fifth column" activities or un-Americanism; or (b) willfully and deliberately, by spoken or written words, justifies or attempts to justify "fifth-column" activities or un-Americanism; or (c) prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, publicly displays, or possesses any book, paper, pamphlet, document, poster, or written or printed matter in any other form containing "fifth-column" activities or un-Americanism; or (d) organizes, assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to engage in "fifth column" activities or un-Americanism, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 21 years, or both.

Under (a) (1), in this resolution, please notice the word, "constituted," a word which is used in place of constitutional government. We now have a constituted government, a government which bears no resemblance to constitutional government or that for which the Constitution provides. We have now constituted ourselves into a democracy in the proper sense of the word and we will, should we continue, constitute ourselves into a totalitarian government with the same type of rulers who are now ruling and regulating the industry of Russia.

This bill in attempting to define "fifth columnists" is in reality designating the patriotic Americans as "fifth-columnists" and Mr. Brandeis' organized minority as the rulers of America.

(a) (2) No administration has sabotaged the Constitution more than the New Deal. This should be evident to anyone who acquaints himself with the many unconstitutional laws which have been enacted since 1933, laws which have made the Federal Government the biggest monopoly in the world and the greatest competitor and destroyer of private industry we have ever had. The Gold Reserve Act is unconstitutional, and the steal of gold, which was perpetrated under this law, as set forth in article 1, section 10, is a criminal offense. The Reorganization Act is also unconstitutional and one of the most destructive measures which has ever been enacted into law. Our trouble today is not from a lack of laws. It is, instead, from an unwieldly mass of laws, in a legal structure that no people should tolerate and which will, if some of these laws are not repealed, end as it did in 1776, with mass upheaval and protest against tyrannical laws.

(a) (3) The words, "inciting riot and racial or religious prejudice," identify the proponents of this bill. There is only one organized group that protests the question of racial and religious prejudice and that group is not the gentiles, in any sense whatever.

(a) (4) No one in the history of America has been more guilty of giving aid to the foreign nations than President Roosevelt. No one has done more to involve this Nation in war than the Executive, himself. Let no one forget that he is the No. 1, warmonger, for who has shouted hatred and defiance and shaken his fist across the Atlantic but Roosevelt, himself? No administration in the history of this Nation has done more to destroy our industries than the one now in power. This should be clear when we consider the tons and tons of farm products and other commodities we are importing from every foreign nation in the world.

(a) (5) I would like to know who has been stirring or promoting internal discord within and outside of the United States more than the Executive, and this is my answer to (5).

(a) (6) There is only one group of people in this Nation whose military activities are not sanctioned by the Government and that is the American people. This is clearly evident in the stamp of approval given by General Marshall to Hefter's Jewish Army now organizing in New York City. There is only one group in the United States shouting for war and they are the very people who have asked military exemption for themselves. However, I want to be liberal and this statement is made without prejudice. There is nothing to stop the President's relatives or Justice Brandeis' organized minority, from going forth as crusaders for the cause they seem to love, in which they may enlist just across the border in Canada.

WHO ARE THE "FIFTH COLUMNISTS"?

The real "fifth columnists" may be said to comprise those who by a careless or liberal interpretation of the Constitution exceed the power granted by that document to the three branches of the Federal Government, or who by departure from the literal meaning of the Constitution deprive the state and the people of the rights which they reserve to themselves in the ninth and tenth amendments. The "fifth columnist" is in reality a person or persons who engage in sabotage or destruction of constitutional government, not constituted government, as set forth in this bill. This definitely includes the highest to the lowest person who disparages or denies the people not only of the rights which they reserve to the state and to themselves, but in addition to that, the unwritten rights which are not mentioned in the Constitution because they were considered to be the inherent rights of the people. It also includes each and all who misconstrue, widen the meaning and misinterpret the Constitution, an act by which they unjustly deprive themselves and their own people of their constitutional rights.

We can only survive as a nation by returning to and operating according to the Constitution as it was given to us in 1787. We must unite to bring about a more perfect union which will establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. When this is done, we will again be a united America and a patriotic united American people. If it is not done, and if there is no national awakening by the patriots of America, nothing in the world can stop us from degenerating into a most abject and evil democracy, a mass government, no different from that which now rules in Russia.

We have, unfortunately, become a nation divided in two or more political parties with the interest of the people centered in their own party instead of in the Nation itself. It is this interest on the part of the public that is actually responsible for our departure from constitutional government. Instead of keeping the Government clean, the people, being interested in their own parties, have built up a corrupt political machine. We need a thorough cleaning of the Government, particularly, in the branch where the members are appointed and in the branch where they cannot be changed every 2 years. We need courts and patriotic judges who understand the Constitution of the United States; judges who will base their decisions for constitutionality upon the Constitution itself instead of upon a decision rendered by some former justice who knew little or nothing of the document upon which the decision should be based. I have often said in previous remarks, basing my statement upon acts which have been held constitutional, that this document evidently does not grace the walls of the beautiful marble structure on Capitol Hill.

We need a good dose of good national discipline. If this Nation is to be policed, let it be with an American Army and Navy, commanded by American officers, officers who are first of all Americans, not pro-English, not prointernational, not promeddlers in foreign affairs, but simply plain ordinary American citizens with the interest of the United States at heart. We need people in command of our Army and Navy and law-enforcement departments who are first of all nationalists, because an internationalist can never, never be a patriotic American. The internationalists do not thrive in a healthy nation. They thrive best in the nations which are decaying, for their power is built upon the ruins of public liberties.

Here's to the Constitution,
The Good Old Ship of State,
Damn the crew that scuttled
And left her in this shape.

Let us, therefore, repair the Old Ship of State, so that she might serve as she did in 1787, when she was launched by a crew who were pro-Americans, and, therefore, good Americans. We can do so in 1941, if we pick the right pilot for her.

Let us fix her up and launch her clear,
Sign a captain aboard who has no fear,
Who can face heavy gales that's bound to blow
After dumping the crew on the watch below.

The Ship of State should be manned anew
With American officers and sailors, too,
Who can steer her clear of reefs on the lee
As she heads into the gale in a choppy sea.

The clouds and scuds now drifting low
Are storm-threatening signs as sailors know,
For the next 4 years we are sure to see
Rough weather aplenty with a heavy sea.

Let us snug her up and leave her as slick
As the founders left her in 'Seventy-six,
With the flag full mast and flying free,
An emblem of Freedom and Liberty.

I have spun this yarn of the Ship of State,
And leave you as crew of the good old crate,
Help the "Old Man" as he takes her to sea
To clear the reefs close over the lee.

Roosevelt neutrality is a dangerous rock,
Created for trouble and national shock,
Study it closely, and you will see
That Roosevelt is the real emergency.

The shoals on the lee are piles of sand
To remind us "No War" with little Japan;
High on the shoals lies an old hull,
A reminder to steer clear of Johnny the Bull.

Let Johnny fight alone for his noble rakes
While you safely harbor the Ship of State,
Now I shall close with an "Asta La Vista"
As I leave for home for a short siesta.

My Record and Views on Various Major Problems

REMARKS

HON. H. P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 12, 1940

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that my people are keeping posted and are deeply interested in what is going on in Washington at this time.

I have received numerous letters and petitions from my friends and constituents requesting me to remain in Washington instead of deserting my duties in Congress for the purpose of going down to South Carolina to engage in a political campaign.

I fully realize that, because of the ruthless war which is raging in Europe, and the many serious problems confronting Congress and the country, that this is no time for anyone to desert his duty to his people and to his country, especially, if he holds the responsible position of Representative in the Congress of the United States.

I am now serving my twentieth year in Congress, a longer service in the lower House than any Member from South Carolina during all the past years.

CHAIRMANSHIP AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE

In that the present chairman of the great Agricultural Committee of the House, of which committee I have been a member for the past 18 years, has been appointed to a judgeship, I shall become chairman of this committee at the beginning of the next regular session of Congress in January 1941.

MANY MAJOR AGRICULTURAL PROBLEMS

Realizing the numerous agricultural problems which will be confronting Congress, regardless of who wins the war, I think it is very important that, even at this busy time in the Congress, those of us who will be responsible for considering these agricultural problems in the years to come should be giving serious thought and study to these problems.

In fact, I have been holding numerous conferences with several departments being represented, with a representative from the White House, with the hope that we may be able to be in a position in the next session of Congress to commence work immediately along the line of formulating a definite, constructive program to meet these new situations.

As stated, because of these many major bills coming up from day to day in Congress, and, because of these serious problems, which should claim our attention, I feel that my active service here, with the hope of being of service to my constituents and my country, is my first duty, rather than going down to South Carolina and taking an active part in a campaign in behalf of my own personal interests.

I feel that my people have had an opportunity to observe the type of service that I have been rendering them during all of these years, and I am sure that there are thousands of loyal friends and supporters in my district who have kept in touch with my legislative record, and, in that it has been possible for me to pass numerous important major bills, I am perfectly willing to leave my case in their hands.

When I first made the race for Congress I made my people two promises—first, that I would give them prompt and efficient service.

It is common talk all over my district that "all you have to do is to write your Congressman—you can hear from him, and you will get results."

In the second place, I promised that I would give them a strictly common-sense and businesslike administration.

The thousands of letters that I have received from time to time thanking me for the many things that I have done for my constituents and my district, as well as congratulatory messages on the passage of many important major bills are sufficient to make me feel proud of the fact that I have kept the faith and definitely carried out my promises.

I served during my first 12 years in Congress under a Republican administration. Never shall I forget the friendly attitude and the wonderful assistance given me by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee at that time, Mr. Haugen, of the great corn State of Iowa, now deceased. Peace be unto his soul.

Then there were Purnell, of Indiana, and Williams, of Illinois, both of them having passed on to the Great Beyond, and one of the present members of the Agricultural Committee, Andresen, of Minnesota.

In fact, if one is to be successful in Congress, he must not only have ability but he must be able to make friends. Second, he must be conscientious and interested in rendering service and in doing things along constructive lines. One of the most important assets is experience, which can only be acquired by long service.

Out of the 435 Members in the House there are only 27 having longer service than I have had at this time. Practically all of these are chairmen of the major House committees. They have secured these positions because of long service.

SOME MAJOR BILLS

Let me mention just a few of the major bills which I have passed, to say nothing of the thousands of votes that I have cast for and against many bills which have been considered during these years in the Congress.

During my first term in Congress I passed what is known as the United States Cotton Standard Grading Act. Prior to that time not a single bale of cotton had been officially graded, either for sale in this country or for export.

The classing of cotton under this act has been accepted in every country in the world, and today not only our farmers are receiving millions annually in the way of increased income because of proper classing and proper length of their cotton but every bale that is exported is graded and certified to by our Government and accepted in all of the foreign countries.

Upon the passage of this bill the late lamented Honorable A. F. Lever, who served in the lower House of Congress for around 17 years, having made a record of which anyone should be proud, sent me the following telegram:

I want to congratulate you on the passage of such a major bill during your first term in Congress.

RED CROSS COTTON AND WHEAT BILL

I also passed a bill authorizing the distribution of cotton goods out of 800,000 bales of cotton and food products from 45,000,000 bushels of wheat through the Red Cross to the poor and needy people of the United States.

There are thousands of people in the United States today who have not forgotten that sack of flour and the few yards of cloth or the garments which were distributed to them by the Red Cross under this bill.

SEED-LOAN BILL

I introduced the first seed-loan bill for the Southeast, making one of the best cases, according to a statement by Chairman Haughen, in connection with the hearings on this bill, that was ever made before his committee.

It was my good friend Williams, a Republican from Illinois, who made one of the major speeches on the floor of the House in behalf of this bill.

The loaning of money under the Seed Loan Act has saved the very existence of thousands of farmers in the South.

SEED-LOAN AGENCY

I secured a seed-loan agency at Columbia, my district, representing South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida.

VETERANS' HOSPITAL

It was my bill which established near Columbia, S. C., the Veterans' Administration Facility, which has proved to be a godsend to ex-service men, and which will ever stand as a real, living monument to me in its service to humanity long after I have passed into the great beyond.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

In 1933, although the ranking member of the Agricultural Committee, the first Agricultural Adjustment Act under the Roosevelt Administration, was passed in my name, which proved to be one of the most constructive pieces of farm legislation ever passed by the Congress of the United States. This bill was found to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court on the grounds that agriculture is a local problem, which, as far as I am concerned, although just a common layman, is a joke. I make this statement for the reason that anyone knows that agriculture is a national, as well as an international problem, and it is my firm belief that if this same bill could be considered by the present Supreme Court today there would be no such decision.

While this bill, as stated, was subsequently killed by the Supreme Court, I am firmly convinced that it kindled the national concern toward agriculture which resulted in the many constructive acts passed during this administration, which have been of more benefit to our farmers throughout the Nation than all the legislation applying to agriculture passed during the last several decades. It was the spark that made our Nation conscious of the importance of agriculture to our national welfare.

COTTON-INSURANCE BILL

I passed during this session of the Congress a bill to insure the cotton crop at a very small and reasonable insurance premium to be paid by farmers. This bill would insure payments to farmers for three-fourths of the value of their lint cotton and cottonseed based on a normal crop if destroyed by hailstorm, flood, drought, insect infestation, or other natural causes.

This bill would have become effective in 1941. Just think what it would have meant to farmers in my district where they have had hailstorms this year under such legislation.

Losses are never general, but tremendous losses are happening in the various cotton States annually, and this is a very necessary and constructive bill in the interest of cotton farmers.

However, the President vetoed this bill, writing me a letter giving his reason, as follows:

> This is a very necessary line of work, but we should withhold putting this bill into operation until we have had further experience with the operation of the wheat-insurance bill.

This will necessitate my introducing this bill in the next Congress, because, if we are going to continue to insure wheat farmers, you can rest assured I am going to demand the same service on the part of our Government toward cotton farmers.

FULMER FOREST-RESTORATION BILL

I have a bill pending known as the forest-restoration bill, which proposes, briefly, to assist farmers and small forest landowners in building up their forest resources, sawmill timber and pulpwood, and the carrying out of proper forest practices, and cooperative selling of pulpwood by farmers direct to pulp and paper mills, so as to eliminate the hog-tied monopolistic program of buying pulpwood, which is now being carried on by the pulp and paper mills of the South, which is nothing but highway robbery. This would, naturally, add to the income of our farmers, and materially aid our national wealth, as well as properly restore and preserve our forest resources.

FULMER COTTON PULP CONSUMPTION BILL

You know that we are now carrying at a tremendous expense the millions of bales of cotton stored in the various warehouses of the country, with an eleven- or twelve-million bale crop coming on this fall.

What are you going to do with this cotton?

I believe the Fulmer cotton pulp consumption bill, H. R. 5991, now pending in Congress, will solve this serious problem.

It is a known fact that, because of our exports having been practically destroyed, and because of the tremendous inroads on our markets by rayon, pulp, and paper products, which are taking our cotton markets to a considerable extent because we are unable to compete with these products with cotton, something will have to be done to consume more cotton in this country; otherwise, we shall be forced to cut to a great extent our cotton acreage and cotton production.

Briefly, this bill proposes to have pulp and paper mills in this country, as well as importers of pulp and paper, to pay a proper excise tax, or use by mixing a certain percentage of cotton with wood pulp.

By using a small percentage of 5 pounds of cotton with 95 pounds of wood pulp we would be able to consume in this country around 4,000,000 bales of cotton annually. Low-grade cotton can be used just as well as the very best type of cotton for pulping purposes.

Under this bill Canada, which imports into this country 3,000,000 tons of newsprint annually, duty-free, would have to pay this tax, or would have to purchase and consume 600,000 bales of American cotton.

It may be of interest to you to know that 46 percent of the pulpwood and wood pulp used in this country is imported from Canada and the Scandinavian countries. Because of the World War, in that Germany has taken over a great many of these countries, the importation of pulpwood and wood pulp will be eliminated except that portion coming from Canada.

This will mean a further heavy drain on the pulpwood resources of this country.

I have had the Agricultural Department to turn over to the Bureau of Standards research laboratory a bale of cotton to be used in demonstrating the feasibility and possibility of using cotton along the line suggested in my bill.

As a matter of fact, we are using millions of tons of old cotton rags, much of which come from foreign countries, and a certain amount of cotton today in the manufacture of newsprint, rayon, and pulp products.

This program would enable the great pulp and paper industry, as well as the cotton industry, the most important industry in the South, and one which means everything to every other section of the country, to go along, hand in hand, on a normal, prosperous basis, putting thousands of people to work, increasing the purchasing power of the people in the South to the extent that not only would it tend to rehabilitate our farmers, but it would mean everything to every other section of the country.

FULMER HOSPITAL BILL

I have also pending a bill proposing that the Federal Government under appropriations made by the Congress, build and equip hospitals in counties and communities where they are sadly needed today. These hospitals would be leased to proper authorities for the purpose of carrying on a proper hospitalization of that great class of people who are unable to take advantage of present facilities and who are sadly in need of this humanitarian consideration at the hands of the Federal Government jointly with such an authority.

Out of the conferences referred to, no doubt, there will be some major bills which will come up for consideration in the next session of the Congress.

The most important matter in the interest of all farmers in every section of the country is an up-to-date marketing and distributing program for farm products.

There should be proper marketing facilities in the counties and States, and national marketing facilities all over this country where farm products could be marketed after having been properly graded and properly distributed when and where needed, at a fair price to farmers.

How long would General Motors and the manufacturers of farm implements, mowing machines, tractors, and so forth last if they had to market and distribute their products as is the case with farmers?

These well organized manufacturing groups not only control their production in line with purchasing power, but they absolutely control their distribution with fixed prices.

It is a known fact that thousands of middlemen, many of them real parasites simply sapping the lifeblood out of farmers and consumers, largely market farm products.

If there is anything left after this procedure in marketing farm products, that is given to the farmers.

Think about it today in my country, where we have watermelons and cantaloupes going to waste or selling from 1 cent to 5 cents each, while in the large cities of this country consumers are having to pay 10 and 15 cents each for cantaloupes and from 50 cents to $1 each for watermelons.

Farmers operate as individuals, and they cannot solve these serious problems. However, with the assistance of the State and Federal Government it can be done.

PROPAGANDA AND WAR

Because of so much propaganda which has been going out all over the country by mail, in the press, and over the radio, naturally, the people in every section of this country are disturbed about the serious question as to whether or not this country will be forced to take part in the destructive war which is now raging in Europe.

My people are deeply interested in building up a national defense program, not for the purpose of engaging in a war in Europe, but that type of defense program which would defy the invasion of any foreign foe.

I want to state that it is my firm belief, out of my close observation here in Washington, from day to day, that the President and the Congress are absolutely against sending the young manhood of this country to Europe for the purpose of taking part in one of the most inhuman and destructive wars ever known to civilization.

I want to take the opportunity at this time of stating, for my part, if the time comes when I shall be called upon to vote for or against sending the young manhood of my district and my country to engage in a ruthless war in Europe, I shall definitely vote "No."

Too well do I remember that we sent thousands of young men into the last war with the hope of making the world safe for Democracy. The futility of that effort is too fresh in my mind to ever again plunge our country into a war in Europe.

LET US HELP ENGLAND RATHER THAN GO TO WAR

However, I am one of those who believe that if we can help England win along the line which I am advocating, it will definitely keep us out of war. If it is possible to assist England in the way of furnishing her with implements of war, cruisers, airplanes, in fact, everything along this line that we can possibly send her, other than sending our ships into the war zones, or sending any of our people over to Europe to engage in this destructive war, to the extent that England would be able to win, it would mean the saving of billions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country, in that we would not have to continue to build up and preserve that type of defense program which we would have to have, and it would mean the saving of untold misery and slavery in Europe. It would also tend to dispel fear of an invasion at any time by Hitler, and, in the last analysis, it would mean everything to this country from an economic standpoint.

"FIFTH COLUMN" ACTIVITIES

Much has been said about the "fifth column" activities in this country. I am sure that my people and the people of the country will appreciate the fact that the President and the Congress are doing everything possible to overcome and destroy these activities.

However, if I had my way about it, in that there are just lots of the members of this outfit unfriendly foreigners who, apparently, would be delighted to have the privilege of creating a revolution in this country for the sole purpose of destroying our type of government, I would deport them to that country, where they belong, whose government, apparently, they appreciate more than they appreciate ours.

COMMUNIST PARTY

Along with our forefathers, I am a great believer in freedom of speech, the press, and at this time, freedom of the radio; but I do not believe that the writers of the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights, had in mind at that time advocating that type of free speech and free press, which would permit a Communist Party in this country, in that this party definitely believes in the government of Russia. I have every reason to believe that if this party had a sufficient voice they would attempt to destroy the type of government that we have in this country.

However, today there is a wide open Communist Party in the United States. This party has a candidate for the Presidency and a Negro candidate for the Vice Presidency, and they will be permitted to vote in the November election.

Sometime ago, when they were holding their convention in the city of New York, when the candidate for the office of President made his speech accepting the nomination for the Presidency of the United States, he referred to Russia, as usual, in all of his speeches and propaganda going through the mails. From the applause of his followers they, apparently, lifted the roof of the building in which they were holding their convention.

I want to state again, if I had my way about it I would outlaw such a party in this country.

WILL HITLER INVADE AMERICA SOON?

While we are preparing the greatest national-defense program ever dreamed of, and, in that I am just as anxious as any other patriotic citizen of this country to be prepared to defend this country against the invasion of Hitler or any other foreign foe, it is my firm belief, from a common-sense viewpoint, that even if Hitler wins over England, the years will be many before he would attempt to invade this country.

Why do I make this statement?

If the war continues much longer there will be famine, unrest, and eventually revolution in perhaps a number of the countries which are now under the dictatorship of Hitler.

It is my contention that for quite a while Hitler will have his hands full in disarming these countries, setting up the type of government which he proposes for these various countries, and in providing for an orderly, controlled procedure, putting these people to work, and in feeding and clothing the millions of his subjects, all of which, apparently, would not give him an opportunity to equip himself properly, with necessary men and armaments, to attempt to invade the United States.

However, as stated, we are not going to take any chances.

OUR TROUBLE ECONOMIC AND MONROE DOCTRINE

I believe that the serious trouble that is going to confront the United States during and after this war will be largely an economic problem and the defending of the Monroe Doctrine as applied to the South American countries.

Why do I come to this conclusion?

In the past, especially during the past 75 years, those in charge of the affairs of this country have given serious thought along the lines that the only way we could exist and prosper was on a basis of exporting and importing of farm products and manufactured goods.

I have been advocating, and I contend that because of the serious problems referred to, the time has arrived when we should give more definite thought about our own markets for our own people and a program based largely on a self-sustaining basis; for instance, if we are going to subsidize our perfectly good American products let us do it for our own people, millions of whom are unemployed, undernourished, and poorly clad.

We have millions of old people living in misery and poverty through no fault of theirs. Let us do something about it.

OUR OWN MARKETS

In regard to our own markets, for instance, why permit Japan to flood this country with products that we can produce in the United States except, perhaps, silk?—and we can do without silk.

Are we permitting these imports from Japan just for the excuse of being able to export to Japan scrap iron and other necessary materials to be used by Japan in an inhuman and destructive war against helpless China?

The facts will bear me out that Japan is securing a large part of her cotton from India, and that the people of Japan are not permitted to purchase cotton goods in Japan.

Cotton goods manufactured in Japan are sold to other countries, millions of yards of cotton cloth and cotton goods being exported into the United States.

What are the people of Japan using? They are using millions and millions of yards of goods manufactured out of synthetic fibers.

I have been asking the question ever since I have been in Congress, Why permit India, a large cotton-growing country, a competitor of the Cotton South, to ship into the United States 2,000,000,000 pounds of jute and jute products annually, taking our own perfectly good markets for our cotton at the expense of the cotton farmers of the South to the tune of 2,000,000 bales annually?

We are long on talking about America for Americans, but we are tying the mails of the United States with jute twine. We are wrapping bales of cotton goods in the textile mills of the United States with jute burlap. We are covering American cotton with old, heavy, disgraceful, and wasteful jute bagging, at a time when we are stacking millions of bales of cotton in warehouses with millions in expenses annually to the taxpayers of this country.

NET-WEIGHT-COTTON-BAGGING BILL

During this session of the Congress I passed a bill known as the net-weight-cotton bill, which proposes to sell cotton on a net-weight basis, and the using of bagging manufactured out of cotton, instead of this old heavy, wasteful, and disgraceful jute bagging.

During all of these years I have had the strongest opposition from the jute trusts and a great many people in this country who handle jute bagging for the sole purpose of making money, all of which has absolutely been at the expense of cotton farmers.

No other cotton country in the world—in fact, not even in India, where jute is grown—uses this old jute bagging. No other cotton country in the world sells cotton on a gross-weight basis.

Even all the cotton that we export to foreign countries is settled for on a net-weight basis, the actual weight of the cotton, after knocking off 30 pounds' allowance for bagging and ties.

This bill is now on the Senate calendar, and Senator "COTTON ED" SMITH is sitting down on same, making a statement some days ago that the bill shall not pass.

In the meantime, I can prove that the price to farmers for their cotton is a price less the weight of the bagging and ties, and in waste, excess freight, and insurance, and other items are costing cotton farmers millions and millions of dollars annually. What are we going to do about it? I hope that everybody that reads this speech will write "Cotton Ed" to stand up and let this bill pass.

We are sacking annually millions of bushels of grain, and tons and tons of feedstuff in jute, burlap bags, and, yet, the western people wonder why the farmers of the South, being short of purchasing power, because of what is going on, do not buy more of their mules and their farm products, which my people would like to buy if they could grow cotton and had proper purchasing power.

Listen to this:

Farmers are hauling thousands of tons of fertilizers to their farms for the purpose of growing crops, all of which is packed in jute bags, at a time, as stated, when millions of bales of cotton are being hauled to warehouses for the purpose of having the Government extend to them a loan thereon, solely for the purpose at this time, if you please, of keeping the price of cotton from going to 4 or 5 cents per pound.

A possible home-consumption program for cotton—Bales annually

1. Present annual rate of domestic consumption	7,500,000
2. Mattress program for low-income families making less than $50 a month	500,000
3. Substitution of cotton, industrially, for all jute and burlap now imported	500,000
4. Cotton-stamp program, which would raise cotton-goods purchasing power of all families making less than $200 a month to that level	2,000,000
5. Cotton pulp consumption bill	4,000,000
Total, annually	15,500,000

Another good reason why we should pay more attention to our own markets and the consuming of our own farm products and our own manufactured goods is, you know, our trade-treaty program is already largely out of the window. Hitler is already trying to make barter-treaty connections with every country possible, including the South American countries. Under Hitler's program it does not make any difference with him about how much gold he has or how much gold the United States has. He is going to produce largely or perhaps altogether, under a slave-labor program. Under his barter arrangements, because of our standard of living and high standard of wages, there is no way for the United States competing except under a large subsidy program.

UNDER THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Speaker, we have done a great many good things for agriculture; however, as stated, the agricultural problem with numerous other major problems that will be confronting the Congress and the country in the coming next few years will be grave and will demand serious and conscientious deep thought and profound consideration.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, allow me to state, with pardonable pride, that I feel that my service of two decades in this Congress has been unselfish and for the best interest not only of my constituents in South Carolina, who have 10 times returned me as their Representative, but to the Nation as a whole.

I have endeavored to submerge personalities in the interest of principles; I have attempted to reconcile my views with those of my colleagues on all principles where national issues were involved.

I have tried to practice tolerance and my record discloses the fact that nowhere and at no time have I ever indulged in bitter personalities or in conduct unbecoming a Member of this honorable body.

I have, first and foremost, tried to be an American, which name carries with it liberty, equality, and justice, the three grandest attributes God has ever given man.

Today, if England falls, America will stand as the last stronghold of these great principles.

Within the past year we have seen democracies crushed under the iron heel of dictatorships; we have seen millions upon millions of peace loving, free peoples enslaved; we have seen governments embodying these principles bought with the blood of thousands upon thousands of patriotic citizens, pass out of this world's picture almost overnight.

We have seen force, the most brutal in this world's history, take the place of justice and reason to such an extent that the tragedy of world events today is the greatest since the gray dawn of history.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that to be an American is one of the grandest things that can come to any man, and it is my hope and my firm belief that a God-fearing, God-serving, united people, those of us who have the privilege of living in the greatest republic in the world, can and will carry forward the torch of freedom, holding it high above the clouds of today's tempestuous storms, so that generations yet unborn can see its light and follow it, like the Wise Men of the East followed the Star of Bethlehem to the manger of the Prince of Peace, and that we may, in our own way, be able to preserve for posterity this freedom which we now enjoy and which was handed to us unsullied by our forefathers.

Mr. Speaker, may I urge that all of us anew resolve to bend our efforts toward carrying forward and safeguarding the principles of liberty, so that, when our race shall have been run, we can say with the prophet of old, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith," and that America, conceived in liberty, born in freedom, shall continue to grow to great heights, and that the principles of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln shall not perish from the face of the earth.

No Need for These

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE OF JULY 21, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the New York Herald Tribune, of July 21, 1940.

On the front page of the New York Herald Tribune, July 21, 1940, appeared an article entitled "France's Fall Increases Flow of Genius to the United States." On the same page appears an eyful of pictures, all but one easily recognized as the usual type of refugee.

The press is working overtime to convince us that our national security is threatened, and the Government is working overtime to dispose of all sorts of armaments, so that we will be an easy victim for invasion. These two policies do not hitch up right, unless the administration is operating under the delusion that our national defenses begin on the cliffs of Dover.

The people responsible for this propaganda and for the calamity howling, which is now going on and published in the press, are those who come over here as refugees. It is these people who may be charged with dissemination of liberalism; yes, liberal of the people's rights and the transfer of such rights to the executive department at the expense of the liberties of the people.

Who are these refugees? Are they German? No; for no German is allowed to leave Germany. Are they Slavs? No. They also prefer to remain in their own countries. Are they Finns? No. Are they Norwegians? No. They also prefer to remain where they have lived for hundreds of years. When any of the Norse emigrate to the United States, it will not be as refugees but simply as people whose greatest desire is to aid and help other Americans in support of constitutional government. Are the refugees from Holland? No; for Holland can well take care of her own refugees by transferring them to her possessions. Are they from Belgium? No; for that country can also take care of her refugee problem by transferring them to her own colonies. Are they French? No, indeed. The French colonial empire is much greater than France itself, and therefore, quite capable of absorbing any refugees leaving France. Are they English? No. The British Empire is made up of 13,000,000 square miles of landed surface, and therefore large enough to take care of any number of refugees who may wish to leave the British Isles.

Who are these refugees, if they are none of these nationals? They are composed of the same type of people who now own and control our newspapers, our radio broadcasting stations, our cinema, and nearly all avenues of publicity. They are the people who dominate our political parties and who even reach into the States and districts, in order to dictate their wishes to the people in the smallest community within the State.

In reading this article, let me call attention to this statement: "Nearly 3 years ago, in This Week, Will Irwin wrote:

> Not in a century have we received such an excess of superior human breeding stock as these dictators have poured into us during these year in which continental Europe has gone raving mad."

I was shocked in reading this, for little did I understand the real purpose in this immigration. It is, however, important to understand that this dilution in the Nordic races is actually responsible for the collapse of Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France. It is that admixture which has destroyed every nation which has lent itself to such an experiment.

FRANCE'S FALL INCREASES FLOW OF GENIUS TO UNITED STATES—MAETERLINCK, ROMAINS, BERNSTEIN, AND MILHAUD JOIN EINSTEIN, BRUENING, MANN, AND OTHERS WHOSE BLOOD OR POLITICS IS ODIOUS TO NAZI-FASCISM

(By Harry W. Baehr, Jr.)

When France, virtually the last stronghold of human freedom and racial tolerance on the continent of Europe, succumbed to totalitarianism the United States received a fresh accretion of genius. Ever since Fuehrer Adolf Hitler's accession to power in 1933 a tide of men and women, renowned in the arts and sciences but unacceptable because of blood or opinion to the dominant theory of Nazi-Fascism, has set in across the Atlantic. The recent arrival of such men as Maurice Maeterlinck, Jules Romains, Henri Bernstein, and Darius Milhaud shows that this tide is still flowing.

Nearly 3 years ago in This Week Will Irwin wrote: "Not in a century have we received such an access of superior human breeding stock as these dictators have poured into us during these years in which continental Europe has gone raving mad." Since that time the influx of refugees of acknowledged talent has increased.

Perhaps the most distinguished contribution of the dictators to American culture is Albert Einstein, whose formulation of the theory of relativity has been called "the greatest synthetic achievement of the human intellect." Winner of a Nobel prize in 1920, Einstein left his native Germany just before Hitlerism, which he called a psychic disease of the masses, became dominant there. He came to America to join the staff of the school of mathematics at the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, N. J., and will become a citizen of the United States in September.

In addition to Einstein, many scientists of lesser fame but so'id accomplishments have come to this country from Europe, and their names appear on the roster of many educational institutions. In the field of the social sciences, the graduate faculty of the New School for Social Research has a distinguished refugee staff, whence comes its popular name, the University in Exile. In the same branch of learning the Harvard School of Business Administration has acquired the scholarly former Chancelor of Germany, Heinrich Bruening, and Lucius N. Littauer, professor of government.

On his arrival in New York, Jules Romains, author of the great comedie humaine, Men of Good Will, said he planned to set up the office of P. E. N., the international author's organization, of which he is president in this city. He explained that there was "not much left in Europe of the intellectual freedom of expression for which the club stands." The same force which has drawn Romains here sent us earlier Thomas Mann, who won a Nobel prize in 1929 for his novel, Buddenbrooks. Mann, a voluntary exile from his native Germany, first became a citizen of Czechoslovakia and came to this country after the disastrous effects of the Munich conference.

Other literary artists driven to our shores by totalitarianism include Vicki Baum, author of Grand Hotel and other works; Maurice Maeterlinck, aged Belgian poetic dramatist, and Henry Bernstein, French playwright, whose life was threatened by the Germans because of his recent anti-Nazi play, Elvire. Andre Maurois, known in this country for his biographies of Shelley and Byron, recently reached Canada from France and will deliver the Lowell lectures at Harvard University in the fall. It has been reported also that the Norwegian, Sigrid Undset, another Nobel prize winner in literature, who escaped to Stockholm, may come to America.

In 1933 Artur Schnabel, one of the world's great pianists, predicted that the next great musical renaissance probably would take place in this country. "The whole genius of Europe is gathered and combined in the United States," he said. This remark, in a musical sense, has even more truth now than when it was uttered. Musicians are the most cosmopolitan of artists, but many who came here for concert or operatic tours are cut off from their European homes by war, racial persecution, or the type of dictatorship that reads ideological implications into art.

The list is long. It includes Schnabel himself, driven successively from Germany and Italy; Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born French citizen; Paul Hindemith, German composer who was exiled and his works banned by the Nazis as a "cultural Bolshevik," and who is now a member of the faculty of the Yale University School of Music; Bruno Walter, conductor, who assumed French citizenship after German racial laws caused him to leave his fatherland; Lotte Lehmann, the soprano, voluntary exile and now an American citizen, and Kirsten Flagstad, among the greatest of living Wagnerian sopranos, cut off from her Norwegian homeland by the war. Arturo Toscanini, the conductor, also might be included, since although not banned from his native Italy despite his frequent flouting of the Fascist theories prevalent there, he has just completed a highly successful tour of South America with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, which has been termed "the United States 'fifth column' " because of its popularity on the southern continent.

The C. C. C. and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY JAMES J. McENTEE, DIRECTOR OF THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able article written by Mr. James J. McEntee, Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and published in the July 1940 issue of American Forests. The article entitled "The C. C. C. and National Defense," is a splendid presentation of the part which the C. C. C. will play in our national defense.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Forests of July 1940]

THE C. C. C. AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

(By James J. McEntee)

The Civilian Conservation Corps has a new objective as it marches forward in its eighth year. It is national defense. Under the impact of chaotic world conditions threatening the security of the United States, the President and Congress have called upon the corps to take an active part in the prosecution of the huge new national-defense program.

For the present the corps' contribution will come largely through the training of young men in the maintenance and operation of automotive and mechanized equipment, in auto mechanics at central repair shops, in radio communications, and in other civilian activities useful in national defense. Through this program—largely an intensification of the C. C. C. training activities which have been under way for several years—the corps can provide thousands of men each year to aid industry and the Nation in the advancement of the national-defense program.

As fast as the needs of industry and the national-defense departments are made known, the corps will modify its present program to comply to the limit of its ability. If industry wants men with special mechanical training in either the automotive or aviation fields, the corps is prepared to train them. If the national-defense department wants specialists in such fields as communications and operation, maintenance and repair of mechanized or automotive equipment, the corps will train men in these fields. In short, it will be a huge reservoir of trained manpower upon which industry and the national-defense services can draw.

In advancing national-defense preparations the corps will continue and intensify its man-building activities. Since it was organized in April 1933, the corps has made men out of hundreds of thousands of undernourished, underdeveloped, and inexperienced youngsters. In addition to improving the muscular development and the health of young men, the corps has toughened them physically, taught them work skills, improved their morale, and taught them love and respect for their country and its Government. To date more than 2,000,000 young men have received such training. It has completed a huge amount of conservation work—work which increases the Nation's natural-resources assets. In addition, it is an operating institution. It has the equipment, the organization, the experience to succeed in any task asked of it.

At this time, so far as we can foresee now, the addition of national-defense tasks will not materially interfere with the advancement of the corps' conservation program. There are many fields in which for 7 years it has been contributing to national defense. It trains radiomen, mechanics, cooks, truck drivers, operators of tractors and heavy equipment, photographers, drafting clerks, and experts in the handling of explosives for construction work. It teaches men to build roads, stone, and wooden structures, to operate surveying instruments, to build bridges and dams and to do a host of other things of the type done by engineer troops in time of war. It teaches them sanitation, personal hygiene, and safety.

What of the corps' educational and training program? The corps today is providing practical job training for enrollees while they are at work. It provides an educational adviser, classrooms, shops, and instructors for all enrollees who wish to take advantage of their off-time to improve their education and develop skills.

The goal of every youth who enters the C. C. C. is a job. Our program is centered around the idea of making each youth capable of getting employment. The entire pattern of camp life is directed toward the end of helping the boy find a useful place in society where he can earn his own living. It can and should take advantage of its unusual opportunities to teach these youths how to work, with hand and brain, how to use tools and equipment available in the camps. It should teach them a sense of responsibility for doing good work, permanent, lasting work—and above all, it should teach them to do an honest day's work.

Those of us in charge of C. C. C. policy should be alert to keep our educational and training programs abreast of the times. In this critical period I feel the corps should emphasize its training especially with regard to mechanized units of all types. The corps affords unusual opportunities for training of this character because it operates daily the largest fleet of peacetime motorized units in the world—a fleet in excess of 40,000 units.

This great fleet, with its daily problems of operation, maintenance, and repair, presents a chance for practical training which the corps will use to the fullest advantage. The corps operates tractors, jackhammers, and other mechanical units. It utilizes tools of almost every description. Camp facilities for sanitation, lighting, and water offer additional training advantages.

The Civilian Conservation Corps also should continue to stress the development of physical hardihood, the inculcation of habits of orderliness, discipline, and personal hygiene, and good citizenship and love of country. The academic, vocational, and job-training features of camp life should be directed to turning out good Americans.

Should the C. C. C. be made permanent? My desk is piled high with requests from communities for location of camps. The work projects proposed in our fields, forests, wildlife refuges, and parks would keep the corps of the present size occupied for from 30 to 50 years. From another angle, each year sees another crop of youths reaching young manhood and a large percentage of them unable to find jobs, either because of employment lag or their own inexperience. Until such time as these youths can be absorbed in private industry, business, and agriculture, I believe there is justification for continuance of the C. C. C. I believe it should be made permanent.

In recent months some criticisms of corps expenditures have developed. While praising the corps as a whole, some critics have taken the position that the $1,000 a year which it costs to maintain a young man in the corps for 1 year is too high. In this connection the charge is usually made that too large a share of the $1,000 enrollee annual cost goes to civilian personnel. These attacks may be attributed largely to lack of knowledge of how C. C. C. funds are expended, a misapprehension of corps objectives and corps accomplishments or policies.

A break-down of this $1,000 a year enrollee cost figure shows that $790 is expended in the form of real wages for the enrollee and $209.91 for pay of civilians, supplies, and equipment. Of the $1,000 total, the enrollee allots home to dependents $264. If this sum is eliminated from the $1,000 item and charged against relief expenditures, the cost of maintaining a boy in the corps for 1 year, excepting relief charges, would be $736.

The real wages paid each enrollee, including his $30 a month cash allowance ($22 goes to his dependents) and all other items which he would receive if he were working for a private employer, is $790.09. It is broken down as follows:

Pay	$374.43
Subsistence	139.86
Clothing	60.00
Travel	32.41
Hospitalization	18.39
Limitation subtotal		$625.09

Shelter, including construction, rehabilitation, heat, light, water, and routine maintenance	$50.97
Laundry	5.16
Education	13.34
Welfare	.42
Burial expenses	.31
Subtotal		$70.20
Grand total		695.29
General supplies	1.95
Sanitary supplies	1.31
Soap, candles, matches, etc	1.20
Bedding, etc	3.30
Safety equipment, such as fire extinguishers, etc	1.13
Mess equipment	.31
Ambulances and trucks	8.37
Work equipment	31.48
Repairs to the above	38.80
Transportation of above	6.95
Subtotal		94.80
Total real wages		790.09

The following table shows how the $209.91 is utilized:

Pay of civilians	190.23
Travel of civilians	4.18
Passenger cars	2.79
Communications	1.97
Rents	2.09
Office supplies	.88
Office equipment	1.02
Repairs to equipment	.47
Transportation of above	1.09
Structures	1.96
Printing and binding	.75
Claims	.15
Miscellaneous	2.33
Total overhead costs	209.91

The above figures include the pay of the camp commander, the project superintendent who supervises the work program, the foremen who supervise directly the work projects, the educational adviser, the camp doctor, the camp chaplain—in short, the men who manage the camps, teach and train the enrollees, and look after the health and spiritual welfare of the enrollees.

These figures, based on 7 years' operation of the C. C. C. camps, represent the amounts which the Director, the War Department, the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture consider necessary for a proper carrying out of corps functions. Every cent being expended on the program is needed if our objectives are to be carried out efficiently. It is futile to try to determine whether C. C. C. costs are too high by simply dividing the average number of enrollees into the total appropriations for the year. The big determining factor is to be found in our record of accomplishments. Are we getting our money's worth in terms of trees planted, forests and parks improved, new recreational facilities developed, farms saved from erosion, floods checked? Are we getting value received in better citizens—citizens capable of earning their own living, interested in the welfare of their country and better qualified to aid in its defense? I am confident that on the basis of value received, the corps is much more than paying its way.

What about the corps' future work program? In what direction should its energies be directed to best advantage? Whatever suggestions I make in this connection, of course, are subject to modification by the national-defense program. The program, as outlined below, is given without reference to possible modifications which national defense considerations might entail.

In considering the corps' future program, it may be well to recall the original purpose and scope of the C. C. C., as set down by the President and in acts of the Congress. These were originally two-fold—unemployment relief and "restoration of the country's depleted resources," as stated in the original act of 1933. The President himself in his message of March 21, 1933, to the Congress stated: "I propose to create a Civilian Conservation Corps to be used in simple work, not interfering with normal employment, and confining itself to forestry, the prevention of soil erosion, flood control, and similar projects. * * * I call your attention to the fact that this type of work is of definite, practical value, not only through the prevention of great present financial loss, but also as a means of creating future national wealth."

The act of March 31, 1933, in its opening statement gives as one of the primary purposes of the E. C. W. "to provide for the restoration of the country's depleted natural resources * * * in connection with the forestation of lands belonging to the United States or to the several States which are suitable for timber production, the prevention of forest fires, floods, and soil erosion, plant pest and disease control, the construction, maintenance, or repair of paths, trails, and fire lanes in the national parks and national forests, and such other work on the public domain, national and State, and Government reservations * * *." The act goes on to authorize conservation work on county, municipal, and private lands but with certain definite restrictions.

The act of 1937 again emphasized conservation and sets up a three-fold program—"to provide employment, to provide vocational training, and to perform 'useful public work in connection with the conservation and development of the natural resources of the United States, its Territories, and insular possessions'." The 1937 act goes on to say "the employment of the corps * * * for the protection, restoration, regeneration, improvement, development, utilization, maintenance, or enjoyment of the natural resources of lands and waters, and the products thereof, including forests, fish, and wildlife * * * including the prevention and control of forest fires, forest tree pests and diseases, soil erosion, and floods."

This latter law established the basic principles under which the corps functions. On July 1, 1939, the C. C. C. became a unit of the Federal Security Agency. Later, that same year, Congress reaffirmed the act of June 28, 1937, and said: "The provisions of this act shall continue July 1, 1943."

In preparing corps work programs, it must be remembered that the new men who enter the corps each year are largely young, raw, untrained youths—unskilled, but malleable in the hands of competent camp officials, educational advisers, project superintendents, and foremen. The corps is constantly teaching new men how to work, for its best men are always leaving to take jobs for which their corps work has qualified them. The corps is one of the few institutions in the country which is constantly trying to get rid of its best men. The camps themselves are highly mobile. Built of portable units they can be moved quickly from location to location. Being virtually self-contained units, they can be set up practically anywhere, subject, of course, to health restrictions.

The corps is splendidly fitted for reforestation, erosion control, recreational development, and nearly any other kind of conservation work. In my judgment, the corps should not normally be used on big construction or engineering jobs usually handled by contract. As a rule the C. C. C. should not be used in cities or near large towns where there is a large surplus of unemployed adult laborers.

Naturally, requests have come to the Director's office from local groups, and oftentimes commercial bodies, for approval of a very wide variety of projects, some of them quite impracticable, many of them totally unsuited to C. C. C. labor, or totally outside the field of C. C. C., or even outside the field of conservation of natural resources. Extermination of ragweed throughout the United States, and the elimination of tent caterpillars are typical of such requests for approval.

I do not think the corps should undertake work projects entailing heavy annual maintenance costs except where ironclad agreements are made to make certain that the area developed will be maintained with non-Federal funds. No C. C. C. projects should be undertaken on State or private lands unless the agencies concerned agree to maintain the project after it is completed by the corps. The corps should not engage in too much maintenance work even on Federal lands. Other things being equal, preference should normally be given to projects which require little or no annual maintenance.

1. REFORESTATION

Since 1933, the corps has planted more than 2,000,000,000 young trees. This is a good beginning but an enormous tree-planting program remains to be done. The conservation experts figure there are some 138,000,000 treesless acres of barren or only partly stocked forest land, marginal and submarginal farm and pasture in this country which might well be producing some human benefits. Tree planting is a permanent investment for the future. Tree planting is popular, is sound, is badly needed, and the best part of it is that it requires little or no annual maintenance. C. C. C. enrollees can collect seed, prepare tree nurseries, grow the seedlings, and plant them out where needed—for they have been doing all these things for the past 7 years.

2. FOREST IMPROVEMENT

Much timber stand or forest improvement has been done, but there are hundreds of millions of acres of Federal and State land untouched.

The removal of decadent, crooked, diseased, and "weed" or worthless trees from existing forest stands is worth while and permanent improvement of the forest. The pruning of tree limbs would pay in future returns from quality trees. Not only the proper thinning of young forest stands but all this work leaves the forest in better condition than it was, insuring faster growth of better trees, and again—it requires no maintenance.

3. FOREST PROTECTION

It is a waste of time and money not to protect forests after they are planted or improved. Forests must be protected from fire, insects, and fungous diseases. The biggest single contribution the C. C. C. has made to conservation has been to forest protection in all of its phases. The function of the corps, however, should be as an emergency help, to do those things which the regular protective organizations cannot do. The C. C. C. contribution to forest protection has covered a wide field. Protective improvements perhaps have occupied the largest amount of enrollee time—fire lookout towers and cabins, telephone lines, and truck trails, fire hazard reduction, firebreaks, store houses, and guard cabins; while on fighting forest fires alone a total of more than 5,000,000 man-days has been spent. In addition, on millions of acres, the control of many different kinds of injurious forest insects and dangerous tree diseases has been secured. This protection work must be continued. However, a capital investment should be made only following agreement by the respective public and private owners to operate and maintain these protective facilities.

4. SOIL EROSION PREVENTION

The saving from total loss of millions of tons of our best farm soils has been aided greatly by the corps, largely through sample work on farms and demonstrations by the C. C. C. Not only has the corps helped materially in this soil saving, but the enrollees themselves have learned first-hand what conservation of the soil is, and how to conserve it, as well as much about farm-land management. This is most worth-while work, from more than one angle; it should be continued.

5. FLOOD CONTROL

The late Director went on record in January 1938 in an address before the Rivers and Harbors Conference as strongly favoring the use of the C. C. C. in upstream engineering as a part of the long-range national plan for flood control as projected by the Congress in 1936. At that time Mr. Fechner said, in part:

"There is a splendid field and a proper one for the Civilian Conservation Corps to engage in those types of upstream engineering which are a necessary part of the national problem of flood control. Small gullies in denuded mountains, bare treeless areas that need again a forest cover, the building of small ponds and reservoirs near the heads of the smaller tributaries of our great rivers—along with continued forest protection activities—would seem to me to be proper work for the corps. This is especially true when one considers the type of workers in the corps—young men full of interest and enthusiasm for the outdoors who can be well taken care of in camps located in isolated mountain areas, individual projects small in themselves but extremely important as a part of the whole problem. Such types of work cannot be contracted for and moreover would have little or no appeal to older, more seasoned workers."

6. WILDLIFE RESTORATION

The corps has already made a large contribution to American wildlife, if in no other way than by the development of many areas, hitherto unusable by wildlife, into suitable habitats, resting and breeding places for birds and migratory waterfowl, and in providing sanctuaries for game animals. They have done many other things, made game censuses, planted food shrubs and trees for game food, and improved many hundreds of streams, lakes, and ponds for better fish conditions, as well as built many lakes and ponds. All this is a worth-while contribution to America's wildlife resources and more needs to be done.

7. PUBLIC-RANGE DEVELOPMENT

Since April 1935 the corps has been assigning camps for the improvement and development of the public-range lands of the 11 Western States. There are 141,228,423 acres of such lands, much of which needs to be brought back to somewhat of its former carrying capacity for sheep and cattle, horses, goats, and forms of wildlife. Development of water, including reservoirs, spring developments, water holes, wells, and other watering places, building of drift fences, corrals, and stock appurtenances, stopping range erosion, and actual revegetation of depleted ranges are some of the work done.

These work projects in order to perfect control and use of the range areas are necessarily scattered because concentration of livestock would add to destructive conditions. While the C. C. C. camps may be said to be located in the "wide-open spaces," their establishment, administration, and maintenance has been satisfactory because of the splendid cooperation of all agencies.

This type of work is worth while and needs to be done. It could not be done by contract labor, and probably no other Federal agency is as well fitted to do it as the C. C. C.

8. OUTDOOR RECREATION

In the park and recreation field the C. C. C. has made its greatest contribution toward the conservation of both natural and human resources. An increase of 100 percent in State-park acreage alone since 1933 has resulted almost entirely from the encouragement to expansion taken by the States from the availability of C. C. C. manpower and funds for development purposes. Several States which had no State parks 7 years ago now have areas acquired under this stimulus and are actively cooperating in the Nation-wide program for coordinated recreational planning. Others have added to existing areas and brought new parks into their systems.

The C. C. C. has given protection to and developed recreational facilities in Federal, State, and local areas on a scale which would have been impossible under ordinary circumstances. In National, State, county, and metropolitan parks the corps, under technical supervision of the National Park Service, has carried out forest and soil conservation work, built sanitary and visitor accommodation facilities; constructed bridges, dams, and trails; and accomplished numerous jobs providing many essentials for wider and better use of these areas such as trail and historical markers, guardrails, parking areas, and bathing facilities.

Extensive recreational facilities have also been provided in National and State forests throughout the country.

In spite of the accomplishments to date, a big program in park work remains ahead for the C. C. C. The park, parkway, and recreational area study, authorized by Congress and now being conducted by the National Park Service cooperatively with other Federal agencies and the States, is mapping out the future recreational needs of the people of the United States. This study has found present facilities to be inadequate and calls for the provision of extensive additional areas and developments. Because of its experience and proved effectiveness, the C. C. C. will be looked to for continued assistance in this program for many years to come.

Conscription of Wealth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, in today's Washington Evening Star, Mr. Jay Franklin, in his column We, the People, has an article headed: "Conscription of wealth held necessary to successful defense program."

I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. I call the attention of the Members of the Senate to the fact that an amendment has been submitted to be printed, and is lying on the table, and will be offered at the proper time to the conscription bill, which provides for the conscription of wealth.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, does the amendment propose the conscription of all wealth by capital levy?

Mr. LEE. No; it provides for a series of forced loans.

Mr. TAFT. Are the persons who have to loan the money to be selected by lot in the same way that they are selected in the selective draft, or is everybody's property to be taken at once?

Mr. LEE. No; there would be a registration of property and income, and they would be classified in a classification similar to the income tax, and each person would be required to buy Government bonds to finance the defense program in proportion to his ability, as determined by his wealth and income, just as we require persons to pay taxes in proportion to their ability.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator propose to present that matter to the Senate while the bill now under consideration is pending?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

I renew my request to have the article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 13, 1940]

WE, THE PEOPLE—CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTH HELD NECESSARY TO SUCCESSFUL DEFENSE PROGRAM

(By Jay Franklin)

One element which has been lost sight of in the congressional debates on the national service bill is the vital matter of national morale.

The conscription bill, as now reported, is too narrow and too half-hearted a measure to arouse the national spirit of the American people. It is viewed with suspicion by liberals, by labor, and by young people, as an undemocratic measure to conscript the "have-nots" for the defense of the "haves" and as a means to outflank the social reforms of the New Deal and hence to weaken the national unity.

It may sound strange, but it is a fact that the same people who boggle at the idea of drafting a million young men a year into the Army warm up to the far more drastic idea of total defense.

The theory of total defense is something new in our national life. Its chief selling point at the moment is that it promises to eliminate slackers on the one hand and profiteers on the other. With private industry whittling away the safeguards against profiteering in the manufacture of munitions and with labor generally opposed to the draft, this argument is one which has great appeal.

DANGER OF PROFIT MOTIVE

The advocates of total defense make their stand on the unassailable principle that defense is the concern of everyone and cannot be entrusted to volunteers in either industry or the armed forces. They believe in a registration and conscription—as needed—of every man and woman between the ages of 18 and 65. They believe that the American people as a whole would welcome this plan to utilize and coordinate all their energies, rather than to delegate the job solely to a group of youngsters between the ages of 21 and 31. They believe that total registration would be effective in preventing the use of a purely military conscription to break down living standards and enhance social insecurity.

They also feel that a draft on the people should be accompanied by the conscription of industry, communications and capital. Such a draft would tend to diminish the ugly spectacle of industries refusing to aid national defense unless bribed to do so and of property using the national emergency to enhance its power over the country's future.

The advocates of total defense argue that the experience of both France and England show that the profit motive can be exceedingly dangerous in time of crisis and that the delays of private industry which flow out of consideration of profits and taxes constitute the chief obstacle to effective defense in an age of split-second timing and streamlined offensives.

DOCTRINE OF UNITY

In other words, total defense is a doctrine of national unity which offers quick and willing results. Without this unity, we see business urging conscription of manpower but shying away from conscription of horsepower; and we see labor urging the nationalization of industry and the conscription of profits through excess-profits taxes, while it insists that the people of this country shall not be coerced into the national service.

Disunion and mutual recrimination belong of necessity to anything less than a national-defense program which goes the whole hog and worries no more over the fate of the individual business concern than it does over the fate of the individual man in uniform. A machine gun recognizes no distinction between the businessman and his employe, and a dive bomber is as apt to hit a tenement house as a factory.

All of these measures—including military conscription—are merely tools or weapons to help us fight effectively. They offer no guarantee of victory. But if there is one lesson of military history it is this: That the side with the newer weapons defeats the side with the obsolete weapons; that courage is no substitute for tanks or planes, and that tanks and planes are no defense against treachery, folly, or demoralization behind the lines.

Many observers of the latest dogfight on Capitol Hill believe that the time has come when the President, regardless of the effect on the elections, must come out boldly in favor of total defense as was foreshadowed in the Democratic platform, or else America will stumble and blunder into the same tragic procession of those nations whose watchword was "too little and too late" instead of "too much and too soon."

Colonel Lindbergh's Chicago Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL BY RALPH INGERSOLL

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Ralph Ingersoll, published in PM, of the issue of August 6, 1940, relative to the recent address delivered by Colonel Lindbergh in Chicago.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New York PM of August 6, 1940]

DENOUNCING LINDBERGH

I say very simply that Colonel Lindbergh in his speech in Chicago Sunday identified himself as spokesman No. 1 for the "fifth column." The "fifth column," in America, as in Madrid, is a group who love their country's enemies and who first argue and then fight for them. The Fascist states, as General Pershing said, have "sworn to destroy the American idea." Germany under Hitler is thoroughly identified as the archenemy of democracy, and as such is the archenemy of the archdemocracy, the United States of America. On Sunday Colonel Lindbergh first tried to frighten the people of the United States by saying "A war between us (the United States and Germany) could easily last for generations and bring all civilization tumbling * * *," then counseled "cooperation" * * * "never impossible when there is sufficient gain on both sides."

These are "fifth-column" statements, naked and unashamed. They are preachment of the inevitability of German conquest, defeatism—followed by the suggestion that if we deal reasonably with the conqueror, he will deal reasonably with us. These are the things "fifth columnists"—friends of their country's enemies—have been saying for years now—in Austria, in Czechoslovakia, in Norway, in France.

Not all the slick Goebbels-like reasonableness of Lindbergh's windup will wipe these things out, neither his argument that European affairs are too messy anyway, nor his sly appeal to social consciousness with his Chinese proverbs about the rich being too rich and the poor being too poor. Goebbels' genius has always been that he wrapped his poison in sweet reasonableness—the same sweet reasonableness that took Chamberlain in and led to Munich.

Lindbergh is a political novice. His speech was postgraduate work. Obviously, he was helped in writing it. Who are the people who did his thinking and helped in his writing? Who are his gang?

Some weeks ago I wrote in this newspaper that the reasoning of the appeaser argues that the mayor of a city should cooperate with the gangster if the latter gets big enough and tough enough and seems here to stay.

This is the reasoning in Colonel Lindbergh's speech, whatever group prepared it for him. This is the way Fascist "fifth columnists" work.

I denounce Col. Charles A. Lindbergh as the spokesman of the Fascist "fifth column" in America.

RALPH INGERSOLL.

The Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY COL. ANSON T. McCOOK

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the July number of the American Legion magazine under the title "Above All, the Constitution," written by Col. Anson T. McCook, of Hartford, Conn. I believe a McCook has taken his part in every war in which our Nation has been engaged—always leaders in their respective fields of education, medicine, and the law. Connecticut's "fighting McCooks" have been steadfast in their loyalty to and attachment for those fundamentals of the Constitution which have ever been dear to the hearts of American patriots. An eminent lawyer and a veteran officer of the American Expeditionary Force, it is singularly appropriate that Colonel McCook has been asked to write the first of a series of articles dealing with the principles set forth in the preamble to the constitution of the American Legion. I commend his paper to the notice of Senators.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Legion Magazine of July 1940]

ABOVE ALL, THE CONSTITUTION—"TO UPHOLD AND DEFEND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

(By Anson T. McCook)

There is nothing flabby about the American Legion or its constitution. Both are active and vigorous. The very first mandate of the preamble calls for something positive—"to uphold and defend."

But why give first importance to the Constitution of the United States? Why should it need defending? Let's see:

In three great nations one man can create war for all the people, at any time, for any cause, for no cause at all. One man, Hitler, said the word—and German bombs rained on Polish cities and villages, then on Norway, then on Holland and Belgium. One man, Mussolini, ordered the invasion of Abyssinia and Albania, and it was done. One man, Stalin, decided to attack Finland, and Soviet troops began their march. In each case, just one man's word—and all his people followed automatically along the path of blood and destruction, powerless to prevent. Powerless, because without realizing it they had permitted a centralized government to gain control over the press, the radio, their courts, their liberties. They no longer had a living constitution such as ours to protect their right to listen and to speak; and so, being in ignorance of the facts, they had lost the power to think or act for themselves.

The builders of our Constitution refused to entrust such awful power to any one man, no matter who he might be. They placed it instead in the hands of many, permitting war to be declared only by Congress—by men of our own frequent choosing, directly responsible to the people. In defending the Constitution, therefore, we defend our peace.

Everyone is talking about the coming Presidential and congressional elections, freely and without fear. If we lived in a country where the people had abandoned their constitution, there would be only one party, one set of candidates, one voice, one vote—and the secret service would do the rest. Here, the Constitution protects us in our free choice of candidates; then protects them in doing their duty; and finally, protects us against them if they violate their duy. It protects us all alike, the majority and the minority.

But to say that the Constitution protects us is only partly true. It is our fortress; but like any fortress it can defend us only while we defend it. Recognizing this, our Presidents, beginning with George Washington, have been sworn to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." Indeed, they are forbidden to take office without that oath, for the Constitution is ours. It belongs to each one of us; and any official, any citizen, who seeks either to override it or to evade it is attacking you and me in our most precious right.

The Constitution is not a dried-up document, but living and up to date. As its opening words tell us, "We the people" created it. Its obligations and its benefits run to each one of us. It is not rigid, but strong and elastic to fit present and future needs. Being the people's, it has been amended by us whenever there was need; but, being the people's, it can be altered only in accordance with its terms. Anything else is tyranny.

Who prepared it? Liberals and conservatives, farmers, lawyers, scientists, most of them young men, all sincere believers in the people. These men had the courage and the wisdom to start the Nation forward on its road of liberty and opportunity with only sufficient traffic regulations to make the people's control more effective and more permanent. In a wonderful preamble of 31 simple words they stated its objects. Read that preamble, then read again the Legion preamble.

Our constitutional form of government is the most powerful engine in the world, set on three points of balance. It is effective only while that balance is maintained between Congress, President, and courts—none more important than the other, each one vital to the engine's functioning. The Bill of Rights, two pages long, is packed with things that seem as common as the air we breathe, and yet are as essential to our happiness as air to life: Freedom to speak and meet and worship God; a fair trial, even against the state itself; the right to live in one's home without search or molestation; all powers not vested in the Federal Government to remain the people's and the States.'

Across the water, the people of the dictatorship nations bartered away their constitutions for glittering promises of greater comfort. Today, they are paying for that comfort, if it be comfort, in regimentation and war—a dreadful price indeed. This is what Abraham Lincoln had in mind when he insisted that if government was to remain for the people, it must also be of and by the people.

Our country has been the happiest on earth. But these good things can be lost by us. They cannot stand except through our own backbone and watchfulness. The dangers from without are serious, but there can also be political Trojan horses and borings from within. What comes silently or smilingly is always more dangerous than open attack.

Modern Germany and ancient Rome both were once democracies. In both, democracy committed suicide. Nor are we immune in these United States. The test is, Do we care enough to sacrifice our time and strength to fight the fires of internal disunion and dictatorship while they are yet small, to prepare against attack from without? It takes vigilance and it takes courage to preserve our peace and our liberties. By upholding and defending the Constitution we protect all that we hold dear. No task is more worth while.

Delay in Airplane Orders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM CINCINNATI TIMES-STAR

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial, published in the Cincinnati Times-Star of Monday, August 12, 1940, commenting on the delay in securing airplanes for the Army.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star of August 12, 1940]

WHY 33 PLANES ARE ON ORDER

In June Congress appropriated $4000,000,000 for the purchase of 4,000 war planes needed by the Army. To date, according to War Secretary Stimson, the Army has been able to sign contracts for exactly 33 planes.

Stimson puts the blame for this disgraceful performance upon the failure of Congress to grant tax lenience to concerns which must expand their plants to manufacture the new planes. He did not say that the blame for that failure lies squarely on the doorstep of the White House.

The gigantic plane-building program required by national defense calls for a gigantic expansion of plant. That expansion involves a huge risk on the part of the manufacturers. Should the emergency abruptly cease, they would be left with a mass of useless factories on their hands. Yet, under existing tax laws, they could get credit for amortizing their new plant investment only over a long period of years.

Months ago the suggestion was made that the amortization rules of the tax law be amended to permit full deduction of the cost of plant expansion over a 5-year period. That seemed reasonable to most officials in Washington, including Secretary Morgenthau. But it did not satisfy President Roosevelt. He would permit no change in the amortization rules unless at the same time a new excess-profits tax was enacted.

Now, the principle of excess-profits taxation at a time like the present is perfectly sound. We had a heavy excess-profits tax during the last war and we will assuredly have one to cover the present period of enormous military expenditures. The trouble with the President's scheme is that adopting such a tax requires an extensive revision of the tax structure. That takes time, whereas the war planes must be built with the greatest possible speed. To make the amortization change wait upon passage of an excess-profits tax is to delay the plane program for months.

That is exactly what has happened. While Congress wrestles with revision of the tax structure, the airplane plants are not being expanded and the planes are not being turned out for the defense of America. The national defense must wait while Mr. Roosevelt indulges his bent for socialistic ideas. The Army must fret anxiously because the President is afraid to offend his left-wing supporters by seeming to grant a favor to "big business." The supposed political interests of Mr. Roosevelt come first. Defense comes second.

Defense Housing

OF

HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over the network of the Mutual Broadcasting System, station WOL, August 12, 1940:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, I am going to discuss with you tonight a phase of the national-defense program which, although vital and of primary importance, is temporarily at least, obscured from the plans which are being formulated and expedited for the defense of our Nation.

I refer to the subject of adequate housing for the employees of our defense industries. Housing that is modern, clean, and sanitary, and which may be obtained at rentals commensurate with their incomes by the thousands of workers and their families who have flocked to industrial centers and who will continue to migrate in increased numbers as our tremendous industrial defense program goes into high gear. The communities cannot hope to cope with this burden. Thousands of workers streaming into their cities each week must be supplied with shelter if they are to stay, yet, in most instances, housing for those already employed is limited. Private industry is eager to do its share in meeting this problem, but uncertainty as to the duration of the emergency makes it impossible for them to assume the entire risk involved. The cities themselves are not financially able to supply even the temporary housing which these workers require. It, therefore, devolves on the Federal Government to assume the responsibility of providing adequate housing for those who are being employed in the key industrial centers, fabricating the materials and implements for defense.

This subject on its face may seem remote and undramatic, but I am convinced that the degree of success of our entire defense program will depend to a large extent upon its early and satisfactory solution.

If we plunge ahead, developing defense industries with no regard for where the people who work in those industries are to live, then we may expect to run into the same bottlenecks, and experience the same gigantic waste as in 1917.

In 1917 we were totally unprepared to cope with the housing emergency with which we were confronted. Today we are prepared to meet that problem squarely and to solve it before it imperils our whole defense structure. I say that we are prepared, but only if we as a nation begin by recognizing the basic importance of decent housing, in times of emergency as well as in times of world-wide stability and peace.

Three years ago, after decades of debate, the United States Housing Authority was established with the basic purpose of beginning the long fight to wipe out the slum blight in the United States. In that brief period the accomplishments of the United States Housing Authority have been many. The United States Housing Act of 1937, under which it operates, provided, and I think wisely, for the complete decentralization of the public housing program. It was the purpose of the Authority to act as consultants on technical problems and as the lending agency. Local authorities have been established under State laws in some 500 major cities, large and small, in this country. Thus, the decision of initiating local housing projects has been properly reposed in the local housing authorities, who are best qualified to pass on their housing requirements. They, as vital component parts of local government, comprise a technical staff for public housing never before equaled in any country on earth. We have, therefore, the machinery to provide housing in connection with defense.

In view of the fact that we are equipped to do this job, it is only logical that you should ask, Why not proceed? It springs from the fact that certain groups, and certain men, both in and out of Congress are making it their job to block public housing, to impede slum clearance, to hinder the work of the United States Housing Authority. Judging from the continuous postponement of congressional action, their efforts have met with a dangerous degree of success. The motives of those opposed to slum clearance are too well known to merit extended comment. Slums, that breed misery, disease, and crime, unfortunately pay dollars and cents dividends to slum owners, although their public cost in terms of health, fire, and police expense runs into countless millions annually.

Immediately following the last World War Great Britain recognized its slum problems and set about to correct them. At the beginning of the present conflict in Europe England had cause to be thankful for its comprehensive housing program. The Minister of Health has reported that in 1917 36 percent of the men examined for military service were of full normal standard of health. At the beginning of the present war 83 percent of those examined met that high test. Authorities in Great Britain claim that the major factor in this almost unbelievable improvement in national health was the fact that a great majority of those in the lowest income groups were provided with decent, sanitary housing and healthful, wholesome environments. That job was accomplished through much the same plan that we have developed. That experience, those cold statistics, prove the fallacy of the often repeated statement that people make the slums. It is the slum that molds and warps and destroys the man. Great Britain found that the home—the home of the lowest wage earner—was the very foundation of the defense of her Empire.

Today, America is in the midst of a gigantic national defense program. Billions have been appropriated for preparedness purposes. Airplanes, tanks, guns, battleships—but we have been slow to recognize that adequate housing is just as essential to the success and speedy completion of our defense program as are munitions.

In more than 150 key cities, wherein are located the plants of industries vital to our defense program, already there has developed a serious housing shortage.

In New England alone, and I stress New England because that is my section of the country, and I am familiar with existing conditions there—there are 12 cities that are desperately in need of housing.

In Newport, R. I., where a large naval station and torpedo plant are located, it is estimated that 1,800 additional homes are needed.

In Quincy, Mass., the home of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, there is imperative need of 2,000 homes.

In Pawtucket, R. I., more than 500 homes are required to meet the demands of increased employment in industrial plants in that section.

Other examples of acute housing shortages are Bath, Maine, where 500 new homes are needed for employees of the Bath Iron Works; Bridgeport, Conn., 400 homes; Hartford, Conn., 1,000—and these figures represent the shortage as it already exists. Other New England cities, with which I am acquainted, requesting assistance in meeting a housing crisis are: Portsmouth, N. H., and New London and New Britain, Conn. And I know that these conditions can be multiplied by the number of cities throughout the country where defense industries are shifting into high gear.

Let us for a moment look backward. The report of the United States Housing Corporation which was given the job of providing housing in 1917 and 1918 proves that housing was the bottleneck in the production program. One airplane factory in New Jersey at that time reported a labor turn-over of 360 percent a month. Some manufacturers reported a slow-down in production of as much as 30 percent because of the lack of adequate housing for workers.

In 1917 a reporter for a Bridgeport, Conn., paper wrote of the housing problem created in that city by an influx of war orders:

"A tremendously difficult situation was created in Bridgeport when munition-making suddenly increased its population 40 percent. Speculators gobbled up all available land; the price of building materials rose 25 to 30 percent; rents jumped 20 to 100 percent."

Reports from the same city in those days indicate that the Bridgeport pay roll increased at the rate of $500,000 per week and high rents absorbed fully a quarter of that amount. The city was overcrowded, beds were slept in the clock around. They were rented in shifts. That kind of a situation needs no elaboration.

Today, 23 years later, Bridgeport finds itself in the same housing predicament. The New York Post for August 7, 1940, reports that the "manufacturers (in Bridgeport) can't go gunning for orders because they know there is no housing here for incoming workers." The same condition is true in cities in my State, and certainly it is in many others where basic industries are located.

These situations must be met by direct action. The United States Housing Authority is the one Federal agency equipped to do the housing job. It has the technical staff, it has close working relationships with local authorities throughout the United States. When the emergency is over, it has the facilities for disposing of the new homes and putting them to a public use in connection with the slum clearance program.

The cost of the public housing program, if done thoroughly, will represent the smallest major item in our whole defense program.

The World War caught us totally unprepared to meet this problem. At that time, we had no organization capable of doing a first-rate housing job. The Government had no facts, no experience, and no tools. All that is different today.

The defense job ahead of us is staggering. Our approach to it must be realistic. We must meet each problem with a will to solve it. We must take first things first. Defense will collapse if our industrial workers are not properly housed. That is item No. 1.

S. 591, a bill which passed the Senate more than a year ago and which would continue the work of the United States Housing Authority, has been pending before the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives for many weeks.

The Democratic Party, at its national convention, has committed itself to a continuation of this housing program. I quote the plank:

"We have launched a soundly conceived plan of loans and contributions to rid America of overcrowded slum dwellings that breed disease and crime and to replace them by low-cost housing projects within the means of low-income families.

"We will extend and acccelerate this plan not only in the congested city districts but also in the small town and farm areas, and we will make it a powerful arm of national defense by supplying housing for the families of enlisted personnel and for workers in areas where industry is expanding to meet defense needs."

Thus, the Democratic Party has pledged itself to continue the work of the United States Housing Authority. This is a mandate binding the majority party of Congress and undeniably represents the will of the American people.

It must seem inconceivable that a small group of Members of the House of Representatives is able to defeat that mandate. However, that is the situation because the Rules Committee virtually controls the machinery by which legislation is brought to the floor of the House of Representatives.

It is my earnest hope, and I think I reflect your views, that within a short period this log jam will be broken and the House Rules Committee, in view of the critical situation, will report a rule under which this necessary legislation may be considered promptly.

Connecticut Home Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, on August 6, 1940, the President called on the Governors of the various States to organize a home defense force to take the place of members of the National Guard, if and when the National Guard is called into Federal service.

It is a matter of record that Gov. Raymond E. Baldwin, of the State of Connecticut, issued an order 3 months ago for a home-defense force such as that now suggested by the President. Such a force has been organized in Connecticut and part of it is now undergoing a period of field training. The nucleus of this force, as provided for in the Connecticut statute, is the historic Governor's foot guard. This force was recruited largely through the efforts of local posts of the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars. The State asked for 2,500 citizens to volunteer for this service and that quota has been exceeded. Of this 2,500 volunteers, approximately 2,000 are veterans of the World War.

The spirit with which this large number of men responded to the call of Governor Baldwin proves—if any proof is necessary—that American citizens are as willing as ever to respond to a call for service to either State or Nation in time of emergency if only the call clearly states the type of service needed and the nature of the emergency which exists.

I have been proud of the accomplishments of Governor Baldwin, but never more proud than I have been at the way he has organized the resources of the State of Connecticut in preparation for any emergency which might arise as a result of the war now going on in Europe.

In my office I have a complete set of the orders issued by the Governor and the adjutant general of Connecticut, as well as an outline of the qualifications necessary to serve in the home guard. There is also an outline of the training program now going on, company records, and all other pertinent information.

I would be happy to make this material available to any Member of the House who would like to go over this material.

The Third-Term Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS R. BALL

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. THOMAS R. BALL, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me to the Republicans of Tolland County at Columbia, Conn., on July 25:

It makes me very happy to be here tonight in the heart of Tolland County, and it seems very appropriate that we should meet in this historic community whose loyal citizens, when met to pick an appropriate name for their township, chose one that is the very symbol of our Nation. "Hail Columbia, Happy Land!"

We are fast approaching one of the most important periods in our life as a Nation. The next few months will demonstrate the loyalty of Americans to the American way of life. Our country is faced with a threat to its constitutional form of government by a small group of its citizens who are bent on their own perpetuation in power.

On the horizon are gathering the dark clouds of war with ominous intensity. Wherever we look across the sea we see death, destruction, and devastation. Within a few months we have seen great nations wiped out, great peoples in despair. We ourselves have been led to the very brink of war, and we are not prepared for war. Surely the situation is serious. For that reason we must be brave. We must forget the little troubles in our determination to conquer the forces of evil that have been unloosed in a wild world.

The tremendous responsibility that rests on those in high places makes it imperative that we, the people, choose wisely and well our leaders in the trying days to come.

You have, in the past 7 years, had ample opportunity to study the workings of the New Deal. Some of the objectives of the Roosevelt administration were worthy. Some of its followers were honest men, eager to better conditions, and anxious to alleviate suffering—but there is a record of 7 years of spendthrift splurging at your expense, of experiments that failed, of attempts to change our form of government, of flirtations with radicalism which led to the presence of known Communists in important Government jobs, of fine words and falsehoods—and now, the man who for 7 long years has set himself up as the champion of democracy, has deliberately, with sly cunning, induced a great convention to permit him to break a fundamental tradition of the American people, that no man should serve as President for more than two terms. This heritage from Washington was reaffirmed by Jefferson, the author of our Declaration of Independence. It has been respected by public men in both political parties, only to be set aside by a man who believes that he, and he alone, is indispensable; that in a nation of a hundred and thirty million souls, he is the only man fit to rule, and rule is what he seeks to do.

It is up to you people, good Americans all of you, to get out and work, work as you have never worked before. The Republican Party has chosen a leader who has received the spontaneous and enthusiastic acclaim of millions. He is a big man, big physically, big mentally. He is kindly, sane, sensible, keenly aware of the awfulness of the task before him, upright in his loyalty and devotion. This man is humble in spirit. This man asks your help, he needs it. You and I, and everyone else who believes in the American way of life, must get behind Wendell Willkie and put him in the White House.

These times are different. The issues before us are unlike anything we have approached in the past. The situation throughout the world is such that the leadership of this Nation must not be made a political plaything. In the development of the tremendous program of national defense there must be no incompetence. We cannot tolerate the presence in positions of primary importance of those who, picked for personal political loyalty, have demonstrated their incapacity to deal with the problems of labor and industry. This is no time for dalliance. The future of America is at stake. If you are to preserve the type of government set up by your forefathers, if you are to insure the protection of your country from foreign aggression, if you are to keep an almost bankrupt Nation from inflation of its currency and repudiation of its national debt, you must get busy now.

The past 7 years have seen the Government moving further away from the people. A strongly intrenched bureaucracy has tried again and again to dictate from Washington what you should and should not do, forgetting in its mad rush for power that all power is derived from the people and that only such rights belong to the Federal Government as have been relinquished to it by the several sovereign States. Within a fortnight we have seen set up in what was our sister republic, France, a government on the imperial pattern. It can happen here, but it won't happen if America wakes up.

Many have been lulled into slumber with Federal funds dispensed with generous indulgence. They have forgotten that the right way, the healthy way, the American way, is for the small unit of government to raise the revenue, pay its just bills, and live within its income. Our Connecticut way of doing things is simple. A great man has said of our town meetings: "They are both the school and the pattern of democracy." Here our officials are truly public servants. They are close to the people, conscious of their needs, their troubles, their hopes, and their fears.

You people here assembled are typical of other groups meeting in all parts of this great country. You have watched the performances of the present administration. You have an understanding of what the New Deal has meant. You see now that, after 7 years of it, poverty and unemployment still exist, the debt limit set for our country has been passed and a new high determined. New troubles seem imminent.

Because of the mad fury that has been unleashed across the water, we have been forced into a position where we must become a military nation, perhaps temporarily, probably for many years to come. You and groups like you elsewhere are loyal patriots, willing to undergo hardship and privation to preserve your country from foreign foe, but you demand that your sacrifice shall not be made in vain. You demand that the development of a great military machine shall not mean servitude, but freedom.

It is in this spirit that you are marching forth to battle in this campaign, and through it you will win and the American way be once more reestablished in our land firmly and for all time.

Poll-Tax Meddling?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, the other morning the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], in his extension of remarks, objected to what he called interference in another man's district when I announced the placing on the Speaker's desk of a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of my anti-poll-tax bill.

"IT MAKES A DIFFERENCE WHOSE OX IS BEING GORED"

I would like to state that no man in this House has taken more time of the House or more space in the RECORD than has the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] on affairs concerning other sections of the Nation other than his own. He has interested himself in the power rates of practically all the 435 districts in the United States. It is a little difficult for me to see why he deems it proper for him to be concerned with the power rates in every State and improper for me to be concerned in these perilous days about the right to vote of the citizens of the Nation. Yes; it seems to make a "difference whose ox is being gored."

Of one thing I am sure. The three and one-half million Negroes and the 7,000,000 whites of the eight poll-tax States will never be free from political bondage until some force outside those States comes to their relief. The provisions of the requirements of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting are firmly imbedded in the Constitutions of the poll-tax States, and we cannot expect those people to liberate themselves when they do not have the vote with which to do it. We cannot expect them to lift themselves by their own boot straps when they have not the boot straps with which to lift themselves.

I have introduced the anti-poll-tax bill at the request of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, an organization composed wholly of southern people. The president of this organization is Dr. Frank Graham, president of the University of North Carolina. Other organizations supporting the anti-poll-tax bill include American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Young Women's Christian Association, Descendants of the American Revolution, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, railway brotherhoods, and other labor, civic, and progressive associations.

Surely the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], whose patriotism and love of humanity no man can doubt, is not taking the position of supporting a system in this American democracy of ours which denies a vast number of otherwise qualified people the right to exercise their American privilege of casting a ballot.

The amount of the poll tax in Mississippi is $2 per year, with counties permitted to levy an additional $1. A tax of $2 or $3 per year for each voting member of the family in those depressed sections of the Nation is more than those people are able to pay. And that is not the whole story. The tax is cumulative. That is, back taxes must be paid before the individual is allowed to vote. This sometimes boosts the poll tax to a considerable sum.

A LOOK AT THE RECORD

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] would have us believe that it is because of the one-party system in operation in his State and not because of the poll tax that people do not come out to vote. Of course, if we had democracy in the South we would not have the one-party system. He states that it is the primary election that counts and not the general election; that the general election vote is light, giving one the impression that the primary election brings to the polls a vast number of people.

Let us look at the record. In the testimony taken before the subcommittee of the Judiciary which held hearings on the anti-poll-tax bill, figures were presented to show that in the 1934 primaries the total primary vote cast in district No. 1, the district of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], was 22,140. This in a district with a population of 241,605, according to the 1930 census. That is 9.16 percent of the total population. This pales to insignificance when we know that the percentage of the population voting in districts in the 40 tax-free States that year was 31.24 percent—9 percent as against 31 percent.

Further testimony given at the hearings shows that Mississippi District No. 1 in its 1936 primary cast 24,100 votes. This is 9.99 percent of its population, while the average for the 40 tax-free States in that important 1936 election was 41.3 percent—10 percent as against 41 percent. In other words, the district of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] in its primaries polls about one-third to one-fourth of what non-poll-tax districts generally poll.

SOUTHERN CONGRESSMEN CAN BENEFIT

I want it definitely understood that in my endeavors to bring democracy to those places where it is denied, I am making no personal attack upon my colleagues in the House. I am sure, that should this vast group of people be given the right of franchise, that my colleagues from the South are sufficiently politically astute that they will govern their actions and their votes in this Congress in such a way as not to suffer because of the broadening of the democratic processes.

I urge that all Members get a copy of the hearings on the anti-poll-tax bill after which I am sure we will all see the good of signing the anti-poll-tax discharge petition, No. 34.

The National Catholic Welfare Conference Opposes Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

LETTER AND STATEMENT OF RT. REV. MSGR. MICHAEL J. READY

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I favor an adequate national defense under a voluntary system of military service. I am opposed to compulsory military service in time of peace, which is a part of the New Deal plan to establish a dictatorship in the United States. Compulsory military service in a democracy in time of peace is indefensible, particularly when it has not been demonstrated that the voluntary system of military service has failed.

If human beings are to be conscripted in time of peace to prepare for war and fight future wars, then it is only reasonable that wealth should be conscripted according to ability to pay in order to finance the cost of the preparation and the fighting.

If such conscription of wealth is enacted into law there will be very little danger of the United States getting into war, as most of our multimillionaire compulsory military service advocates, war propagandists, interventionists, and warmongers will stop fomenting wars.

Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House I incorporate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point a letter of July 31, 1940, which was sent to the Members of Congress by the Right Reverend Monsignor Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and the enclosed statement which he made before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives on July 30, 1940, in opposition to the compulsory military service bill H. R. 10132.

[National Catholic Welfare Conference. Most Rev. Samuel A. Stritch, D. D., chairman, administrative board; Right Rev. Msgr. Michael J. Ready, general secretary; Rev. Howard J. Carroll, S. T. D., assistant general secretary. National headquarters, 1312 Massachusetts Avenue NW.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 31, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am pleased to send you herewith copy of the statement presented July 30, to the House Committee on Military Affairs, regarding H. R. 10132 (Selective Training and Service Act of 1940). This statement was made by direction of the administrative board of archbishops and bishops, National Catholic Welfare Conference, acting pursuant to the resolution passed at the general meeting of bishops, on November 16, 1939, in its session at the Catholic University, Washington.

With sentiments of esteem and good wishes, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

MICHAEL J. READY,
General Secretary.

[Statement of the Right Reverend Monsignor Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, before the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States House of Representatives on H. R. 10132, July 30, 1940]

SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT OF 1940

I appear before this committee by direction of the archbishops and bishops of the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. The administrative board, consisting of 16 archbishops and bishops, is elected annually by the general meeting of the bishops of the United States to serve the national interests of the church, and in this particular and present action it is obeying a resolution of the general meeting adopted November 16, 1939, in its session at the Catholic University, Washington.

I have the honor to present to this Military Affairs Committee of the House a statement of general attitude toward the bill under consideration written by the board of bishops at a meeting in Chicago, July 4, 1940:

"The Catholic Church is committed by its very nature to the promulgation of the gospel of peace and to the elimination from human society of the causes of war. The ideal of the church is the 'Peace of Christ in the Kingdom of Christ.' Again and again in these latter days the present supreme pontiff has reminded the world of this ideal, and even as his predecessors before him, has striven with all the means at his disposal to preserve the world from the horrors of armed conflict. For this he has won the admiration of religious men and women of all creeds. Inspired by his leadership, Catholics in our own country have endeavored to promote international peace and have worked and prayed, and continue to work and pray, that God may avert from this favored land the disasters of war.

"It seems that tragic circumstances of the present hour are demanding that we invoke the law of self-protection for our national security. Regretfully Christians are obliged to realize that adequate national defense demands the training of large numbers of our citizens in the arts of warfare. It is imperative that the extent of the emergency and the consequent need for action should be generally realized. On the other hand, in the interests of sound procedure, it should not be overstated. Because of the character of the times, any program promoted by any group, be it militarist, isolationist, or interventionist, should be subjected to critical appraisal and cool, sound judgment.

"The American way of life has developed certain definite democratic ideals. No emergency should be allowed to destroy the values that are of the very essence of liberty as we know it in America. Consequently, no plan for the national defense should do unnecessary violence to the religious and educational traditions upon which our democracy is founded and apart from which it will not continue to flourish."

Because of the serious damage this bill would cause to the religious, educational, and charitable institutions of the church, and consequently to our whole civil society, the bishops are opposed to provisions in this bill which include, for compulsory military service, students for the priesthood and brothers under vow to serve the works of religion.

H. R. 10132 is a bill which proposes "To protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service."

The bill declares that "the integrity and institutions of the United States are gravely threatened and that to insure the independence and freedom of the people of the United States, it is imperative that immediate measures be taken to mobilize the Nation's strength."

Specifically, the bill proposes to mobilize the Nation's manpower so that "every able-bodied man shall fit into his proper place under a fair system of selective compulsory military training and service."

The bill does not define or state what are the dangers which gravely threaten the integrity and institutions of our country in a manner that calls for the mobilization of all the men of the Nation.

That the integrity and the institutions of the United States face possible dangers today, because of a war ravaging most of Europe, is apparent. That these dangers justify national preparedness for defense on the scale contemplated in the bill under consideration is not supported by any evidence.

The bill seems to propose compulsory military service as a permanent national policy "whether a state of war exists or not" (sec. 4).

The bill does not contemplate an emergency which might justify total mobilization. It would provide a long-range defense program as a national policy.

Dangers to national integrity and institutions are not all external; many are internal, relating to national unity, to respect for national institutions, to morale, to those virtues civic and moral which are fountains of strength and courage enabling men to sacrifice when sacrifice is required. No national-defense policy would be adequate that neglected the agencies by which these virtues are fostered and promoted.

Chief among these agencies are the churches with their charitable and educational as well as their distinctly religious activities.

We believe that the interests of our country would have been served better if this proposed legislation had originated in Congress. Certainly, Congress would have supported, not to say protected, the basic interests of religion.

There is at present a high-pressure propaganda for this bill emanating from the military professionals. This propaganda is designed to convince the American people that war is inevitable and that the time to prepare for that war is very short. If the measure of defense contemplated in this conscription bill is forecast accurately, then those who will be called to give their lives for the defense of our country should know the facts.

Military conscription is a matter of supreme importance to our present citizens and to future generations. This legislation is too important to be rushed through Congress until all other possible programs have been examined. The military professionals would convince us that necessary forces of men cannot be obtained by voluntary service. The newspapers tell us that a thousand men a day are enlisting in various branches of the service. It is certain that a proper, reasonable, Nation-wide appeal to the men of our country would be answered by volunteers in numbers greater than present resources to care for them. If the study and propaganda expended on this conscription bill had been applied to methods for getting voluntary enlistments, the Nation would have been better served. The possibility of a 1-year voluntary-enlistment program should be exhausted before resorting to a compulsory one. We are, after all, living at peace with the world and our determination should lead us to the preservation of such peace.

Every loyal American is in favor of a defense program which will make us so strong that no other nation or coalition of nations dare to attack us. In preparing such a defense, we should rely on the fine traditions which have made and kept this Nation great.

We believe that Congress understands better than military professionals the services to our American society which religion has established, supported, and administered. These services are given to the Nation, not only in specific churches and houses of worship, but also in universities, colleges, secondary schools, hospitals, houses of protection and correction for youth, and in a wide variety of special agencies for mercy and charity. These institutions are staffed and directed by a personnel consecrated to the ministry of religion. Young men willingly enter our seminaries and novitiates in answer to a call of conscience. They volunteer to dedicate their lives to the service of Christ and the service of their neighbor for the love of and in imitation of Christ.

They may expect no earthly remuneration in this ministry, except a frugal, humble subsistence. We do not believe that the Congress of the United States will knowingly destroy or interfere with such heroic religious practice. We hold that much of the world's present distress is due to the spirit of stark materialism which has seized the minds and wills of men and nations. This Republic has been enriched by the Christian social services fostered by the church and administered from the motive of Christian charity and benevolence. We believe that the Congress will insure continued protection to that consecrated service for God and humanity.

The present bill departs from that national tradition of respect for and protection of religious institutions. The military mind which drafted the bill now under consideration had an intense fear of the word "exemption." No service to the Nation, even in peacetime, according to this bill, is comparable to the lowest form of military training. All modes of life, even in peacetime, must give way to a plan which the military professionals deem necessary.

The bill, however, grants automatic "deferment" to the Vice President and governmental officers of all categories. In this instance, what is the meaning of "deferment" against the traditional exemption for such officers?

In section 7 (c) the bill gives some recognition to the importance of religion, providing that "The President shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe" defer training and service in the Army and Navy of men whose service is more important in industry and the professions. Among those whose service is thus to be deferred are "regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, in the regular discharge of their ministerial duties."

However, there is no provision in this bill for the exemption of those training for the ministry nor for those carrying on an actual ministry in religious education and charity.

Candidates for the priesthood are selected with great care, they are given a long preparatory training leading up to the study of theology. The seminary is not merely an educational institution, it is above all a place of formation for those priestly virtues and that mode of life which will enable the priest to serve Christ by example as well as by teaching and preaching and the administration of institutions of social charity. Any interruption in this strict discipline will work to the disadvantage of the individual candidates and to the great detriment of the church in the maintenance of her institutions.

In other selective compulsory draft acts, specifically the acts of 1917 and 1918, the Congress, acting even under stress of war, recognized the distinctive character of the minister and by statute exempted him and students of theology from the draft.

We believe that in any national-defense policy, such as the enactment of this bill would provide, this section 7 (c) should be amended and that after section 7 (b) a provision should be added exempting from the selective compulsory draft herein provided all priests in holy orders, ministers of religion, students who are preparing for the priesthood or ministry, and regular members of religious communities.

Just what does deferment mean in this bill? Does it mean deferred to a class to be called later than class I? Does it connote obligation on the part of the President? What area of choice is left to the President in the clause, "under such regulations as he may prescribe"? What discretion in "deferment" will be left to the various 6,000 conscription officials throughout the country who will pass on registrants?

The citizen would be protected if Congress wrote definite exemptions and defined exactly what "deferment" meant. The bill eschews deferment by class and leaves the status of the individual applicant to the judgment of a local conscription-board functionary.

The elasticity of "deferment" as conceived in the military mind is known from the language used in the proposed regulations to accompany the draft bill as designed by the Joint Army and Navy Selective Service Committee. In section 100 B of the regulations we read:

"Ordinarily registrants placed in class I will be inducted into the public armed forces before registrants placed in any of the other classes, but nothing herein contained shall prevent the induction of any registrant, whatever his classification or order number, when the President deems it necessary in the national interest."

That is, the priest or minister of religion or other person who is deferred by Executive order may, when the President deems it necessary, be subjected to the selective draft.

In another place these regulations use much language to define the term "regular or duly ordained minister." The language is totally inadequate and would exclude from "deferment" bishops, college and university presidents, hospital administrators, and other classes of ordained and regular ministers who are in administrative, missionary, and general offices of the church.

I cite these regulations to inquire who will be charged with writing such regulations for the proposed legislation, if enacted. What norms will guard the 6,000 local conscription functionaries in interpreting the regulations?

This legislation is entirely too important to be left to haphazard conjecture. The acts of Congress even in wartime were more definitely and more justly written, and besides, they accepted and followed the traditions of our country.

In view of the utter disregard in this bill for the normal recruiting of a clergy to carry on the religious, educational, and charitable works of the church, we ask respectfully that this committee and the Members of Congress generally give attention to the result which must inevitably follow. Just at a time when greater demands will be put on the church for supplying chaplains in the armed forces, in the extended Civilian Conservation Corps, and for social welfare work in cantonments, the church faces the loss of many candidates for the ministry because of the refusal to grant even a deferred status to seminarians. Nowhere in the present bill is any consideration given to this need. How can the church meet the new demands for chaplains and other personnel related to the defense program if students for the ministry are thought to be more necessary in military units? We are informed that the extended Army and Navy program already authorized calls for 500 priests. It is impossible to get candidates for the ministry as one would employees in industry.

We reject the thought that this present proposed legislation is any indication of a change in the possible attitude of Congress toward religion. That attitude has been and continues to be respectful of the liberty of the church in selecting and directing her ministers.

Experience in wartime is evidence that any loss of fighting personnel arising out of the exemption from the selective draft of ministers of religion and students for the ministry is not only meager but generously compensated for by the advantage of morale, unity, and loyalty promoted and maintained among noncombatants by the clergy and among combatants by the offices of the Chaplain Corps.

It is our firm belief that there will be available a sufficient number of volunteers for service in the Chaplain Corps if ministers of religion and students for the ministry continue to be exempt from the draft.

We speak only for the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. To enforce provisions of law such as those now considered would dangerously interfere with the progress, even with the preservation of religion and would result in grievous suffering and hardship to millions of families by depriving them of sacramental ministrations, and would curtail an influence that contributes inestimably to the preservation of morale and the strengthening of national unity.

Experience shows that the normal increase of the Catholic population in the United States requires an increase of about 750 priests each year. In the school year 1935–36, for which complete statistics are available, 1,400 students were graduated from 93 theological seminaries in the United States. That number was barely sufficient to replace the deceased and superannuated and provide the increase called for by an increase in the Catholic population. It would be extremely difficult for the existing theological seminaries to provide additional priests for service in the Chaplain Corps. Adequate provision could not be made for the necessary normal demand for additional priests and at the same time for service with the increased military and naval forces.

Taking into consideration these facts, the Parliament of Great Britain by the Armed Forces Act of 1939 exempted from military service all men in holy orders and regular ministers of religious denominations, and recent regulations added "church students and religious" to the schedule of reserved occupations; that is, gave them a specific vocation exemption from the draft. The rule applies to all "clergymen and church students of all denominations."

The British regulations define "theological student" as "a man established in his course as a student at an institution recognized by any religious denomination as a training institution for holy orders or for regular ministers of that denomination, while he continues as such a student and intends to qualify for holy orders or for appointment as a regular minister." This exemption is of particular reference, since all of us know what Great Britain has faced since September 1939.

Therefore, we respectfully recommend that ministers of religion and students for the ministry of religion be specifically exempt from the selective compulsory military service proposals now under consideration.

Immunity from military service is inseparable from the right of a people to religious liberty. It is not a privilege conceded unfairly to the ministers of religion as a class. In respecting the immunity of the clergy from military service the state recognizes the right of the people at all times to practice their religion and to have available for that purpose the ministrations of their priests.

It is argued that to recognize the immunity of theological students would open the way for abuses. Too many would seek to enter theological seminaries to escape the draft.

There will be no rush of students to Catholic theological seminaries by men seeking to evade conscription. No student is admitted at any time to the seminary without evidence of fitness and without having completed at least 2 years of study in a liberal arts college. Ecclesiastical superiors would be bound to exercise even greater caution in times of crisis and would be even more severe and exacting in ascertaining whether or not an applicant truly has a vocation for the ministry. The church would not object to reasonable efforts by the state to prevent abuses. The state certainly might designate for exemption only the seminarians or divinity students enrolled in institutions which have been functioning for a specified number of years. Indeed, such efforts would protect the church as well as the state, for to receive students or confer holy orders on candidates who had no vocation would harm the church and religion even more than it would the state.

Believing the proposed provisions of the bill as now drawn are contrary to our national traditions and national ideals, as well as hostile to the explicit declarations and laws of the church, we are confident that you Members of this Congress will wish to reexamine the whole question in relation to the points which we submit most respectfully.

LETTERS FROM CONSTITUENTS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am receiving hundreds of letters regarding the question of compulsory military training as provided for in the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill and practically 100 percent of them express opposition to the bill.

The six letters at the end of this statement are quite typical of the dozens coming to me in every day's mail, and for the purpose of presenting a résumé of the general viewpoint of the people in my congressional district, I submit the following and ask that their viewpoint be given careful consideration:

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,
GENERAL EXTENSION DIVISION,
Minneapolis, August 10, 1940.

JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
United States Representative from Minnesota,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: I hope you will stand by with the opponents of the draft bill and will vote against this un-American measure the military clique are trying to shove down our throats.

Here's an incident which will interest you: We tried to schedule a radio forum here on conscription, but we had to cancel it because we couldn't find a young person to uphold the bill who could match in ability any number of young men anxious to speak against it!

I have yet to meet a family with boys of draft age who will vote for any Congressman who puts their boys into the Army.

People sometimes favor draft in principle, but not for themselves. The young men and women I come in contact with will not vote for Congressmen who put them in an Army camp. Nor will their families.

Yours truly,

BURTON PAULU,
Manager of WLB.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 6, 1940.

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER.

DEAR SIR: The members of Unit No. 5, Mothers of American Sons, Inc., are registering their protest against the compulsory military training bill in its entirety. We do not favor its passage in any form, or for any age range, as that would be tantamount to endorsing the principle of conscription, which we feel is un-American and undemocratic. We urge you to do your utmost to defeat this measure. Thanking you, we are

MEMBERS OF UNIT NO. 5, MOTHERS OF AMERICAN SONS, INC., MRS. KNOLL, President.

ASSOCIATE MACHINISTS AND ENGINEERS,

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
United States Representative from Minnesota,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, residents and voters in the State of Minnesota, earnestly protest against any compulsory draft of men for the United States Army. We also protest against the mobilizing of the National Guard for a 1-year period. We believe that either one or both of these measures would take many desirable and much-needed men from commercial activity and would cripple business.

We wish to call your attention to the fact that skilled mechanics are extremely scarce in this fair land of ours, due to legislation adverse to the proper relationship that should exist between employer and employee, and that no mechanics are being trained for this reason.

To draw from the ranks of such mechanics as the country now has, to fill any quota whatsoever, no matter what the need may be so far as that quota is concerned, is no less than criminal so far as the business of the country is concerned. There are plenty of untrained men with mediocre educations who are perfectly capable of filling the ranks of privates in the United States Army, and were this number of men taken off of the relief and W. P. A. rolls they would be very glad to volunteer. We therefore earnestly request that you use your utmost endeavors to defeat any measure that would call for compulsory draft in the United States Army and mobilization of the National Guard for any period.

Respectfully submitted.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION,
MINNEAPOLIS LOCAL NO. 557,
August 7, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At the meeting of our local, Tuesday, August 6, I was instructed to communicate with you regarding the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill or any other amendments or bills that may be considered on this question. Our local is strongly opposed to any peacetime conscription in whatever form.

We are firmly convinced that conscription legislation will be a long step toward totalitarian regimentation and will result in dangerously lowering the living standards of over 90 percent of the American people. We also believe that it will seriously result in the undermining of our civil liberties.

As part of your electorate, we urgently request that you militantly oppose all such legislation.

We remain,

Respectfully yours,

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 7, 1940.

Mr. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: In spite of the name calling in the Senate and in the press by proponents and advocates of the draft bill against those who oppose it, I urge you to vote against it when it comes up for vote in the House.

It is not a defense measure but has the ulterior motive of a Fascist dictatorship. If the bill was anywhere near fair, it would incorporate these features, which I pass on to you for possible use as amendments to the bill or as a separate bill.

No registration—a call for voluntary service.

Trainees guaranteed that they will not be used as strikebreakers or as storm troopers, nor sent on military expeditions outside of our borders, and steady reemployment at regular wages after a definite period of service, punishable to the employer to the same extent as that proposed for the workers if they fail to register, in the present bill—5 years in prison with no privileges and a $10,000 fine.

Give labor unions defense contracts from the Government with these above guaranties to the workers along with stipulations as to the rate of wages at regular labor pay, hours, and so forth, the same as the manufacturers get in regard to their profits. Why not? It's supposed to be the defense of democracy, then why not be democratic about it? The workers, through unions (guaranteed to exist, both privately and in the defense army), should and must have the right of democratic process in defense besides the right to collective bargaining. Then defense will be voluntary and enthusiastic, otherwise the proponents of the present bill and the administration show intentions of placing everyone in a strait jacket and then selling out to fascism, the same as occurred in France.

My vote at the coming elections will depend upon your attitude toward this bill. I shall keep a watch on how you vote.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE BEYER.

P. S.—I am of Swedish descent, and a citizen by birth.

[Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors of America, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Switchmen's Union of North America]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 1, 1940.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned chief executives of the organizations representing engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen, and yardmen employed on the railroads of the United States have this day given consideration to the provisions of the proposed compulsory peacetime draft or conscription bill which contemplates the inducting into the military and naval service of the United States in the immediate future some hundreds of thousands of citizens of this country for a period of training.

We refer to the Burke-Wadsworth bill now before Congress for consideration, and feel that you should be made acquainted with our views, which we are confident reflect the views of the membership of these organizations employed on American railroads.

We are in general agreement with the prevailing sentiment in the United States that every support should be given to adequate measures necessary to the protection of our democratic institutions against attack from the force of dictatorship, both within and without our country. However, grave doubt exists in many quarters with respect to the wisdom of enacting a peacetime conscription bill when it is believed other adequate measures are available. Such proposal borders closely on the principle of dictatorship, and we hold the view that regimenting our people is un-American and unnecessary.

Patriotism is not the monopoly of those who are feverishly urging this conscription bill. We may rightly assume that all citizens are patriotic, and, if given the opportunity and impressed with the necessity for their doing so, they will volunteer their services in defense of our country.

At present there is a vast army of unemployed, thousands of whom would be desirous of enlisting in the military and naval service if given an opportunity to do so, but they are so circumscribed by technical military and naval physical requirements that many of them are precluded from voluntary enlistment. Consideration should be given to assisting them in removing minor physical defects so that they may be acceptable as volunteers.

Compulsory military service in time of peace is the very antithesis of freedom. It involves an infringement on the very principles of democracy which it is invoked to defend. It imposes upon the individual a mandate to give service which he may not be in position to render without serious sacrifices on the part of himself or his family or both, and this at a time when there are thousands of other individuals who would be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to serve if such opportunity were not denied by the restrictive rules observed by the recruiting service.

The youth of our country who are inducted into the military and naval services under the principle of conscription and who are made to serve will quite naturally acquire the viewpoint that forceful means should be adopted in all the affairs of life as an avenue to achieve desired ends.

While you are giving thought to the Burke-Wadsworth bill let not the hysteria of the moment sweep you into supporting such a drastic and ill-advised change in the American way of life. Democracy means that the state exists to serve the individual. The program at present contemplated will cause hundreds of thousands of our youth to become "war-minded" and will, if carried out, establish the fabric of a giant war machine which experience teaches us cannot and will not be permitted to rust in peace. "War games" inevitably lead to war. The voluntary enlistment principle confines and restricts the dissemination of "war-mindedness" to actual necessities through the longer term of service, and above all preserves the principle of democracy in its strictest sense.

These organizations are wholeheartedly in accord with the establishment and maintenance of an adequate national defense and their membership will not be found wanting in any support of such proper measures, but we are convinced that under present conditions the regimenting of our people according to the contemplated military pattern is unnecessary and is an infringement upon the civil liberties which they may reasonably expect to enjoy.

We trust that your committee will not favorably report the Burke-Wadsworth military-conscription bill.

Respectfully yours,

EDITORIALS FROM THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN AND KNOXVILLE JOURNAL

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, there are those who would have us believe there is no sentiment for the repeal of the poll tax in the eight Southern States that still retain it as a prerequisite for voting.

Recently the local papers carried the news item that the Young Democrats of Tennessee had gone on record as advocating the repeal of this tax.

Under leave to extend my remarks I insert three editorials, two from the Nashville (Tenn.) Tennessean and one from the Knoxville (Tenn.) Journal:

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Tennessean of August 8, 1940]

THE FIGHT ON ANOTHER FRONT

Congressman GEYER of California has a Federal anti-poll-tax law in suspense. It is in suspense because it is in committee, where it is being subjected to the same sort of committee veto several important T. V. A. bills have undergone. In other words, the House Judiciary Committee, which has had the bill for months, will not permit it to be voted on by Congress.

The Geyer bill makes it unlawful "to require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote, at any election for a President or Vice President or Presidential elector or Senator or Member of the House of Representatives of the United States."

It is a good bill and deserves national support. We in the South know better than any others the nature and extent of the evil at which it is aimed. Mr. GEYER now is seeking to extract the bill from the Judiciary Committee's pocket by petition.

On this petition we should see the names of Congressmen BYRNS, COURTNEY, PEARSON, DAVIS, KEFAUVER, JENNINGS, GORE, COOPER, and REECE of Tennessee.

Because Tennessee is one of the eight States in which regularly a majority of the people of voting age are disfranchised by the poll tax.

Kill the poll tax.

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Tennessean of August 4, 1940]

REPEAL THE POLL TAX

Davidson County has a population of 257,000. It has well over 100,000 citizens of voting age.

In Thursday's election approximately 18,000 persons voted in Davidson County.

The new census will reveal the population of Tennessee at or very near the 3,000,000 mark. This means there are over 1,200,000 Tennesseans of voting age.

In Thursday's election the total vote cast in Tennessee failed to exceed 275,000.

We face the harsh fact that the great majority of the people of Tennessee do not vote and have not voted for generations. We face the certain knowledge that Tennesseans do not vote because of the poll tax. Thus effectively the greater number of our people are disfranchised.

This is not popular rule. This is not democracy. This is not tolerable.

Today the Tennessean writes repeal of the poll tax in our masthead, and a word of explanation about that. We mean outright obliteration of the law which imposes the poll tax, section 1082 of the Tennessee Code. We pledge the people of Tennessee this demand shall not come down from our masthead till the people of Tennessee are enfranchised, till they again shall be free to try democracy.

This will be a fight. We state that anticipation fully aware that both the Democratic and Republican Parties in our State have declared against the poll tax, and that at least a majority of the candidates nominated for representative office in Thursday's election have expressed themselves against the poll tax one way or another.

It will be a fight because some of these promises are weasel-worded, because some are given with tongue in cheek, and because the political machines from one end of the State to the other are not going to permit the repeal of the poll tax if they can prevent it.

We take up this fight gladly because it is right. The people of this State know it is right and will join with us. Governor Cooper has advocated action against the poll tax and the people of this State will expect him to act accordingly.

The fight will be won in whatever time it takes.

Then to the people of Tennessee the Bill of Rights will mean what it says. Then we shall have popular rule in fact. Then we shall escape from under the sort of oligarchy which so long has been masquerading here as "self-government."

You will hear contentions against the position we bind ourselves to: the same old shopworn arguments.

You will be told the poll tax is imposed by the State constitution. That is not true.

You will be told the poll tax can be removed as a "prerequisite to voting" but retained as a tax.

That is not true.

You will be told repeal of the poll tax will increase the Negro vote.

That is true—also true that it will even more greatly increase the white vote. As it is, the political machines of our metropolitan centers regularly qualify and vote as many Negro citizens as they can, which is many indeed. Also the Constitution of the United States guarantees equality of franchise and the laws of our State draw no distinction between voters save by the $2 qualification—the poll tax. This qualification disqualifies any citizen, white or black, who cannot or does not meet it.

You will be told repeal of the poll tax will increase the vote of the "riffraff."

This is but to say the vote of the common people—and who among us is the holier-than-thou who is to say of one citizen, "He is worthy" and to another citizen, "You cannot vote"? Who will arrogate to himself the power to discern among all the people only the rich, the wise, and the good?

You will be told that repeal of the poll tax will diminish school funds.

That is utterly misleading. School funds will be appropriated. Poll-tax revenues currently provide less than 3 percent of our school funds. In any case, it is idiotic to use for the preparation of our children to be good citizens the proceeds of a tax which itself deprives them of exercise of the highest privilege of citizenship—the franchise.

You will be told that the poll tax should be kept in order that "all will share the tax burden."

This is pure casuistry. Everybody shares the tax burden in a hundred direct and hidden ways—in rent, in the purchase of clothes and food; even those who now pay no poll tax, who are in the great majority.

These above are the old favorites. You may be given other "reasons" why the poll tax should be retained. We shall be delighted to examine such presentments when and as they come.

In our opinion, it is no good any longer for our State to preen itself as a democracy, when so plainly it is something else. We shall get nowhere with such palpable pretense. We cannot be honest, we cannot salve our souls, with further self-delusion.

Only eight States keep the poll tax, ours being one. In all of these States the majority of the people is disfranchised. In States adjoining us, with populations equal to or smaller than our own, but with no poll tax, from 3 to 10 times more of the people exercise the right of franchise than in the poll-tax States.

Thursday's total vote in this county, in this State, was a disgrace. The proportion of voters to the disfranchised in this county and State has been a disgrace for at least seven decades.

Let us now end this disgrace, this sham, this intolerable thing. Let us now have to our social use and individual political profit that right of franchise which, as the cardinal democratic principle, we so long have cherished.

[From the Knoxville (Tenn.) Journal of August 4, 1940]

SIXTY THOUSAND PHONEY VOTES CONTROL OUR ELECTIONS

By a process which we hope is related to deduction it may be noted by the thoughtful reader that 2 percent of the citizenship of Tennessee—and that 2 percent's will completely subject to that of one man by the name of Crump—completely controls the destiny of Tennesssee, makes its laws, and administers them.

This conclusion may be arrived at as follows: The census just completed shows a population for Tennessee of approximately 3,000,000. State-wide government in the State is ordinarily in the hands of the Democratic Party, which votes usually about 450,000. This small segment of the population in turn is controlled by Mr. E. H. Crump's automatic vote count of from sixty to seventy-five thousand, so that in the last analysis Mr. C. runs the State to his complete satisfaction by vest-pocket control of 2 percent of the population.

This short lesson in democratic processes and their abuse is adequate to indicate to the most casual student of politics why Mr. Crump declined flatly to allow Gov. Prentice Cooper, nominated for reelection Thursday, to go through with his campaign pledge to remove the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting.

Whereas it is a comparatively easy matter for a man of Mr. Crump's long practice to manipulate the present Democratic vote, that is little more than 15 percent of the total population, the difficulties of this process would be tremendously increased by abolishment of poll-tax requirements.

It should be repeated here now, as has been pointed out before, that while statisticians reckon that in the eight States which still hold to the poll-tax requirement, without exception to percentage of the population that votes is less than in those without it.

It is figured that Tennessee votes 33 percent of its population, as compared with our sister States of Kentucky and West Virginia, which without a poll-tax requirement vote 64 percent and 92 percent, respectively.

Address to Oregon Democrats Assembled at Hood River, Oreg., August 4, 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ADDRESS WRITTEN BY HON. WALTER M. PIERCE, OF OREGON, AND READ BY C. J. SHORB

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address written by me and read before a Democratic picnic at Hood River, Oreg., on August 4, 1940.

My title harks back to an admonition sent in a message in the early days of Christianity; the rest of the words will immediately occur to those familiar with Paul's epistles. "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest * * * whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise think on these things." This has been my objective in the message to my far-away constituents whom I cannot visit because duty holds me here in attendance on the sessions of Congress. It has always been a joy to me to share my experiences with groups of friends who have listened to my addresses for nearly half a century. I try to give them the facts so they may form their own judgments, as all citizens should do.

I wish to express my appreciation for this very kind invitation from the Young Democrats of Hood River county. The delivery of the keynote speech for this Democratic picnic is of great importance. I deeply regret that official duties in the National Capital make it necessary for me to remain here. Out in the quiet and peace of the mountains of Oregon it is hard for people to realize that civilization is burning up. The lights of liberty and freedom which have burned brightly all over the continent of Europe are being blacked out, one by one, probably never to be relighted in our time. It is my firm conviction that Congress should remain in session till the dark war clouds have passed away. An emergency may arise any day which would demand the immediate attention of the legislative branch of our Government, which causes my enforced absence from the meeting and deprives me of the pleasure of greeting my Oregon friends

Thinking of the world situation as I write this greeting, I feel that we should give thanks for our blessings, just as such thanks are given by families assembled around bountiful dining tables. This is the only country in the world in which people could gather for such a meeting. You are relatively carefree. I speak, and others will speak, about public affairs. We are thankful that we are enjoying the blessings of liberty, our most precious yet most dangerous possession.

A hundred years from now, a thousand years from now, men may look to this day and this era as the most epoch-making turning point in the history of the world. We citizens of this great democracy are now called upon to devote to public problems all our intelligence and our most earnest thought. We who meet here today are those sympathetic with the principles of a great political party which has strengthened our democracy during the past 8 years. Our program for economic welfare will ever appear as the beacon light of this era. We may well take pride in it. There is no man here who would go back to those days when this Republic allowed child labor, when the workingman was without the protection of wage and hour laws, when the lot of the unemployed, the children, the cripples, the "have nots" was not the concern of the Government. Who would turn back to the days when each farmer stood by himself, alone against the world, when banks were unsafe? The historian who surveys this era will grant that we of the Democratic Party are justified in our pride in having been foremost in advancing the line in the long battle for human rights.

There are a few outstanding dates which mark significant turning points in the history of mankind. The most important date of all is when the Saviour was born, bringing into the world the idea of brotherly love, kindness, and charity. We date our calendar from His birth. Another date was when the Roman capital was moved from the Tiber to the Bosphorus, in A. D. 476. That marked the beginning of the Dark Ages. For a thousand years learning and knowledge previously acquired disappeared under the iron heel of cruel tyrants. In A. D. 1066 William the Conqueror crossed the English Channel and won the Battle of Hastings, blending Saxon and Norman. This marked the commencement of a great people, who, for nearly a thousand years, have led the civilized world. In 1776 was born in the United States the idea that the governed were capable of governing themselves through their representatives—the American idea. It now appears that 1940 will mark the close of another era that may drive civilized man into a period similar to the Dark Ages.

We are witnessing the development and actual use of the greatest, most effective, most heartless, most inhuman war machine that the genius of man has ever been able to devise. This war machine of which I speak seems to be moving toward the conquest of the world. We are being told by Hitler that liberty is a myth, that independence shows weakness, and obedience is held up as the ultimate goal. He tells us that freedom is a mark of inferiority and incompetence, and that independence is a lack of equality. The individual is nothing; the state is everything. This is totally contrary to all we have held dear in America. We have no desire to become a militaristic nation, nor to train ourselves in the arts of war. World conditions, however, compel a rightabout-face. We are forced to consider defense of our shores and of rights to trade and commerce. Hitler cannot be turned aside by soft words. Read his Mein Kampf. You will clearly see that he aims at world domination. He recognizes only one method for the attainment of that goal—force.

We cannot understand why 300,000,000 people living in Europe have sacrificed their liberties for the hope of bread. Surely they must have forgotten the words of Patrick Henry, who said: "Is peace so dear and life so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!" Liberty is never easily won nor securely held. As we plan for the future let us firmly resolve to maintain our democratic processes and institutions.

I was in Washington, D. C., as your Congressman when President Roosevelt took his oath of office on March 4, 1933. No one who participated in that great occasion can ever forget the tense atmosphere under which he accepted the responsibility of the Presidency. There wasn't a solvent bank in all the land. Few manufacturing plants had the money to meet the next pay roll. Wheat was 25 cents a bushel; corn, 15 cents; no market at all for apples, and there were millions of people out of work, food, and shelter. The capitalistic system under which we had lived seemed wrecked. The first bill presented to the Congress at the special session was in regard to reopening the banks, which had been closed by Executive order. They were reopened in such a manner that they have remained open. We may justly claim the credit for the happy change. Let us turn to the matters uppermost in men's minds today and review the situation. I have gone into these matters fully and most earnestly in my speech of July 25th, which I will send to all who register today.

DEFENSE

Secretary Hull has just secured certain agreements among nations on this hemisphere. The national-defense program is moving along with real efficiency. The President has selected advisors of known competence. These men are great industrialists who are sacrificing time and high salaries to the cause. They have been chosen because of ability and not for personal or political reasons. The Congress led the way and has cooperated with appropriations, authorizations, and legislation. The work is moving as rapidly as possible, considering the necessity for the establishment of newly equipped industries, requiring different machine tools, transformation of existing plants, and the building of great new plants. We have entered into a long-time program which we must be allowed to carry through. The President has always been ahead of the people and the Congress in the matter. Now, they are in accord with him.

BONNEVILLE AND THE PUBLIC-POWER PROGRAM

Meeting here on the shores of this wide lake created by Bonneville Dam, you realize what the public-works program has meant, and will mean, to the future of America. That dam, 25 miles to the west of us, which backs the Columbia River 25 miles to the east of us, can develop a half-million kilowatts of electric power, as much as is now being developed on the American side at Niagara. Three hundred miles further up the Columbia, an enormous block of concrete has been set solidly into the river bed. Think of the homes which will be built upon the million and a half irrigated acres along the banks of this great river. New settlers will know whose vision it was that made possible such utilization of these great natural resources. But for the wisdom and courage of our President, these waters would still be running idly to the sea, benefiting few, even for navigation. Ports have been brought inland, homes have been built. The community of Cascade Locks in this very county has given to the Nation an example of public ownership which should encourage other communities to utilize the current caught in the Bonneville generating plant. The President's opponent made his own record before a Congressional Committee when he justified control of power by great monopolies in giant holding companies, piled one upon the other. What would he do with Bonneville power? Think of that and gird yourselves for the campaign, my friends.

Secretary Wallace, our Vice Presidential candidate, has been recognized as a sort of a second Lincoln. One of the characteristic stories told of him is his reply to a question about the holding-company magnate who aspires to gain control of the Government. Wallace looked out the train window to the fields and called attention to a weed, "See that yellow plant growing over the other plants in that field," he said. "That's dodder, a parasite that lives on other plants. Hasn't any roots in the ground. Something like utility-holding companies."

AGRICULTURE

What has the New Deal done for agriculture? It has stabilized it. It has, for the first time in our history, worked out an agricultural program for the whole Nation. We began back in 1933 when we passed the original Triple A Act, which gave agriculture its first real innings in this country. Because of the processing tax, the courts threw it out. It was reenacted as the Soil Conservation Act, which will never be thrown out and which will stand as long as American agriculture endures. It will help us to solve the tremendous problems which we must face during and after the present World War. Hitler is going to tell the other nations what he will allow his European states to buy and what he will demand in return for trade. What would happen to the American farmer without a world market for his surplus if it were not for the plans made by this administration? We need all the strength and vision of our wise Secretary to keep American farmers from peasantry in the future. It is true our opponents have adopted a farm program suggested by an ex-New Deal malcontent who "walked out" because he was not allowed to rule—so he decided to ruin. It is not a practical working program, except where it backs up and endorses our farm measures.

Think of the fruit industry of this valley without marketing agreements, without the surplus commodity program. It is not perfect, but there would be no bottom at all if this program were not under it. Think of the wheat farmers in this whole rich section practically guaranteed a price for their golden grain. Has agriculture gained, under the New Deal, something which it will be determined to hold? Will farmers trust the guidance in the difficult days ahead of those who refused them aid clear up to 1933, or will they prefer to march with those legions that fought the real battle which gained the victory?

SECRETARY WALLACE

While we are summarizing the gains of farmers during the past 8 years, let us consider for a moment the man largely responsible for this epoch-making program. With Wallace, the Democrats have a real ticket, a ticket on which are two men fully equipped by experience and knowledge to be President and Vice President of the United States. Mr. Wallace is a deep and steady man; he and his forbears have been devoted to the cause of agriculture. All have been great citizens of the finest American traditions. Could any one ask for a better running mate than Henry A. Wallace? For 7 years he has been at the right hand of the President. Secretary Wallace has led the way for agriculture by which it has climbed from the low depths of near-peasantry in 1933 to the present half-bright day we now enjoy. As a member of the House Committee on Agriculture I have worked with the Secretary. I know him well, and I am inspired by his place on our ticket.

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The creation of the Civilian Conservation Corps has probably been the most inspired single act of the Roosevelt administration. More than 2,000,000 young men have been enrolled in this great conservation program. It has cost the taxpayers more than $2,000,000,000, but never was money better spent. Idle boys without jobs and learning the roads to crime have been gathered up, taught to work, kept busy and interested, and have been fired with ambition through the life and training of the C. C. C. This method of handling unemployed youth was an inspiration and it surely will become a permanent institution for the strengthening of boys' minds and characters.

FOR MEN MUST WORK

The Government of the United States, which represents the institutions under which men live, must so legislate and so administer the laws that all men can have the chance to use their labors for the support of their families and the satisfaction of their ambitions. More beneficial legislation to this end has been enacted during the past 7 years than has ever been passed in any similar period of time by any legislative body on earth. It is a record unparalleled. It was begun under the clouds of a dark era, and it has been conducted during a great economic revolution accompanied by world-wide wars which have thrown economic and political systems into the discard. We have attempted to expand a work program under Government control in order to take up the slack. The public-works program has led the way, resulting in useful and beautiful structures throughout the land. The W. P. A. has had hard sledding, but no one in public life has been able to suggest an adequate substitute. Our party has insisted that the program should stand and be judged on its original purposes rather than by its few minor weaknesses. Who is it that has cried out against the equality and rights of man and would create a lower dependent class in this democracy?

The demand for turning relief back to the States, where it would perish, has come from the very men who would control politically if the other party were to come into power. We place men first, money second, and yet the credit of our Government was never stronger.

No group of workers has benefited more largely in 8 years than have the railroad workers who are now protected behind the ramparts of the Railroad Retirement and the Unemployment Insurance Acts.

THE NEEDS OF OLD AGE

Every working person, man or woman, now has, under the Social Security Act, an opportunity to go into partnership with the Government in order to provide security for old age. The Social Security Act is but the beginning of a great humanitarian program; is an act for the defense of those who are coming into old age during this generation. There must be immediate and further legislation for the security of the aged, who are the most pathetic victims of our sudden economic revolution.

One reason there are now so many tragic cases of want in old age is that, until this administration came into being, the beasts of the financial jungle preyed upon innocent and trusting investors. Oh, how they resented our Securities and Exchange Commission. How quickly they would tear it asunder if the New Deal were not here to protect it. In one county in Oregon a half-million dollars of savings was taken by the utility holding companies. This could never have happened under the present law. The apologist for monopoly who aspires to lead our Nation has been the shining light of that dangerous group.

PARTY LOYALTY

Party loyalty will not be difficult for Democrats during this coming campaign. We are led by a man who has sacrificed his personal desires and agreed to continue to bear the burden because he believes he should play his part as a citizen in these most perilous days.

The third-term discussion will come into the campaign, but it should not move reasoning people now because there are more important issues. Washington spoke wisely when he said:

"There is no reason why a man serving as Chief Executive should not continue more than two terms. An emergency may arise that would make it necessary."

Washington retired at the close of his second term because of his intense desire to return to plantation life. There was no emergency. Our people and all the nations of the world know who is the strong man of America today. Who could with more wisdom gained from wider experience better lead us in the present emergency?

THE DESERTERS

Some who have claimed to be Democrats have bolted, walked out, proving that they are turncoats who cannot be depended upon for loyalty when they cannot rule. Some of us who suffered in previous campaigns because of our loyalty to those very men now resent their desertion, but we realize they are not strong enough to bear the strain of the times.

THE CAMPAIGN

We may expect in this campaign that our ticket will be vigorously opposed by 90 percent of the press as measured in circulation. Among our opponents will be found the great utility leaders, and their money bags will be open. The various monopolies which have writhed under the demand they deal honestly and fairly with the people will not be on our side. The Fascists, who always scorn democracy, will know where to align themselves. There will be powerful opposition.

Arrayed against this mighty host will be the common, average citizens of this country, the men who never demand special privilege, but just ask the opportunity to live simply and happily and safely in a land which is a democracy.

If a class struggle develops in this country between the haves and have-nots, it will be forced by those unwilling to share. They demand that the Government itself be made into a monopoly for their own special privilege. When a nomination is forced by an advertising campaign, assisted by an advertising firm which manufactures public opinion through polls, we may expect a tremendous wave of propaganda. We must steel ourselves against this storm of so-called public opinion. I have analyzed and exposed the methods used. They will be adroit and subtle. If they become too abusive we can follow the example of the little red-haired pop vendor at the Chicago convention. When a woman in the gallery began making insulting remarks about Mrs. Roosevelt he forgot business, and, shaking his fist at her, said, "You just shut up."

I predict a more sweeping victory in 1940 for our candidates than we enjoyed in 1936. Thankful we should be that we have leaders of such standing and character. This age is the most fearful, the most threatening, the most interesting of all time. It is indeed:

"A grand and fearful age,
An age on ages telling;
To be simply living
Is sublime."

The Power To Coin and Regulate Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

LETTER FROM DR. LOUIS LONG

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a letter just received from Dr. L. Long,

Columbia, S. C., which should prove to be very interesting and informative, especially to a number of Congressmen here who have been specializing along the line suggested by Dr. Long.

As stated yesterday in my address before the House, because of the serious problems confronting this country, on account of the dreadful war in Europe, it is well that we give deep, conscientious thought to many suggestions coming from our constituents with the hope that we may be able not only to serve the best interests of our people but to ward off any serious depression, which would naturally lower the standard of our living, with the hope that we may be able to bring about normal prosperity and happiness to our people.

COLUMBIA, S. C., August 10, 1940.

Hon. H. P. FULMER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULMER: Your letter of August 6 is much appreciated, and I shall remember that you have stayed at your post in Washington to watch proceedings in the interest of your constituents and of our country, when you could have gone home. I thank you for myself, my wife, and others.

There is one fundamental thing for the welfare and security of our country which I wish that Congress could be persuaded to do. That thing appears to me as the only thing that would liberate our country from the ruinous policy of piling up billions of public debt and the inevitable increase in taxes both direct and indirect which the people will find very difficult to pay. This policy, moreover, puts our Government at the mercy of big money lenders.

It is our desire to see our Congress reclaim and use the power given it wisely by the fathers of our country in article I, section 8, clause 5, of our noble American Constitution: "Congress shall have the power to coin (issue) money and regulate the power thereof." For 160 years this clause has been impardonably ignored by our own Congressmen. We are displeased with the work of the Senators, past and present, who have unfaithfully delegated their constitutional powers to other persons or institutions, and particularly at the present time those Senators and Congressmen who have delegated precious, holy congressional powers to one man.

There are few people left who are really free, and free from debt. Most everybody is caught in the world-wide interest-grinding mill. And our own Government (who had the power to issue money, interest-free, and to regulate the value thereof) is compelled to borrow money from, and pay tribute to, the financial powers that be.

Before the Revolution there was a time of great colonial prosperity. Benjamin Franklin was asked to tell the secret of that prosperity. He answered: "Because our Colonies have the power to issue and to control their own money," or words to that effect. Later, England, pressed by the founders of the great Rothschild banks, forbade the American Colonies from issuing their own money. A great depression followed, and the present banking system was established in America. The slogan, "No taxation without representation" is only part of the truth. The full truth is or was the deprivation or loss of the "power to issue money of their own and to regulate the value thereof." Benjamin Franklin admitted that "Had England not deprived the Colonies of their right to issue their own money, they would have been willing to pay the tax on tea." Then history would be quite different. We would not have from eight to twelve millions of unemployed, the banks would not be full of idle money, Uncle Sam would not need to ask big financiers to lend him money at interest, and we would not have $49,000,000,000 of public debt (to whom?).

We very deeply appreciate the statement of your letter which shows that you do not allow propaganda for war to bias your judgment. That is fine. You say that you throw to the waste-paper basket as soon as it comes all propaganda papers. We admit that there is a great deal too much to do for Representatives who wish to do their work well, conscientiously. Yet, it is sometimes well to find out the reasons and motives of the opponents.

As a doctor, I come in contact with so much poverty in everything that I have come to the conclusion that all the proposed expenditures by the Administration will only intensify the terrible distress and deterioration of a large portion of the population.

I sent you a paper emphasizing the vast importance of a national money system according to our Constitution, which will prevent hoarding and promote Nation-wide activity. I hope you have given your attention to this. True Americans do not want Government doles, charity, nor W. P. A. debasing work. We want a Congress-ruled administration.

Rest assured, dear Mr. FULMER, that there are still many stout American hearts who appreciate to the fullest extent the work of those Representatives who uphold the letter and spirit of our Constitution. Alas, it is true also that noise in the press and otherwise is apt to drown the voice of the faithful constitutional citizens.

We pray that you may be sustained in every way in your witnessing and working for the welfare of this State and of the whole Nation.

Very truly yours,

DR. LOUIS LONG.

Outline for a Discussion of the True Nature of the Process Going on in Europe and Asia; and the Relationship of the Western Hemisphere Toward It

---

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY COL. ASHBY WILLIAMS

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an article prepared by Col. Ashby Williams, Esq., a distinguished member of the bar of the District of Columbia.

It is my opinion that after reading this contribution by Colonel Williams much of the fog and hysteria created by the warmongers will disappear. If sane reason functioned a proper approach to our national security could calmly and dispassionately be discussed. The necessary expansion of territory for certain nations in Europe and Asia is undoubtedly a problem that concerns their hemisphere and not this Western Continent.

OUTLINE FOR A DISCUSSION OF THE TRUE NATURE OF THE PROCESS GOING ON IN EUROPE AND ASIA, AND THE RELATIONSHIP OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE TOWARD IT

1. The process going on in Europe is essentially one designed to bring about a new distribution of land as a means of livelihood.

2. The same process is also going on in east Asia.

3. Whenever the land on which a people live is no longer sufficient to support them they must either (1) migrate to other lands, or (2) import raw materials to be manufactured and exported to other lands in exchange for other raw materials, or (3) they must acquire other lands, or (4) they must die.

4. Both Germany and Italy have more people than their land will support, and since they have no foreign exchange with which to purchase raw materials, they have chosen the method of acquiring more land in order to support their people.

5. The adjustments necessitated by overpopulation are usually accomplished by the gradual process of evolution, but that has been impossible in the case of Germany and Italy because of a single obstacle to their acquisition of more land.

6. The single obstacle to the evolutionary process by which Germany and Italy would normally have acquired more land in order to support their people is imperial England with her far-flung possessions.

7. England, because of her imperial interests, by opposing the acquisition of more land by Germany and Italy, has converted what would otherwise have been a process of evolution into a revolution, and hence the present world upheavel is of English origin.

8. Nazi-ism and fascism are not ideologies because there are no ideologies in government, but merely forms of political organization. They are forms in which the individual has a minimum of rights and the state a maximum of power. These and similar forms of political organization are born exclusively of the necessities of the state, and were developed in Germany and Italy only in order to more effectively overcome the opposition to their acquisition of land necessary to support them.

9. But for imperial England nazi-ism and fascism would probably not have been necessary in order to enable Germany and Italy to acquire more land. Whether, and to what extent, nazi-ism and fascism would have developed in Germany and Italy in order to enable those states to meet their internal problems is a matter of no concern to us.

10. When Germany and Italy shall have acquired, either through evolution or revolution, the land necessary to support their people, and shall have satisfactorily adjusted their internal affairs in such a way as to make the exercise of extraordinary power on the part of the government no longer necessary, then nazi-ism and fascism will be supplanted by some form of political organization in which the individual will have more rights and the government will have less power.

11. There is no overpopulation of any one of the states in the Western Hemisphere, and consequently there is no state on this hemisphere engaged, either through evolution or revolution, in acquiring more land.

12. Since a form of political organization, with particular reference to the distribution of rights and powers as between the individual and the government, is determined exclusively by the necessities of the people embraced within the political organization, it follows that the nazi-ism of Germany and the fascism of Italy to the extent that these forms were created in order to enable those governments to acquire more land, can never be transferred to this continent.

13. Nazi-ism and fascism, or a similar form of political organization, will not arise in this country unless such form is necessary to solve our domestic problem of the distribution of land and other wealth between the citizens of this country.

14. The proper adjustment of peoples to lands throughout the world is a matter governed by natural evolution. It is an inevitable process. Obstacles may arise in the path of this evolutionary process, such as the English Empire, and turn evolution into revolution, but since the adjustment of peoples to lands is a natural process it is inevitable, and any revolution superinduced by obstacles in the path of evolution must ultimately be successful, no matter how often it may be retarded.

15. The only argument used by those who contend that Germany will be a threat to this continent if successful in Europe is that she conquered Holland, Belgium, and France. This argument is unsound, because all three of these countries have a density of population in excess of that which the country will support, and Germany did not also acquire their colonies. Holland, Belgium, and France, without their colonies, are in the same position as Germany, and it is obvious that Germany did not overrun these countries except for the purpose of enabling her to reach her real enemy, England.

16. The evolutionary (or revolutionary) process will continue until Germany and Italy have acquired the lands necessary to support their people. If they succeed in acquiring these lands in the Eastern Hemisphere, then the process designed to that end will cease to operate, and the Western Hemisphere will be free from possible attack. Only if the process of evolution (or revolution) fails to secure these needed lands in the Eastern Hemisphere will the Western Hemisphere be in danger.

17. Parallel with the process involving the adjustment of peoples to lands is the evolutionary process—greatly accelerated in recent years by improved methods of transportation and intercommunication—of regrouping all peoples and lands of the world into economic and cultural world units. This process is also inevitable, no matter what the obstacles in the path of its development.

18. Assuming that the Netherlands and French possessions—which are located in opposition to the foregoing principle—are now adrift and will ultimately be drawn into the orbit of their respective economic centers, the only remaining obstacle to the readjustment of the world into such economic units is England with her "possessions" protruding into every economic center in the world.

Assuming the foregoing estimate of the present world situation to be correct, what is the proper attitude of the United States, and what may be expected from the performance by it of its true function?

The duty of the United States is:

(1) To remain strictly neutral in regard to the evolutionary (or revolutionary) process going on in Europe and Asia, whose purpose is to secure more land for the people of Germany, Italy, and Japan, with the expectation that they will acquire such lands in Europe, Africa, and Asia.

(2) In respect to the evolutionary process designed to regroup all countries of the world into economic and cultural units, the United States should refrain from assisting, or should help to destroy, the English Empire, whose "possessions" stick into every economic group of the world and retard the regrouping essential to world harmony and economy, and should for the same reason itself withdraw from intrusion into any other economic and cultural center of the world.

(3) To further contribute toward the regrouping of the world by endeavoring to bring about an economic group consisting of the United States, Canada, and the islands adjacent to them.

(4) To encourage the infiltration into South America of those peoples of Europe who are most closely related to us by blood and culture, with a view to the economic and cultural solidarity of the Western Hemisphere.

(5) If the estimate of the situation herein stated is correct, then there is no apprehension of military invasion by any European power; our Navy should be ultimately adequate to independently protect, against alien attack, the entire Western Hemisphere, and our Army should be a small one highly trained and thoroughly equipped.

What may be expected is as follows:

The world divided into economic units, all small nations existing within the orbit and under the protection of their nearest great center; such great economic centers being composed, as far as possible, of peoples of the same races and culture, the United States being one of the economic and cultural centers composed of the United States, Canada, and the islands adjacent thereto, and ultimately South America; these great world groups, being groups composed of culturally and geographically related peoples will naturally and automatically be recognized as supreme within their respective spheres, thus affording the prospect of a long period of world peace and prosperity; amongst such great groups of people will be a Western Hemisphere of cultural and economic solidarity, at peace with all its world friends, and impregnable to all its world enemies, if it should then have any.

The Sources of Our Religious Liberty

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY REV. ROY EARLY

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an article by my good friend, Rev. Roy Early, pastor of the Reynolds Memorial Church, Bristol, Va., on the sources of our religious liberty. Reverend Early is one of our outstanding ministers, a deep student, and I am sure the article will be of interest to a great many people:

THE SOURCES OF OUR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Texts:

"At a great price obtained I this freedom; but Paul said, I was free born."—Acts 22: ii.

I. INTRODUCTION

There is no more important issue in the world today than that of the relation of religion to the state. We have generally assumed in America that the problem of the relationship of the church and state has for us been solved and even in the face of what has been going on in recent years in other countries of the world most Americans are more or less unconcerned about it, at least as far as it affects us.

We were the first Nation in the world to achieve complete religious liberty. And perhaps the greatest contribution we have made, both in the realm of politics as well as in the realm of organized religion, is the achievement of that relationship between church and state which gives to the individual's conscience complete liberty, and to the church assurance of noninterference from the state.

My purpose is to describe those influences which were chiefly responsible for giving to the American people this great boon—religious liberty.

1. At the time of the establishment of the American Colonies there was no country in the world without a state church. Religious uniformity was considered necessary in order to assure the safety of the state. Unity of worship was thought indispensable for the achievement of national unity. This was true of both Protestant as well as Catholic nations. There is a mistaken notion that the reformation brought in religious liberty; that the reformers were advocates of complete tolerance of others. But nothing can be further from the truth. The reformation resulted in the establishment of numerous national Protestant churches, as in England, Scotland, Holland, and in the German and Scandinavian states. And these national churches were generally speaking as intolerant of Roman Catholicism as Roman Catholicism was intolerant of them. We must not forget the terrible code of anti-Catholic laws which were passed during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James the First in England, just as completely as Queen Mary Tudor—we are accustomed to call her Bloody Mary—outlawed Protestants during her reign.

We Protestants must not forget that Protestants have been persecutors as well as the Roman Catholics, persecutions of Protestants by Protestants here in America.

II. WHERE DID RELIGIOUS LIBERTY COME FROM?

Where did the conception of the complete separation of church and state originate? Religious liberty is a relatively recent principle among civilized states.

1. Besides the established state churches which arose out of the Reformation, there arose a number of small sects. In Germany they were generally classified together and called the Ana-Baptists, or those people who held that infant baptism was unscriptural and therefore advocated the necessity of baptizing again when the person reached the age of discretion. They not only advocated rebaptizing but they attempted to establish religious organizations modeled after the early church. They advocated doing away with all the forms and practices which had grown up through the centuries, and they desired to restore the simplicity of both the worship and organization of the Christian church of the first three centuries.

Now, we know that the church during the first three centuries had no relation to the state. In fact, the early church or Christian actually had no legal status until after the Council of Nicea (A. D. 325). Therefore these small sects all stood for complete separation from the state, just as the early Christians stood apart from the state.

It is an interesting fact that the great principles of complete separation of church and state and complete religious liberty have been principally advocated by the small sect and never by the great strong church throughout the Christian centuries.

The English Baptists, a small and despised sect, took over the principles of Ana-Baptists of the Continent and advocated as their first great principle the complete separation of church and state. And be it said for the Baptists, they have never surrendered this their first and greatest principle.

2. A second source of the principle of complete religious liberty came from the seventeenth and eighteenth century political philosophers.

Sir Thomas Moore's Utopia, for instance, is an ideal state where complete religious liberty prevails.

John Locke wrote a series of essays on toleration in the seventeenth century.

3. The Quakers also became the advocates of freedom of conscience. And all the Quaker Colonies in America invited people of all religious opinions to come and settle.

III. HOW DID AMERICA BECOME THE FIRST HOME OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY?

We know that nine of the American Colonies had state churches. In the three New England Colonies of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire congregationalism was established by law. In all the Colonies south of Pennsylvania the English church was established by law. So that in the Quaker Colonies and Rhode Island there were no state churches—only four out of the thirteen.

1. Roger Williams and Rhode Island

Williams had become imbued with separatist's ideas before coming to America and lost no time in advancing his ideas after he arrived in America.

The principle which he held that was most obnoxious to the Massachusetts authorities was that the government had no authority over the consciences of men. That idea struck at the very foundation of the government of Massachusetts and we know the story of banishment.

After his banishment he had a controversy with John Cotton in which he set forth the great principles of complete religious liberty. And Rhode Island became the first civil State (1636) where these principles were actually put into operation.

2. Proprietary grants

Another great factor in creating an environment in the Colonies favorable to religious liberty was the fact that so large a proportion of the Colonies were proprietary grants. That is in such Colonies as Maryland, Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, and Georgia both the land was owned and the government controlled by the individual or a group of individuals, and they could sell their lands to whom they pleased. In fact, they had to sell land in order to make a success of their great ventures. Thus Lord Baltimore, although a good Catholic, invited Protestants as well as Catholics to buy his land. William Penn, although a Quaker, invited all religious groups to his great Colony of Pennsylvania. The proprietors of the Carolinas and Georgia did the same thing. This was a very practical influence leading in the direction of tolerance.

3. America became the sanctuary of the small sect

The fact of the European oppression of all peoples made America the haven of persecuted groups throughout Europe, especially the middle Colonies, but also all of the Colonies actually welcomed these persecuted groups, outside, perhaps, Virginia and Massachusetts.

As we have already stated the small sect has been one of the principal influences in bringing in religious liberty.

4. Unchurched people

A fourth factor creating an environment favorable to religious liberty was the presence of such great numbers of unchurched people.

They made up more than three-fourths of the population at the end of the colonial era. Unchurched people generally are opposed to granting special privileges to any one church. They say, "We believe in all the churches." It is an interesting fact that the leaders in the movement to separate church and state in Virginia at the close of the Revolutionary War were nonchurch members. Men like Jefferson and Madison, yes, and Franklin.

IV. WHEN AND HOW DID SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE COME ABOUT IN AMERICA?

At the close of the American Revolution and with the adoption of the new State constitutions and the Federal Constitution. But the issue of church and state was not an issue in the War for Independence. The new governments simply put into their instruments of governments colonial experiences. Hence the first amendment to the Constitution.

V. CONCLUSION

In these days when all over the world the freedom of conscience and of speech and the press are being destroyed, I think it is one of the grave duties of the Protestant ministry of America to inform their people of the fundamental importance of standing strongly for the preservation of this most basic of all our greatest freedoms, religious liberty and the complete separation of church and state.

Address on Conscription by the Late Champ Clark

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS DELIVERED APRIL 25, 1917

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able speech delivered by that great Speaker of the House of Representatives, the late Champ Clark, who graced the Speaker's chair with great distinction. He was one of our very greatest Speakers. In my first term in Congress—the Sixty-fifth Congress, the war Congress—I had the honor to serve under him.

In volume 55 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, part II, at page 1119, will be found perhaps the greatest speech of his entire career, on conscription. During the first session of that Congress, on April 25, 1917, Champ Clark made clear the American way in military service. I ask my fellow citizens once again to read the eloquent words of this great man, a great statesman and a great American.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 25, 1917]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I desire to announce before I begin that I do not want to be interrupted until I get through, and then I will answer any reasonable and pertinent question that any gentleman wants to ask. I know what I want to say and I want to say it in a connected way. Two things are true beyond the shadow of a doubt:

First. For a Member of the House or Senate to differ with the President of the Republic—any President—is not pleasant. On the contrary, it is painful, especially when the President is one whom you have helped elect. I have made it a rule to always support the President—any President—when I believe he is right, and on doubtful questions give him the benefit of the doubt. Further than that I will not go, so help me Almighty God: Further than that I cannot go and make good the oath that I took when I was sworn into this House. Further than that I cannot go and be true to the principles of representative government. [Applause.] The President of the United States is the most powerful personage in the wide, wide world—more powerful than the Kaiser, Emperor, or King, any other variety of potentate. It is because he is the head of 100,000,000 free people. [Applause.] That is the reason he is powerful. He has his functions to perform and, as far as I have been able to observe, he is not bashful about performing them. [Laughter.] The House and Senate have their functions to perform, and if we are men we will perform them. [Applause.]

When a Member of the House or Senate has thoroughly and conscientiously studied a question with open mind and with all the lights available and has formed a conclusion, he should vote that conclusion, even though it runs counter to the desire of the President. If he does not do that, he is unfit to sit in House or Senate. He should resolutely and courageously do that, be the consequences to him personally what they may. Believing these things, I am about to express my opinion on the pending bill in language as temperate, kindly, and courteous as possible—an opinion arrived at after much investigation and more thought. I regret exceedingly that I cannot agree with the President and his advisers on everything in this bill. But this is still a free country, and free speech has not yet been prohibited in the House of Representatives. For many years I have served the people in various positions of trust, always with perfect fidelity and with whatever capacity God has blessed me. I shall continue to do so to the end, whether that be near or far.

Second. We have entered into a great war—upon a stupendous undertaking. That being the case, this House will vote every man and every dollar needed to press it to a speedy and successful conclusion. On that we are all agreed, and anybody anywhere who disputes that pregnant fact grossly misrepresents a large number of men in House and Senate who are honestly endeavoring to discharge their duties. The only thing about which we debate is how best to accomplish the desired end; how most efficaciously to serve our country and our kind. The principal differences betwixt the contending forces here is this: One side wants a conscription and conscription only; nothing else will satisfy them. The other desires to give patriotic men of military age a chance to demonstrate their courage and their patriotism by volunteering within a reasonable time before the conscription mill is started grinding. Why any man should be denounced by all the vile names found in the dictionaries and by some not admitted to any dictionary and heard only in the stews for supporting either one of the two propositions is utterly beyond my comprehension. Those in favor of giving the traditional volunteer system a chance have never abused or denounced those in favor of conscription. All the foul abuse and malicious slanders are directed against the men who advocate giving a fair, reasonable trial of the old volunteer system which gained us victory in all our wars. [Applause.] It is astounding, and it is a safe and cowardly performance at a distance—much safer than to attempt it at a space of 3 feet. [Applause.] I am unreservedly in favor of the volunteer amendment to the Army bill. [Applause.] Mr. Dent and the majority of his committee deserve great credit for reporting it, notwithstanding the pressure and blandishments used to induce them not to do so. I do not in any way impeach the integrity or the patriotism of the minority who want conscription, notwithstanding they fly squarely in the face not only of our own history but of the history of all English-speaking peoples; but why should Chairman Dent and the majority of the Military Committee be assailed with inhuman rancor because they stand for the American doctrine of giving an opportunity for the brave, the patriotic, to volunteer to fight for their country?

Of all men, Missourians should be the foremost to defend the volunteer system, for Missouri is the only State in the Union to send more than her full quota—without a draft, mark you—into both the Union and Confederate Armies. [Applause.] That is a record to which there is no parallel in all history. In 1860 her total vote was only 165,518; yet she sent 111,000 volunteers into the Union Army and, as nearly as can be ascertained, 50,000 volunteers into the Confederate Army, a grand total of 161,000 volunteers [applause], and there can be no question that she will do her full share in this emergency if only given a chance. [Applause.]

Now, when some of these high conscriptionists undertake to give the records of their States let them give one that will approach that. For a chance for that imperial Commonwealth to have the glorious privilege of raising her full quota of her brave and gallant sons by the volunteer system instead of being dragged into the Army by the scruff of their necks, I humbly pray the American Congress. [Applause.] I protest with all my heart and mind and soul against having the slur of being a conscript placed upon the men of Missouri. In the estimation of Missourians there is precious little difference between a conscript and a convict. [Applause.] Missourians wish to serve shoulder to shoulder, elbow to elbow, heart to heart with their neighbors, friends, and kindred and do not desire to be broken up into small squads and distributed among strangers from distant localities. Wounded, their neighbors would render first aid. Sick, their friends would minister unto them. Dead, their friends and neighbors would bury them. Homesick and discouraged, their comrades would cheer them up. All history teaches that men fight better under such circumstances. There cannot be any question about it. You cannot produce any single great military name that will deny it. Some of these carpet knights may do so. [Laughter.] They want the folks back home to know that they discharged the duties of a soldier bravely, faithfully, and well, even unto death. Whatever else may be said of the Germans, nobody save an incorrigible and congenital idiot will deny that they fight well and know something about warfare. Pick up any newspaper, and what do you see? The Bavarian troops; the Saxon troops; the Brandenburg division; the Potsdam guards; the Wurttemberg infantry; and so on through all the 26 states comprising the Empire and their subdivisions. Fighting thus a pride of home is cultivated, thereby increasing their gallantry and their efficiency. So in the British Army troops have local designations such as "The Scotch Greys," which twice in their experience have been almost absolutely destroyed; Princess Pat's Regiment, which has been nearly wiped out in Europe.

Why not have Missouri troops at least in companies, regiments, and brigades; Illinois troops; Kentucky troops; and so on through all the States?

It is asserted, however, that such arranging of units, such as I have suggested, into Missourians, Kentuckians, Kansans, Mississippians, and so forth, will be made. My friends, be not deceived by such talk. It is a tub to the whale—a sop to Cerberus, a blind for your eyes, a snare for your feet, a trap for the unwary—merely that, and nothing more. [Applause.] Why do I say that? Because the Senate is this very moment considering the War Department bill without the volunteer feature and without local units. The newspapers say that it will pass the Senate in the precise shape in which it was sent to the Senate by the War Department. What they hope is that we will turn down the majority of the House Committee on Military Affairs and swallow the War Department bill—hook, line, and sinker. Failing to ram it down our throats in open fight here on the floor of the House, they hope to induce the conferees to give them what they want. If they have their way, there is no more chance for the organization of troops by State units than there is for us to be translated in chariots of fire after the manner of the prophet Elijah. [Applause.]

It is maliciously asserted that we who desire to give the volunteers a chance to serve their country are endeavoring to retard the creation of an army. That is simply preposterous, and if I did not want to keep within the bounds of parliamentary language I would make it a great deal stronger than that. [Applause.] On the contrary, the call for volunteers would hasten the formation of an army. It is understood that War Department officials say that it will require from 3 to 5 months to set the draft going. Why not then call for volunteers at once and secure a large volunteer army while preparing for the draft? [Applause.] Clearly it is those who oppose calling for volunteers and not those favoring the volunteers who are delaying the formation of an army.

Another thing, if the President had the day after the war was declared asked Congress to authorize him to call for 500,000 volunteers or even a million, both Houses would have passed the bill in 48 hours, and by this time he would have thousands of volunteers in camp and in training. [Loud applause.]

But it is said in answer to all this that anyone desiring to volunteer can enlist in the Standing Army! That is no answer at all, because it is a very different thing to serve as a volunteer with volunteers and to serve in the Standing Army. There is no use to give the reasons. [Applause.] They exist and intelligent people understand them full well.

Another serious objection to the War Department bill is the conscription age limit of 19 to 25. If we are to have conscription, it should apply to all men of military age. And if it did there would not be such a hullabaloo in certain quarters. When I went out to Chicago on St. Patrick's Day to make a speech to the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick—I think that is the name of the society—a reporter came to the hotel to interview me about this war. I did not want to be interviewed: I was not in a talkative humor. I said, "I wish all the editors of this country who are shouting for war could be put into the front rank." [Applause.] I think that interview was never published. [Applause and laughter.]

Why single out boys who were too young to vote for President and Representatives? They had nothing to do with bringing on the war, and why should they not be of the exempted classes in this selective or seductive conscription, so they may finish their educations, thereby fitting themselves for the duties of citizenship? [Applause.]

Consistency is rated as a jewel. I have always thought that it is better to be right and inconsistent than to be consistent and wrong. However that may be, I beg leave to call to your attention the most delicious piece of inconsistency ever put into print since Gutenberg invented movable types.

All of us read the Washington Post, and it is a bright paper. All of us know that it is one of the stanchest advocates of conscription to be found betwixt the two seas. Homer sometimes nods, and surely the Post editor nodded when he wrote the leader in the issue of Sunday, April 22.

Here is an excerpt from it—all that is pertinent to this discussion:

"THE ROOSEVELT VOLUNTEERS

"Officers in the War Department are said to be opposed to granting permission to Col. Theodore Roosevelt to raise a division of volunteers for early service in France, because they think it would be inconsistent with the plan for raising a Regular Army by selective draft.

"If this objection were valid, Colonel Roosevelt's patriotic offer should be declined.

"But where is there any inconsistency? Where would the two plans conflict, and how?"

Roosevelt is a fighting man. Nobody denies that. I think a great deal of him, because he knows a little about more things than any other human being I ever clapped my eyes on. [Laughter.] And he is not mealy-mouthed about telling it, either. [Laughter.]

"Colonel Roosevelt proposes to raise a division of volunteers, to be commanded by Regular Army officers. He proposes to accept men above the age of 25, who would not be subject to draft."

But they ought to put into parentheses "Regular Army officers under him."

"He proposes to accept men above the age of 25, who would not be subject to draft."

In that he is entirely correct.

"The President's plan for selective draft would not be affected in the slightest degree by raising a division of volunteers."

If it will not be infringed upon in the slightest degree by raising one division of volunteers, how would it be infringed upon by raising a hundred times a thousand volunteers? [Applause.] Then he says:

"The President's plan for selective draft would not be affected in the slightest degree by raising a division of volunteers."

That is what Professor Squeers, of Dotheboy's Hall, would denominate "richness." I am reasonably certain that could Isaac Disraeli return to earth and get out a new and enlarged edition of his Curiosities of Literature he would give a prominent place to the foregoing excerpt from the Post. Colonel Roosevelt is one of the most famous Americans, but is not giving him a division of volunteers a clear infringement of the selective draft? Why should the honor of volunteer service be granted to him and denied to all other American citizens? There is no question about his fighting qualities; but there are others. [Applause.]

Now, there is another thing: Nor will the statement, oft repeated in the public press and in debate, that the volunteers will be less efficient than conscripts, because they will elect their own officers, and in many cases elect incompetent men, stand for an instant the light of truth. Under the present Volunteer Act the officers would be taken from the Officers' Reserve Corps, selected by the War Department after proper examination. In fact, a volunteer army would be officered in exactly the same way that the conscript army would be.

Another thing: These gentlemen insist that they would have to drill an army if you would have conscripts. Now, will some of them rise and state how it happens that they can drill conscripts, who do not want to go into war at all, any quicker than they can drill volunteers? What is the sense in that sort of twaddle? [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I am going to read a few words from an old document. I am not certain but that I ought to apologize for reading it at all. Nevertheless I am going to read it. It is the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] It is an instrument that Gladstone said was the greatest performance ever struck from the human mind at one time, an instrument at whose making George Washington presided. And by the way, he was simply a plain volunteer. [Applause.] He was not a Regular Army officer. He was not a conscript, bless your soul! [Applause.] And while I am at it, and while it has nothing in the world to do with this debate, I am going to give you briefly my opinion about him; and, that is, that we do not do him honor enough, even yet. [Applause.] In my judgment he rendered greater service to his country and to the cause of human liberty as the President of the Constitutional Convention than he did either as Commander in Chief of the Army or as President of the United States. [Applause.] If it had not been for his vast influence we never would have had any Constitution agreed upon, and if it had not been for the certainty that he would be the first President they never would have ratified it. [Applause.] They came mighty near not ratifying it anyhow.

I want to read to you from the Constitution. I still believe we are living under the Constitution. [Applause.] Here is what it says about armies; it is in the eighth section of article I, where the powers of Congress are granted:

"To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years.

"To provide and maintain a navy.

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions."

That is prefatory. Then—"to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

My fellow Representatives, has the Constitution of the United States also become "a mere scrap of paper"? [Applause.]

There was once a man in this country named Ulysses Simpson Grant, who had some vogue as a soldier. I take it that those who are howling for conscription and nothing but conscription would rather take the opinion of these modern carpet knights than that of the silent soldier. So far as I am concerned, I pin my faith in this matter to the invincible warrior. In his memoirs, by the way, one of the most readable books in our vernacular, he says:

"While at Cairo I had frequent opportunities of meeting the rebel officers of the Columbus garrison. They seemed to be very fond of coming up on steamers under flags of truce. On two or three occasions I went down in like manner. When one of their boats was seen coming up carrying a white flag a gun would be fired from the lower battery at Fort Holt, throwing a shot across the bow as a signal to come no farther. I would then take a steamer and, with my staff and occasionally a few other officers, go down to receive the party. There were several officers among them whom I had known before, both at West Point and in Mexico. Seeing these officers, who had been educated for the profession of arms both at school and in actual war, which is a far more efficient training, impressed me with the great advantage the South possessed over the North at the beginning of the rebellion. They had from 30 to 40 percent of the educated soldiers of the Nation.

"They had no standing army, and consequently these trained soldiers had to find employment with the troops from their own States. In this way what there was of military education and training was distributed throughout their whole army. The whole loaf was leavened.

"The North had a greater number of educated and trained soldiers, but the bulk of them were still in the Army and were retained generally with their old commands and rank until the war had lasted many months. In the Army of the Potomac there was what was known as the 'regular brigade,' in which, from the commanding officer down to the youngest second lieutenant, everyone was educated to his profession. So, too, with many of the batteries; all of the officers, generally four in number to each, were men educated for their profession. Some of these went into battle at the beginning under division commanders who were entirely without military training. This state of affairs gave me an idea, which I expressed while at Cairo: That the Government ought to disband the Regular Army, with the exception of the Staff Corps, and notify the disbanded officers that they would receive no compensation while the war lasted except as volunteers. The register should be kept up, but the names of all officers who were not in the volunteer service at the close should be stricken from it."

Now, gentlemen, I take it that the witness is competent, and that he is intelligent about the things he is talking about; and it strikes me that we had better pay some attention to such men as that rather than to a lot of fellows that have never been under fire.

I want to read now an article that was published in the Baltimore Evening Sun. It is signed by a veteran. I read:

"HARK, FROM THE TOMBS COME AN ARGUMENT AND A SONG ABOUT EQUAL IN QUALITY

"To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

"SIR: Within the last 6 months a great deal has been said about Regulars, volunteers, and drafted men. Nearly every old soldier of the Union Army knows that during the Civil War the volunteer regiments did more than nine-tenths of the fighting. In Fox's report of the 300 regiments that did nearly all the fighting, he has 296 volunteer regiments, 4 regiments of Regulars, and no drafted regiments."

They would not put them in the front. [Applause.] They were afraid to trust them. [Applause.] I read further:

"Also, of the 46 regiments that lost between 200 and 300 killed in action, the whole 46 were volunteer regiments. Pennsylvania's share was 11, nearly one-fourth; and a New Hampshire regiment had the highest number (298) killed in action. No regiment reached 500 killed in action. The old song that I sang in wartimes—

" 'Our troops are the best the world ever saw;
Our men are the bravest that ever went to war;
Our people they are good wherever you go;
Our boys, they are fast, and our girls, they are not slow.' "

Chorus:

" 'Then hoist up the flag,' etc.

"VET.

"BALTIMORE, April 17."

[Laughter and applause.]

One of the very best books ever written about the Civil War—I think Gen. Dick Taylor's Destruction and Reconstruction is the best—is a book entitled, "Stonewall Jackson in the American Civil War," by Colonel Henderson. I advise all of you who think well of the American volunteer to get it and read it. Here is what he said—and remember he was a colonel in the British Army:

"Of the prowess of Lee's veterans sufficient has been said. Their deeds speak for themselves. But it was not the battlefield alone that bore witness to their fortitude. German soldiers have told us that in the war of 1870, when their armies, marching on Paris, found, to their astonishment, the great city strongly garrisoned and hosts gathering in every quarter for its relief, a singular apathy took possession of the troops. The explanation offered by a great military writer is that 'after a certain period even the victor becomes tired of war;' and 'the more civilized,' he adds, 'a people is, the more quickly will this weakness become apparent.' Whether this explanation be adequate is not easy to decide. The fact remains, however, that the Confederate volunteer was able to overcome that longing for home which chilled the enthusiasm of the German conscript. And this is the more remarkable inasmuch as his career was not one of unchequered victory. In the spring of 1863 the Army of the Potomac, more numerous than ever, was still before him firmly established on Virginian soil; hope of foreign intervention, despite the assurances of the politicians, was gradually fading, and it was but too evident that the war was far from over. Yet at no time during their 2 years of service had the soldiers shown the slightest sign of that discouragement which seized the Germans after 2 months. And who shall dare to say that the southerner was less highly civilized than the Prussian or the Bavarian? Political liberty, freedom of speech and action, are the real elements of civilization, and not merely education. But let the difference in the constitution of the two armies be borne in mind. The Confederates, with few exceptions, were volunteers"—

[Applause]—

"who had become soldiers of their own choice, who had assumed arms deliberately and without compulsion, and who by their own votes were responsible that war had been declared. The Germans were conscripts, a dumb, powerless, irresponsible multitude, animated, no doubt, by hereditary hatred of the enemy but without that sense of moral obligation which exists in the volunteer. We may be permitted, then, to believe that this sense of moral obligation was one reason why the spirit of the southerners rose superior to human weakness and that the old adage which declares that 'one volunteer is better than three pressed men' "—

[Applause.]

I wish you gentlemen would recollect who it is that is saying this—a trained soldier of the British Army, who observed the war with the eye of a military critic.

"We may be permitted, then, to believe that this sense of moral obligation was one reason why the spirit of the southerners rose superior to human weakness, and that the old adage which declares that 'one volunteer is better than three pressed men' is not yet out of date."

[Applause.]

I do not know whether Colonel Henderson is dead or not. I hope he is not. If he is alive, it will make his eyes pop open like morning glories when he finds out what they are trying to do here. [Applause.]

"Nor is it an unfair inference that the armies of the Confederacy allied by the 'crimson thread of kinship' to those of Wellington, of Raglan, and of Clyde, owed much of their enduring fortitude to 'the rock whence they were hewn.' "

I stand on these quotations from General Grant and Colonel Henderson without any ceremony, and put them against every word that has been said in this country, high or low, in favor of conscription. [Applause.] And with those two witnesses only I might close the evidence on our side.

But I want to read to you another little piece. One of the greatest writers on army matters that ever lived in any country, and who has written a great many books, is Col. F. N. Maude, of the British Army. Whether he is the man who is the conqueror of Mesopotamia and the capturer of Bagdad I do not know, but he is a British colonel, at any rate. Here is just a short extract from him. After telling what the British have done he says:

"What more in numbers could compulsion have afforded us; and what about the quality? After the distinction already won by many territorial units in the field"—

You know what territorials are—

"it is hardly necessary to say anything on this point, and as to the regulars, also volunteers, we will let the Prussian Guards and the German staff tells us now what they really think of our armies. Compulsion had done all that it could do, and more than even the best Prussian dared to expect, for their troops. It has carried them forward to almost certain death in a manner which has exacted the admiration of all our men and officers; but at that critical moment when the fate of empires hangs in the balance it has always failed them, and our men—territorials and regulars alike—"

And he takes pains to say that the regulars are volunteers—"territorials and regulars alike have sprung forward upon them with the bayonet with a determination never dreamt of in warfare since the days of Waterloo and the Peninsula."

Now, my friends, some gentlemen with more zeal than discretion have been trying to make out that everybody who is in favor of the volunteers is in some strange manner attacking the President of the United States and opposing him. We are not doing anything of the sort. We are supporting him better than they are, and I am going to prove it by him. [Applause.] He might not acknowledge it, but nevertheless it is true. This may be a little dry, but it is what Horace Greeley would have called "mighty rich reading."

In the months of January and February 1916, there took place considerable correspondence between Secretary of War Lindley M. Garrison and President Wilson over certain measures proposed for preparation for national defense. Secretary Garrison indorsed and warmly advocated the continental army plan of the General Staff as opposed to the National Guard plan proposed by Mr. Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee.

You all know Hay. He is one of the ablest men we have had in Congress in some years. [Applause.]

The Hay plan, Secretary Garrison declared in a letter to President Wilson bearing date of January 12, 1916, was the entire abandonment of the idea of a Federal force of national volunteers. He added:

"There is unfortunately very little knowledge and very little intense personal interest in any Members of the House concerning military affairs."

It has always astonished me that men who know everything, who could pass a tariff bill overnight, who can pass any other great measure while you wait, do not come down here and get into one House or the other of Congress. [Laughter.] About 2 years ago, when we had up the Federal Reserve bank bill, one of these men came into my room and was telling me that we were all a lot of lunkheads in both the House and Senate, and he kept on in that way until I got somewhat warm. I said, "I have always wanted to know why men like you young Solomons, who know everything instantly, right off the bat, and do not have to investigate anything, do not get elected to Congress and come down here and do these things." He said, "Why, everybody does not want to come to Congress." I said, "There are not a thousand men in the United States who, if they could, would not come either to the House or the Senate." [Applause.] "And I will tell you the reason you do not come down here and get into the House or the Senate, because you cannot get votes enough." [Laughter and applause.] "People have not confidence enough in you." I have not heard anything out of him since. [Laughter and applause.]

Secretary Garrison urged upon the President the imperative necessity of his seeking an occasion at the earliest possible moment to declare himself with respect to the matter, and in doing so to make it clear beyond peradventure that nothing excepting national forces, raised by the Nation and subject to its exclusive authority, responsibility, and control, is any real settlement of this issue.

To this letter the President replied on the 17th of January 1916, following, in part, as follows:

"I am not irrevocably or dogmatically committed to any one plan of providing the Nation with such a reserve, and am cordially willing to discuss alternative proposals."

On February 9, 1916, Secretary Garrison wrote the President that he desired to be informed of the determination reached by him with respect to the so-called Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill—to which he was also unalterably opposed—and to the continental army bill.

On February 10, 1916, the President wrote Secretary Garrison in part as follows:

"As I have had occasion to say to you, I am not yet convinced that the measure of preparation for national defense which we deem necessary can be obtained through the instrumentality of the National Guard under Federal control and training, but I feel in duty bound to keep my mind open to conviction. The bill in which it will be embodied has not yet been drawn, as I learned today from Mr. Hay. I should deem it a very serious mistake to shut the door against this attempt on the part of the committee in perfect good faith to meet the essentials of the program set forth in my message, but in a way of their own choosing. As you know, I do not at all agree with you in favoring compulsory enlistment for training, and I fear the advocacy of compulsion before the committee of the House on the part of representatives of the Department of War has greatly prejudiced the House against the proposal for a continental army, little necessary connection as there is between the plan and the opinion of the Chief of Staff of compulsory enlistment."

Upon receipt of the above letter Secretary Garrison immediately tendered his resignation as Secretary of War, and it was promptly accepted by the President.

In the account of Secretary Garrison's resignation, published in the Washington Post of February 11, 1916, that paper stated that the President declined "to take any irrevocable stand on the ground that it would not be proper for him to say to a committee of Congress that it would have to take his plan or none. He declared he did not believe Members of the House dealing with military affairs were ignorant of the military necessities of the Nation, but had found them well informed.

Should a bill be presented to him which he could not accept as accomplishing the essential thing sought, he said, it would be his duty to veto it and go to the country on the merits.

Now, I say, we come nearer to backing up his well-considered opinion than Brother Kahn and his conferees. I want to read another sentence or two from the President. He is a great and good man. He writes with a great deal of facility. There has not been a more skillful artist hold of the English language in a century than he.

On Memorial Day, May 30, 1916, he made a speech at Arlington. In that speech he used these refreshing words:

"I have heard a great many people talk about universal training. Universal voluntary training with all my heart, if you wish it, but America does not wish anything but compulsion of the spirit of America."

Those words were fitly spoken and are "like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

Now, I challenge Brother Kahn, who is the head and center of this thing. It reminds me of the knighting of an Englishman, "Kneel, Julius; rise up, Sir Julius." [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say in all seriousness that if this conscription fad is to be put on the American people there are two men in this House who deserve more credit for it than any other two men on top of the ground. One is the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn] and the other is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner]. I am in favor of giving the devil his due. [Laughter and applause.]

For several years there has been a systematic effort in Congress, in certain clubs in this city, in many newspapers, by some public speakers, and in sundry magazines to belittle, depreciate, and minimize the American volunteer. I resent such performance in the name of the living and the dead, in the name of the brave men who gave us our freedom and who have maintained it, in the name of the volunteers who have shed imperishable luster upon American arms and upon the American Republic. Our Regulars have always done well, but there have been few of them by comparison. God knows that I have not the slightest disposition to disparage them; but after all due honor has been done to the Regulars, the fact remains that the volunteer has done most of our fighting.

The American volunteer is one of the glories of the Republic. Under young George Washington he saved the remnants of Braddock's army from destruction. In the French and Indian War he fought side by side with the British regulars. From April 19, 1775, when on the village green of Lexington and at the Concord Bridge the embattled farmers and the minutemen of Massachusetts fired the shot heard around the world down to the last shot in the Spanish-American War, the American volunteer has been a very present help in every time of trouble. He made Bunker Hill a name to conjure with forever. He captured Burgoyne at Saratoga. He upheld Washington amid the horrors of Valley Forge; he destroyed the Hessians at Trenton; he achieved the astounding victory at Kings Mountain against Ferguson's British regulars, thereby turning the tide of the Revolutionary War. On a hundred fields, sometimes victorious, sometimes defeated, hungry, naked, footsore, and weary, he fought on with dogged pertinacity until he stood with the glorious and victorious Washington on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown, where Jefferson's declaration was made good and America was free indeed. [Applause.]

The critics of the American volunteer are always harping on the rout of a handful of untrained militia at Bladensburg by British regulars; why do they never, even by accident, mention General Harrison's splendid men at the River Thames? How does it happen that they never can remember Andrew Jackson, and how at New Orleans, with 5,500 untrained backwoods volunteers armed with flintlock, muzzle-loading rifles, he defeated Wellington's Peninsular army, who had snatched the iron crown of Charlemagne from the brow of Napoleon. That was the most amazing piece of shooting done by any army in any battle anywhere since the invention of gunpowder. And God be praised. American volunteers did it. [Applause.] But, strange to tell, these belittlers of the American volunteer are silent as the voiceless grave when it comes to Andrew Jackson and New Orleans. God forbid them for their lack of appreciation of the heroic deeds of the brave men who won imperishable renown on that bloody field.

The volunteer was our chief reliance in the war with Mexico. He conquered at Buena Vista, Churubusco, and Chapultepec, and placed the starry banner of the Republic on the palace of the Montezumas. In that war Col. Alexander Doniphan, with 1,100 green Missouri volunteers, marched from Fort Leavenworth, Kans., conquered Arizona, New Mexico, and Chihuahua, fighting dozens of battles, never losing even a skirmish, though frequently fighting 10 times his own numbers, and finally reported to General Taylor, ragged, hungry, but invincible, on the red field of Monterey—the most astounding march in the annals of war.

That is what a Missourian could do. The march of Xenophon and his 10,000 has been proclaimed by historians for 30 centuries, because he had sense enough to write a book giving an account of his own performances; but here is this brave Missourian, who made the most astounding march in the history of the human race, and Xenophon with his 10,000 is not a marker to it, and his glorious name does not appear in some of the great American encyclopedias. Why, if he had been a Massachusetts man, followed by Massachusetts volunteers, the world would hardly contain the books that would have been written about it. [Laughter.] I am a Missourian, thank God, and proud to be a countryman of Doniphan.

In the Civil War the volunteer did nine-tenths of the fighting on both sides. It is said that men will not volunteer; but nevertheless there was no draft until the North and the South had raised about 2,000,000 men—the best soldiers the sun has looked upon in 6,000 years of slaughter. At the first tap of the drum an entire people sprang to arms. We had, North and South, then only 33,000,000 people; now we have more than 100,000,000. Why doubt their love of country? Where is the man with sufficient temerity to stand up in a public place and assert that the volunteers who fought in the Civil War on both sides were not first-class soldiers? Who will dare to say that the men who charged with Pickett up the slippery slopes of Gettysburg or the men in blue who rallied around George H. Thomas, the Rock of Chickamaugua, for three dreadful days did not rise to the highest standard of military excellence? American volunteers, God bless them every one! [Applause.]

"On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead."

If this stupendous war continues long, conscription may become necessary; but in the light of the history of English-speaking people we contend that it is not necessary now. Conscription has always been repugnant to men of our blood. [Applause.] In this very war Great Britain never ordered a conscription until she had raised 5,000,000 volunteers, a somewhat sizable army, certainly; and not one British conscript is fighting on the Continent now.

Canada, with only 7,000,000 population, 3,000,000 less than that of New York, has sent 400,000 volunteers across the sea. The Canadians have done such splendid deeds as to fill the world with their acclaim, and Canada has done her full share without a draft and will have none of it. The Australians and New Zealanders have furnished their full quotas and acquitted themselves handsomely without a draft, and refused the draft on a referendum vote.

Why do gentlemen doubt the courage and the patriotism of the present generation of Americans? There is not a scintilla of evidence that we have degenerated into a race of cowards or mollycoddles. As for myself, I love to think well of my countrymen.

Patrick Henry said:

"I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience."

The poet Campbell expanded Henry's thought into these lines:

"Go watch the wheels of Nature's mazy plan
And read the future from the past of man."

Assuming that the great lyric orator and the great Scotch poet were correct in formulating a rule for predicting human action, why do gentlemen jump to the conclusion that Americans of our time will fail in their full measure of duty and service in this time of stress? What right have they to assume any such preposterous condition of things? Our fathers did their duty; we will do ours, never fear.

"For we are the same our fathers have been,
We see the same sights our fathers have seen;
We drink the same streams and view the same sun
And run the same course our fathers have run."

I am sure that the House will pardon a word purely personal. My only living son is, with my full consent, going into the Army in any capacity in which he can be useful, either as an officer or a private. [Applause.] Of course, I hate to see him go, but he thinks it his duty, and I would not have it otherwise. Naturally he is dear to me—no dearer to me than other men's sons to them. I hope and pray that when the hour may come when he is subjected to the ordeal of fire, he may go into battle not by the side of the slackers and loafers whom the advocates of this bill say they desire to reach, but shoulder to shoulder with free men who serve gladly, willingly, to fight for the honor, the safety, and the perpetuity of this Republic. Should he fall, I want the privilege of carving on his tombstone these words: "This man, a Missouri volunteer, died fighting for his country." [Prolonged applause.]

EXCERPTS FROM ARTICLE IN LITERARY DIGEST

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I have included excerpts from an article appearing in the Literary Digest, February 6, 1937, and excerpts from other magazines which further expose international intrigue. These excerpts are self-explanatory, so I shall refrain from making further comments, but shall ask those who are interested in what is happening behind the scenes to read the statements.

[Copied from an article in the Literary Digest of February 6, 1937, p. 12]

PLOTTERS' PLEA: MEXICO RECEIVES TROTZKY; MOSCOW MINIONS NEAR LIQUIDATION BY STALIN

To high strung, wordy Lyoff Davidovitch Trotzky (born Bronstein), God-of-the-Russian Revolution, Nicolai Lenin turned in 1918 as the best available man to transform a demoralized, officerless, uniformed rabble into a disciplined Red Army of 5,000,000 men.

By 1924 War Commissar Trotzky was convinced that his army, like Von Moltke's was ready to the last button, that it had only to march across western Europe, gathering force as it progressed from revolution to revolution, to create a Soviet State extending from the Pacific Ocean to the Rhine.

Only thus, he believed, by spreading, as Islamism spreads theoretically, in a state of permanent holy war, could communism survive. Confined to Russia only, he declared, it would shrink like the wild ass's skin, until Russia would revert to capitalism. * * *

Exercising the perogatives of war minister, Trotzky left Moscow in 1924 for a cure in the Caucasus Mountains to rest his nerves. Before he got there Lenin died. * * *

In the councils following the red god's demise, from which Trotzky was absent, Stalin fought the expansion plan.

"Let the rest of the world remain capitalist if it wishes," he said. "To consolidate socialism in Russia, to make Russia strong" * * * that was the safer way.

STALIN WON

It was a long quarrel. But within a year Stalin had won, had, moreover, made himself sufficiently powerful in the central executive committee of the Communist Party to dispose of Trotzky in any way he chose. * * *

Trotzky gone, Stalin * * * concentrated on industrialization of Russia's vast expanses on collectivizing its agriculture, on making the "red" army even stronger than Trotzky left it. * * *

By 1932 Trotzky, graying as he was shunted from border to border, was surer than ever that he was right and Stalin wrong. Before his very eyes, it seemed, the bright red of Soviet was fading to pink, threatening to pale to white. Stalin, he was certain, was becoming like any other nationalist dictator, differing only in detail from Il Duce and Der Fuehrer. Unless something were done, the dream of Lenin would soon be completely gone.

Stalin had promised Washington to stop "red" propaganda in America, had made an alliance with capitalist France, instructed French Communists to halt their plans for a "red" uprising. Obviously. * * *

OLD THEORY

By smuggled letters, by verbal messages carried in by sympathetic travelers, he got word to his old friends that he was about to bring "active opposition" to Stalin from without. * * *

Stalin must be overthrown by reapplication of the old Bolshevist theory of seizure of power through violence, by a small, well-organized, determined minority. * * *

Bit by bit the exile built up, inside Russia, not a machine but the skeleton of a machine, hardly more than a web, composed, as would be expected, of (1) men he had known during Soviet Russia's early years; (2) intellectuals, like himself; (3) men who for the most part were, like himself, Jews. * * *

Even their slender threadlike web caught the attention of the G. P. U. within 2 years after it began to spread. * * *

Treason? Not ultimately, the accused explained. Once Stalin was out of the way, they would begin the world revolution all over again—the revolution to which Stalin himself was a traitor.

To bring about Stalin's defeat they would poison and infect troop trains, had already wrecked trains, blocked mines, blown up factories. Out of the confusion they would re-create Lenin's dream.

AMERICAN JEWRY'S RESPONSIBLE POSITION

2. As for the special role of the American Jews during the war, it is generally realized here that very responsible duties will now fall on Jewry in the United States in every field of activity. * * * Of one thing European Jewry can rest assured and that is that the American Zionist and Jewish leaders will stand on their guard to protect Jewish interests in war-stricken Europe. Together with many non-Jewish Americans the Jews here will also back the movement for changing the American neutrality law in a manner which will enable the United States of America to give material help to the democratic countries in their struggle against Nazi tyranny.

[From editorial in the same number, p. 6]

Above all it is in Palestine that the Jewish people has the will and opportunity to render important service. The Yishuv (Jewish Community) has lost no time in making plain where it stands. Its strength can be doubled and trebled from the outside if the British Government gives the word. Jewish Palestine is ready and able to assume responsibilities which would mean a significant accession of strength to the Allied forces. We cannot doubt that the British Government will have the imagination to make full use of an opportunity to add to its manpower and resources. The Jewish people at any rate is ready.

[From the Zionist Review September 13, 1939 (Jewish New Year number), p. 10]

Dr. Weizmann's letter to the Prime Minister pledging Jewish support and Mr. Chamberlain's reply will take their place in Jewish history side by side with the famous letter of Lord Balfour to the late Lord Rothschild. At that time Lord Balfour had some difficulty in knowing to whom to address this historic message.

Not so in the present case. Dr. Weizmann as president of the Jewish agency is the acknowledged and accepted leader of the Jewish people, and speaks with the same authority on their behalf as does President Benes on behalf of the Czechs.

What is more, the Jewish leader has in this instance the backing of every section of Jewish thought. It is premature to talk of the * * * form such support will take, but from what I hear from America on the one side and Palestine on the other I do not see it stop short at anything that may be demanded.

[From Correspondence From America, p. 13]

As for the Jews in America, they are all wholeheartedly siding with the democracies and they are fully confident that after the war Britain will not fail in producing a solution of the Palestine problem acceptable both to the Jews and Arabs.

Many American Jews are also anxious to do a great deal more for the democratic countries than merely demand here the amendment of the American Neutrality Act in their favor. They want to fight in Europe for the cause of democracy.

[From the Zionist Review, September 28, 1939, p. 3]

AMERICAN JEWS AND THE NEUTRALITY ACT

American Jewry is watching with keen interest the great campaign opened by President Roosevelt for the amendment of the United States of America Neutrality Act in favor of Great Britain and France. The overwhelming majority of the Jews here side with the President against the extreme isolationists, as they are very keen that America should give material assistance to the Allies in their war against Hitler.

JEWRY'S TASKS—PROBLEMS OF THE PRESENT EMERGENCY

(By David Ben Burion, member Executive Jewish Agency)

* * * As I understand them, our tasks at present are as follows: In the first place, we must secure the continuation and increase of Jewish immigration in Palestine. * * *

Our second main task is the extension of our land possessions.

The third imperative need at the moment is military cooperation with Great Britain. * * * Nor is it only a common enemy that has linked the Jewish people with Great Britain. The Jews can never forget that, of all the nations in the world, the British was the first to recognize us as a nation, and the first to confirm the historical connection which binds the Jewish people to its fatherland. * * * Our entire fate is bound up with that of Great Britain. Her war is our war.

When a state of war was declared to exist between Great Britain and Germany, we recognized instinctively our place in this world conflict, despite the "difference of opinion" on Palestine policy which existed between us and the British Government.

The fourth vital point we have to keep in mind is independence. If, for whatever reasons, war operations are extended, involving us directly, we must appear as a Jewish Nation. The military help we can offer to Great Britain and her allies must be offered, not as the casual assistance of a number of individuals, but as the active help of a single unit. Not individual Jews, but Judea will count among the helpers. There is at present no independent Judea in existence among the comity of nations. But it exists in our hearts and our souls. And if that is our desire, it can be translated into concrete facts.

It is not as a subject people that we shall participate in this struggle. Palestine is a mandatory country in which we have settled as Jews. We are sons of the Jewish Nation and only as sons of the Jewish people and as its representatives shall be allies of the British forces, fighting together in our common struggle.

[Excerpts from Money, Politics, and the Future, by H. T. Mills, published by the Boswell Publishing Co., 10 Essex Street, London, W. C. 2, England]

Search all history and you will find money in the background of events. This fact is disguised, of course. Helen of Troy was made the excuse for tension resulting in war between Trojan and Greek. The equivalent of the "popular press" of those days saw to that. * * * We find that the real cause of the rebellion of the American Colonies was purely economic and monetary, while from 1807, Napoleon, according to his own admissions in writing to Caulaincourt, realized that it was the money monopoly he was fighting, that it was Lombard Street and not the English people he had to destroy. His attempts to bleed England of gold and thus check her loan power are known to the serious student. It is no exaggeration to say that the rise and fall of civilizations are simply episodes in the history of usury. * * *

The abounding crops that might be garnered and the wealth which might be produced are neither garnered nor produced because money is kept short by the money monopolists, who can bring about slumps by simply taking money out of circulation, and booms by replacing it. Property can be purchased cheaply during slumps and sold out at peak prices during booms. When money is scarce people must borrow to manufacture and exchange their goods, and high rates of interest can be charged on loans. An artificially produced scarcity of boots or umbrellas would be bad enough. Yet people could defy the monopolists by going without these articles. They could get wet but still live. But money they must have or die. Charity may save them from this fate at the expense of other individuals. Money has been defined as a "license to consume." Consumption without this license is a crime.

It is common knowledge to students of economics that during and since the Great War the problem of production was solved by the final developments of the amazing inventive genius of man. But the problem of distribution depends on the money question. Keep the money tokens short and production must be curbed. When people badly want something but possess no money, there is said, in the jargon of orthodox economics, to be no effective demand for the goods in question. The world is teeming with people exercising much real but no effective demand. Hence the orgies of destruction of real wealth—the story of the man who considered the possibility of acquiring money by not raising hogs, and of the fact that Brazil destroys about 100,000 bags of coffee each day. * * *

In England we are suffering under Mr. Sieff's "Political and Economic Planning" (P. E. P.), one of the principal results of which is to penalize the farmer if he produces more than an approved quota of commodities, because if he creates more purchaseable goods than can be offset by the available purchasing power, either the products must be destroyed (to the public indignation) or their prices fall chaotically. Hitler found an extremely vicious type of "planning" in force when he took over power 4 years ago. The farms were very heavily mortgaged, and the farms in debt to the land banks. The interest charged was high, and owing to the absence of purchasing power among the hungry German masses the agriculturalists sold little, and that often at a loss.

This condition was rapidly changed, however, under the new regime, which desired Germany to become self-sufficient; the farmer was told to grow as much as possible, and that a market for his increasing products would be guaranteed by the government. * * * It has been evident that Germany has been working on a "production" standard for some years, and not merely changing one lot of financial masters for another. And it also seems clear that Germany has been, and is, systematically withdrawing from cooperation with the interests of international finance. * * *

In any case, a step toward monetary reform has been accomplished in the face of commercial boycotts and general opposition. The German is becoming "real wealth-conscious." The reign of gold in Germany is over, and, judging from the remarks in the financial columns of our big newspapers, the financiers over here know it. Only force, successfully applied, can bring back to the fold this somewhat determined "sheep." * * *

It is another twist of the spiral of progress since the days when Napoleon's attempt to set up a new banking system was bitterly opposed by the Barings and Rothschilds, across the channel, who, through the medium of Pitt, financed a succession of wars to accomplish his downfall.

Germany has broken with international finance and bases her currency on production. She uses gold only to purchase any necessary imports which cannot be acquired by barter (forced upon her by a Jewish boycott of her export trade). This economic nationalism is fatal to the system of international finance as practiced outside the "rebel" countries.

Regarding Japan, her finance is a mystery. With a population of about 75,000,000, her national debt is only £765,000,000, as compared to our eight billion-odd pounds. * * * There is ample evidence that Japan will not permit "sound" or "Kuhn Loeb" finance to keep her down. Shortage of gold will not prevent her building battleships. Only shortage of material, workmen, or skill can affect that.

Now, we can roughly sum up the characteristics of the nations which already divide the world into two hostile camps. These characteristics are to an extent interdependent, being really so many facets of two different diamonds. By writing down the characteristics in order of importance we have the so-called "democracies," gold-standard countries, Freemasonry strong, communistic element strong, member of League of Nations (except United States, on account of special circumstances), versus (relatively) Jew-free "dictatorships," goods-standard countries, Freemasonry suppressed, nationalist-element strong, not members of League (except Italy, which country is as good as out of it).

In this picture England is placed near the center of gravity of the forces striving for mastery. Yet, controlled by the money power, she seems to be swinging toward the orbit of the "democracies," which, of course, are not true democracies at all. Such a path, if persisted in, must end in war, because the extent of the rift between these two groups of nations admits of no compromise. Already it seems clear that we are backing the wrong horse—the losing horse. We have made enemies of the Japanese by our behavior at the Washington Conference, where the American war debt, which Lord Reading had promised to pay in gold, preyed on our minds; enemies of the Arabs by our repudiation of a promise once made; enemies of the Italians over the Abyssinian war, in which we suffered an important diplomatic defeat on account of our subservience to the wire pullers at Geneva; and, lastly, enemies of General Franco, owing to our apparent support of the Jew-financed Spanish "Government."

The problem facing the totalitarian states is different from the bristling difficulties of the democracies. The latter have enormous potential wealth, which their money system, based on the gold standard, does not permit them to distribute, and so this wealth is either sabotaged or not produced. Whereas the former are faced with a real shortage of wealth, owing to possessing limited overseas investments and controlling very limited access to raw materials. This particularly applies to Germany. However, under a system of money based on production, wonders are being accomplished with what can be produced from the soil, together with the results accruing from a reduced foreign trade, carried on frequently by barter because of a world-organized Jewish boycott of exports. It is for this reason that we see so many currency restrictions in Germany. Her credits built up abroad must be carefully parcelled out between the varying needs of her ordinary import trade, those of rearmament, and those of the 4-year plan. * * *

Thus, the real underlying cause of the growing rift between the great peoples of the world remains hidden from common knowledge. The economic talks of the B. B. C. see to this, as also do the newspapers and the well-advertised political books and the magazines. The censorship is amazingly ingenuous in this free land. We are led to believe that Hitler has brutally crushed a terrorized Austria, not that, in fact, he is welcomed by a large majority, and that the minority who fear the German invasion consists of international bankers, disappointed usurers, their friends, and those dependent upon them. * * * Then, again, the question is beseechingly asked as to how we can rope in the United States lest civilization perish—lest international finance perish is much nearer the truth.

The courage required by Mr. Chamberlain in trying to cope with all his difficulties is self-evident. He is attempting at almost zero hour to keep this great empire out of war—a war which may destroy it utterly. But can he break away from those financial powers desirous, above all, to make us an instrument in a fight to destroy the growing money system based upon production? If he can, not only will we be spared war, but, perhaps, the coming slump also. * * *

From an international point of view, one can only speculate as to whether the democratic nations will be persuaded to fight to save the gold standard, or, at least, so as to throw a veil over its transformation into bolshevism. President Roosevelt, when not engaged in priming the pump, is actively occupied in enlisting American sympathies in the affairs of Europe—to fight, if necessary, for democracy; i. e., for the gold standard. * * *

The production standard of the totalitarian states requires peace for its development. * * * The majority of people in the democratic countries of the world also desire peace fervently. It only remains to be seen whether the interests of international finance will be able to thrust them into the holocaust. * * *

Of course, the real object of the fuss created by the press over Czechoslovakia was financial and economic. Large Jewish interests lost heavily in Czechoslovakia. * * * The papers never so much as mentioned the Pittsburgh agreement * * * guaranteeing the Slovaks their own parliament, administration, and judicature. * * * The remaining minorities suffered from similar broken hopes. * * *

Our left wing, and many members of the right, following the path of bolshevism by stealth, are ready to countenance war in Europe if only to check the expansion of the Germano-Italian unorthodox money system. These people are true champions of Jewish control by means of the gold standard. * * *

President Roosevelt's wise decision to abandon all idea of balancing the Budget and to borrow boldly for public works, as described, would usually be condemned as unsound finance were it not inexpedient to do so. * * *

Were the Americans seriously to consider the advantages of providing us "on tick" with the necessary materials in order that we might raise a great army * * * they might render the world safer for democracy and for the money power, but at the certainty of still further increasing our debt to them, which the present money system renders irrepayable, since a cash-and-carry system would be useless to us. This question throws us back on American politics, whether the citizens of the United States really love the European democracies and hate Germany and Italy enough to be willing to deprive themselves of the necessary goods, the debt for which they know full well must remain, like the last American war debt, unpaid. * * *

Money is the supreme arbiter of politics.

EDITORIAL FROM THE FORT WORTH (TEX.) STAR-TELEGRAM

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared recently in the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram in appreciation of the service and unique record of the Honorable JOHN NANCE GARNER, Vice President of the United States:

[From the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram]

AN ALL-AMERICAN RECORD

The close of the current year will bring to a distinguished American the moment to which logically he has looked forward for many years. The man is JOHN NANCE GARNER, Vice President of the United States, and the moment is that of his release from the harness of public service which he has worn with honor to himself and advantage to his country for almost 38 years.

Dramatic and fruitful years they have been, witnessing the flowering of character and ability which made of the shy young Texan, first arriving in Washington in 1903 as Representative of the Fifteenth Texas District, a figure of national prestige, the acknowledged leader and master tactician of Congress. Of the qualities which led to his selection, first, as leader of his party's side in the House, then as Speaker of the House, and finally as Vice President, the chief undoubtedly was that combination of soundness in planning and practicality in acting which is sometimes called horse sense. JOHN GARNER took horse sense into public office with him, kept it all along through the 38 years of his service. And it may be observed that it is a quality as badly needed today as in 1903, and as much in Washington as at home, a quality which has not been improved upon and is not likely to be.

No man who knows JOHN GARNER will presume that his interest in public affairs and his concern for the welfare of his party and the Nation will be lulled to apathy at his long-delayed homecoming. There will be pleasant and peaceful days at Uvalde, of serene fishing and the heartening round of homely affairs, days rich with fellowship and neighborliness, quiet with the wordless communion of old friends. But the boundless grasp of national concerns, the keen understanding of trends and movements, all the special knowledge that is contained in the heart and mind of the elder statesman, refined by the fires and pressures of experience, will make themselves manifest, and the great talents which JOHN GARNER brought to the public service will not atrophy in disuse. His services in council will still be available to his country whenever and in whatever fashion they are called for. If there is need for JOHN GARNER at Washington, he will be there, and whether he is at Washington or at home he will continue to be at the command of his country. Texas' JOHN GARNER is not to be cast in the role of an Achilles sulking in his tent, but rather in that of a Nestor, his battles almost done, standing by for counsel and balance.

The mellowness of years has been added to the mental keenness, the hardy practicality, the inspired common sense that have marked Mr. GARNER'S public career. His friends anticipate, in the leisurely days that lie ahead for him under his own vine and fig tree (except that in Mr. GARNER'S case it is a pecan tree), an even greater flowering of the earthy humor and homely philosophy which are the hallmarks of his outstanding Americanism.

It is one of the ironies of fate and duty that two who possess so much of the American's traditional love of home and homely things as do Mr. and Mrs. GARNER should have been caught up for half a lifetime in the all-consuming round of public life; that two whose dearest wish has been coolness and quiet should have found themselves unendingly surrounded by the hot glare that beats upon high position—should have been able, in 38 long years, to find time only for vacations at home. At last their release is at hand, and a grateful nation freely accords them the honorable retirement which long and faithful service has earned. May there be a fish for every cast in the cool streams about Uvalde, and may household cares be non-existent in the domain of the gracious lady whose contribution to American public life has been in its own way as vital as that of her husband.

It is easy to analyze the qualities which have endeared Mr. and Mrs. Garner to the American people. They simply are "typical Americans"—if that term be defined as that which represents the best traits native to this soil of ours. In public as well as in private life, the Vice President and his gracious consort have exhibited that fundamental faith in the destiny of America and the worthiness of its people which renders them akin to every one of us. This, and an essential integrity, a trueness that controls every act and thought, shape the character of both to form an American ideal.

They are our own people, and it is with full hearts that Texans welcome them home, praying for them many years in which to enjoy the fullness of the homely comforts they have so long denied themselves in our service.

To the First Voter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH, OF NEW YORK

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, unanimously granted by the House, I include the following speech which I delivered at the State convention of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York, which was held at Utica, N. Y., on August 10 and 11, 1940.

I was happy to address myself to those voters who will participate in their first national election. It is a source of great comfort in these times to know that those young men and women appreciate the importance of the voting privilege and will exercise it with care. I congratulate them.

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, and friends, it is, indeed, a great pleasure and a privilege for me to have been afforded an opportunity to be with you on the occasion of this Third Biennial State Convention of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York. We who have been privileged to hold elective office during the past 5 years know, of course, of the splendid service rendered to the party by your organization and the untiring and highly beneficial efforts expended on behalf of young Democrats everywhere by your State president, officers, and members.

Your president was very gracious in affording me great latitude in my choice of topic for the few minutes I shall be addressing you. With such latitude, however, goes an equivalent degree of responsibility which I shall cheerfully accept—hoping thereby to manifest a measure of the enthusiasm of a decreasingly young Democrat.

I am happy to note that party regularity and loyalty has been your convention keynote. That keynote, however, connotes the passage of time—of years—and the adherence throughout these years to the principles of our party. We who have watched the sturdy, steady course of our Government throughout these difficult and most critical days of our Nation's history can at once and with ease maintain that high degree of regularity and loyalty that has been manifested by such live and living organizations as yours. We can approach the coming campaign comforted and consoled by the thought that during these days and past years the control of our Government has rested in our party and, therefore, with the people, serving no special interest, but the interest of all: Democracy in action when democracy must and will work. We can look with justifiable pride upon our participation in and contribution to such an administration. We can be regular and loyal to the Democratic Party because we have lived and have seen what democratic government is and does. Our administrations have sought to apply our ideas and ideals.

But what of the other youth, of those millions who will participate in their first national campaign, who politically will ask why be regular, why loyal, to the Democratic Party?

Youth is not traditional, not hide-bound; it is vigorous, energetic, enthusiastic.

Its vigor leads it, at times, into new and untried fields.

Its energy prompts it to attempt the difficult, if not the impossible.

Its enthusiasm carries it to great heights, crowns its short span with great glory, accomplishments, and progress—progress that has always led to a better way of life for the youth that follows vigorous, energetic, and enthusiastic youth.

Youth is basically healthy and sound. Politically, our young people may be quizzical and anxious to be informed, but they are not un-American or subversive, as some would have us believe.

Their only shortcoming flows from their inexperience and that inexperience will eventually ripen into a loyalty to those institutions and beliefs that can stand the cruel and piercing scrutiny of a youth asking "Why?"—of a first voter asking "Why be regular and loyal to your party?"

To them, I should like to pass some of my enthusiasm—with them to share some of my confidence—enthusiasm of and confidence in the democratic way.

We should review with them the history of our party, its struggles, its temporary defeats, its victories, its permanent progress in the humanizing of Government. We can call for them the roll of constructive legislation sponsored and enacted into law under Democratic administrations, we can start with agriculture, go to banking, civil service, Civilian Conservation Corps, Federal Deposit Insurance, Federal Housing, Home Owners' Loan, labor relations, National Youth Administration, national defense, social security, and wages and hours, waging a fight against slums, disease, and underprivilege.

We can properly point out to these first voters the opportunities to be found within our party. We can and should call to their minds the distinguished sons of our party, past and present, sons of the people, chosen from the ranks, who, inspired by our party's history, rose to places of leadership in our country to the lasting credit of our country and our party.

In my own home assembly district there has been in the past 5 years a complete change in elected Democratic officials, including a justice of the municipal court, Representative in Congress, State senator, and member of the assembly. All those elected in that time were under 37 years of age, and most of them were in their early thirties.

I am proud of those young Democrats who this year are running with me. Our State Senator Daniel Gutman and my home assemblyman, Roy H. Rudd, have made enviable records in the State legislature. In the other assembly districts within our congressional district are Democratic candidates of character, of ability, of youth. All the candidates have risen from the ranks of our party.

We can unhesitatingly say to these young men and women first voters that here is the American way, the Democratic way. This is their party.

We must begin now to seek them out, to talk to them, to listen to them, and to prove to them. We are fortified by our record, we are strengthened by our belief, and we are inspired by our loyalty to a party that is truly ours, belonging to all the people, serving all the people, and calling upon all the people to join with us.

Youth will join us in our march of victory, of Democratic victory, and your organization and its members will share the joy of a job well done.

You and youth will do it.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BIG TIMBER PIONEER, OF MONTANA

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following editorial from the Big Timber Pioneer, of Montana:

[From the Big Timber Pioneer of Montana]

MISSED THE BIG BETS

Desertions by Democrats removed from office by the Roosevelt administration, who have joined forces with Willkie, are given first-page flash-head notice in all Willkie papers. So far we have had Hanes, Douglas, High, the latter a former adviser to Roosevelt. Also Burke, of Nebraska, defeated for the Democratic nomination for Senator; Mrs. Dwight Morrow, of New Jersey, widow of a former Republican Governor and Senator of that State; also ex-Governor White of Ohio, Democrat. As stated above, all have had as much prominence on the front page as is usually given Joe Louis.

However, they have overlooked two important events.

The Order of Railway Conductors of California, 6,000 strong, gave Roosevelt their endorsement. It had a small paragraphic mention on an unimportant page.

Monday the United Automobile Workers of America, second largest unit of the C. I. O., endorsed Roosevelt and the New Deal. Its action had mention in the dailies but was almost lost near the market reports from eastern business centers.

Individual support amounts to little; organization help means thousands of votes.

Decree Issued by French Government Against So-Called Anti-Semitics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY PIERRE GAXOTTE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Pierre Gaxotte under date of April 26, 1939, a translation of the original French. This article is a discussion of a decree issued by the French Government against the so-called anti-Semitics, and has been in my possession since last year. I have held this article, anticipating that similar legislation would be introduced in Congress, and yesterday, August 12, 1940, I discussed three such bills, two of which are in the Judiciary Committee of the House and one in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

My reason for inserting these measures in the RECORD is to show that there is a movement on foot to introduce legislation similar to that discussed by Pierre Gaxotte. The two bills (H. R. 7604 and H. R. 10289) now before the Judiciary Committee of the House, and the Senate bill (S. 3876) now in the Senate Judiciary Committee, are an attempt to curb those who have been exposing subversive activities, and which will, if enacted into law, give the Government power to place anyone in jail for 21 years who is designated anti-Semitic or Nazi by Mr. Brandeis' organized minority. In other words, the bills are a minority attempt to prevent anyone from exposing sabotage and destruction of our Government.

I shall comment no further on these measures, but shall ask those who are interested in this problem to read the discussion which I have inserted in the RECORD.

THE DECREE OF JEWISH PROTECTION, THE BEST WAY TO DESTROY FRENCH UNITY

The decree law for the protection of Jews has been signed. After having hesitated, the government took the step. Under threat of penalties extending to 6 months in prison, it is forbidden to a citizen born between Strasbourg and Bayonne to call himself an anti-Semite: The tribunals will punish henceforth "excitations tending to provoke hatreds and discord between the French from motives of race and of religion."

One tells us that the government will make use of the decree only to stop campaigns the hidden end of which would be the shaking of the vigilance of the French and the turning of them aside from the German peril. Let us accept the augury. But the law is the law. It is not a question of knowing the use which will be made of it at present but of knowing what it contains and what it permits. Mandel and Zay are always there. Blum may return.

It is, therefore, proper to present the following observations:

1. The decree expressly speaks of "race," that is to say, that the signers Daladier, Chautemps, Marchandeau, Sarraut, and Mandel admit the fundamental postulate of Hitlerism, always heretofore denied.

2. The decree pretends to repress propaganda carried on for the purpose of exciting hatred between citizens or inhabitants. It does not respond to this intention, for if it had really had for its purpose the maintenance of concord and good will, it would have taken in all the propagandas of strife, beginning with the struggle of the classes, which is by far the most visible and the most pernicious. But only anti-Semitism is recognized.

This is to say that the Communists may continue to preach with impunity the social war, the revolt against taxes and against the regime of work. One may print that the middle classes want war to enrich themselves; that they basely evade their fiscal duty; that they throw on the proletariat the whole burden of the national defense, and that they are bad citizens, and bad French.

One may say that the nationals are Hitlerians; that the Lorrainers are traitors to their own kin; that Corsica is an island peopled with bandits; that the Bretons are half beasts (see Marx Dormoy); that the men of the south of France make poor soldiers; that Marseilles is a city where so and so dominates, etc. But one may not speak one severe word of the Jews.

3. The decree establishes, therefore, two categories of the French. The superior category is formed by the Jews, to whom the law accords a protection which is not given to Bretons, to Lorrainers, to Corsicans, to the Marseillais, as groups. Jewish citizens are henceforth better protected against insult and defamation than ordinary Frenchmen. The non-Jews may with impunity be the objects of insults and of propaganda which would be punishable if addressed to Jews.

4. The decree-law covers not only the French Jewish citizens but also the Jews "living" in France. It establishes, therefore, among the foreigners, refugee or domiciled, two groups enjoying a different status. The non-Jews have fewer rights than the Jews, since one may bring to bear upon them judgments which would be matters of prosecution in connection with Jews. The foreign Jews living in France are not only raised above other foreigners; they are even covered by special protection in comparison to the French who have received them and from whom is henceforth taken the right of complaining of their presence en bloc or of questioning their conduct.

Corollary. The decree-law recognizes on our soil the existence of a Jewish community, since in regard to anti-Semitism, it establishes an equality and a solidarity between the citizen Jews of France and the noncitizen Jews. These two groups have a right, as Jews, to the same special protection.

The worst anti-Semites would never have dared to hope for their doctrines such an exact official consecration.

It remains to examine what will be the moral and psychological consequences of the regime of privileged protection that has just been established.

First of all, it is certain that the German propaganda will seize upon it for use in the countries of the Arabs; in Spain; in Latin America, in central and eastern Europe. One of the favorite themes of this propaganda is to represent France as being under Jewish domination and, under pretext of chauvinism, transformed into a soldier of Israel. There is no need to be perspicacious to divine the use which will be made of the decree Daladier—Marchandeau—Chautemps—Mandel—Sarraut. It is a valuable trump given to our enemies and one which the services of Goebbels will not neglect. Evidently the ministers hope in return to win the support of high finance, which they believe still very powerful in New York. In this respect, it is to be feared that the calculation is a bad one. Since the great crash, the sentiments of the American people in regard to Wall Street are those of hatred and distrust. New York, city of Jews and city of immigrants, is far from representing, by its newspapers and its banks, the opinion of the United States. To think too much of New York, that is to risk losing America.

Finally, in what concerns the moral effect in France, one may well believe that it was not necessary to impose a sacred union by the menace of armed gendarmes.

If there was in the world an admirable spectacle, it was precisely the spontaneity with which the French have united themselves during the last weeks, the ardor with which they have responded to the appeals of their leaders, the constancy and sangfroid with which they have opposed threats from outside. There was no need of procurors to teach them patriotism and solidarity before the enemy. The Government, in adopting the decree for Jewish protection, has dealt this unanimity a hard blow, for henceforth all the French will have the feeling that someone has taken advantage of the international danger to undermine their liberty.

The Government has planted suspicion among them. They will question one another; the innocent will lend their ears to the wildest accusations, to those which may not be printed but which will be made everywhere. One institutes a new crime of lese majesty; 9 Frenchmen out of 10 will be convinced that someone has wished to cover up scandalous maneuvers by preventing the press from denouncing them. The absurdity when printed refutes itself. What will you do against sly and vagabond rumors?

Abrogate the decree, M. Lebrun; abrogate it, M. Daladier; there is still time. If you are obstinate, you run the risk of disturbing the national unanimity and of giving impetus to all the quarrels. Reflect for one moment.

You forbid to the masses certain words which they did not think of speaking; certain reflections which they did not think of making; but henceforth you inspire in them every kind of distrust and you compel them to envisage things of which they do not wish to think. You forbid that one should discuss the role and the conduct of Jews in the exterior policy of the country; but by that very fact, you constrain each Frenchman to reflect on it. Are the Jews as a block perfectly peaceable; you render them suspect. We had all thrown overboard our sentiments and our opinions; democrats or not democrats, republicans or not republicans, we were unanimous against the two fascisms, Italian and German. You make us believe that in this unanimity, this self-forgetfulness, and this gift, some people have not lost sight of their own particular interests and that they have known how to utilize the circumstances for winning themselves a privileged status.

We were confident and without ulterior motives. And now we look at one another questioningly. Do not answer to me that you have wished to defend the moral health of the country. Once more you would have forbidden all the propaganda of strife and division, beginning with the battle of the classes; but you have forbidden only one—anti-Semitism.

You run thus the danger of exciting it. As usual, you have been played upon by men who have neither psychology nor shame and who cannot keep themselves from being persecutors when they cease to be persecuted.

PIERRE GAXOTTE.

He Who Hesitates Is Lost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUTHER PATRICK OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of Congress, this is still a national democracy. If any doubt it he should observe the patience with which we listen to arguments on the floor of the Congress of the United States—Senate and House. But please let us hasten as much as we may, and still give all a fair hearing, in the matter of the Wadsworth-Burke bill. The dictator has broken loose in the world. He is ruthless, swift, and efficient. He does not have to wait for the argument of those who do not agree with his plan, his philosophy or his ideology. He has declared that democracy is wishful thinking behind an unworkable and outmoded system. He has boldly declared war upon it. By him it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It is ready for the scrap heap and he has consigned it there and is only biding the day when he can step forth and execute the action. The Hitler marching song has in it a line which goes, "Today we own Germany, tomorrow the whole world." Hitler has not only pronounced the benediction upon democracy but has become more specifically overt by declaring our solemn Monroe Doctrine void and of no consideration. What more do we need? What do those who scoff at the need of a draft wish?

We should have a greater number at this moment taking military training. To this the overwhelming number all over the country agree; but we find those who agree to this and who still hold to the idea that the need may still be solved by a volunteer system. The facts do not support this conclusion. We stand today with an authorization that would give us 375,000 men in our National Army, but how many do we have? Approximately 270,000. This check-up is of the 3d day of this month of this year. In addition to this, about 7,000 men complete military terms each month and do not enlist. That is why you see the constant drive for men. Today you see a sign on the billboard at the corner of your street, a streamer on the taxicab in front of you, a line in the picture show you attend, all calling to the young man to enlist in the service of his country. Recently the efforts have been tremendous, and yet we are 105,000 men behind our legal authorization. The enlistments are indefinite and uncertain, of course. The firmest proponent of holding to it must concede that it is haphazard. In addition, it does not get an even and fair representation. The burden is borne by certain parts of the country. Kentucky leads the whole country, I believe, followed close by Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Oklahoma, Texas, and other States in the same general area, as a rule. For example, I have just gotten the figures from the Assistant Chief of Staff of The Adjutant General's office and find that for the past 6 months, Texas, with a State population of 5,824,715, last Federal census, has contributed 6,648 enlistments, while New York with her 12,588,066 has only seen 5,471 of her patriotic sons join the Army in the same period. Insofar as that particular feature of democratic methods may concern us the more democratic plan is the draft system.

That is the idea. It is just. It is fair. It is businesslike. Whatever may be our feelings as to voluntary enlistment we must concede that it is not the acme of definite and businesslike proceedings. We need to do a lot of preparing and we need to do it well. We cannot be too thorough. We are trying to add to our Army such a number as will bring it to the strength of 900,000 by this fall. Certainly we should have them, and the Nation feels uncomfortable and unsafe today with the small number we have in our Regular Army. This includes, by the way, the National Guard. Then by next spring we hope to run it up to 1,200,000. Some wish to run it higher, but I have an abiding suspicion that if we see it go to that figure we had better be quite happy. If accomplished, this means that we must see inducted 400,000 trainees during this fall and an additional 400,000 next spring, with a catching up of 105,000 now authorized and not in. Can you tell me how that may be done without a peacetime draft? One great lawmaker has come forward with the brilliant suggestion that we hike the Army pay $9 per month. He has heard several "amens" to his proposal. Let me rise to venture the bold remarks that it is my gentle opinion that $9 more per month will not add enough pepper to the patriotism of the men of the country to induce 505,000 to swarm to enlistment camps this fall, with 400,000 more waiting to make the plunge next spring. The best we have ever been able to do, so far, in 1 month has given a net gain of 23,000, and even this would have to be given a fivefold boost and then be kept sustained and constant through till fall to do the job. Do you think it has a Chinaman's chance? You know that it has not. Why fool ourselves? We love democracy in this country and hate to give up on any point that has been held by us as a wholesome part of our system, but the time has come in the march of time when, if we are just and reasonable, when if we are not willing to follow sentiment to the abandonment of firm duty, we must touch the youth of the land on the shoulder and say to him tenderly, gently, but firmly: "Wake up, America. There is work to be done."

I thank you.

ADDRESS BY HON. THOMAS R. BALL, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the dedication of a monument to the founders of Norwich, Conn., on August 11, 1940:

It is with particular pleasure that I am with you today. Many memories cluster around me. With due reverence I have chosen as my text a verse from that treasury of devotion, the Psalms of David: "But as for his people, he led them forth like sheep, and carried them in the wilderness like a flock."

We are met today in the company of our forefathers, to honor them, and to dedicate to them a monument of enduring stone that will show forth our filial devotion.

Here, beneath the kindly earth, lie the founders of Norwich, whose spirits, released from the bondage of the flesh, are with God. We, their children's children, come to this holy place on this Sunday afternoon for a noble purpose. We draw ourselves away from the world of today with its troubles, its noise, and its anxiety, and recall together the men and women of a bygone age.

Think for a moment of that little band that came from the Saybrook Fort, and, without thought of conquest, dealt fairly with the Indians, and bought and paid for their 9 miles square. The stalwart leader, John Mason; the servant of God, James Fitch; the fearless Leffingwell, and their few companions began to build here in Norwich Town. "They builded better than they knew."

It was not an easy life in early Norwich. It meant hard work day after day and month after month. Remember, these men first cleared the land and laid the stones up into fences. They felled the trees and hewed the timber into massive posts and girts and summer beams. They forged their nails and their hinges. They pastured their cattle and slaughtered their beef. They cultivated patches of the cleared land and grew corn, and ground that corn. They dipped their tallow into candles. All the time their women prepared three square meals a day. They wove and they spun. They bore and raised, and clothed and fed many children. They suffered much. They complained little. Their lives were hard, but their hopes were high, and we, their children unto many generations, today rise up and call them blessed.

The past century has seen our civilization transformed into some strange sort of monstrous mechanism. With the development of the machine, New England, and Norwich too, has gained much and lost plenty. We have our automobiles, engines of destruction, in place of the horses; tractors instead of oxen. We have radios, ice cubes, and thermostats. We have bombers, and tanks, and submarines. Neon signs brighten our once quiet streets. Swing music and shorts, hot dogs and popsicles, and roadsides cluttered with empty bottles and yesterday's papers—all are part of the present day picture. But surely they cannot be all that there is to it. Somewhere behind the tawdriness of today must be the old loyalties, the old faith, the old patriotism.

Our beloved country is in danger. She is beset from within and without by strange and evil forces. She may be obliged to fight to preserve intact her liberty. She demands of us all the supreme test of our Americanism, and, as we hear the call of duty, we will respond as worthy children of our fathers.

As we renew our obligations, and consecrate ourselves afresh we shall resolve not only to fulfill our own duty, but to teach it to the children of the generations to come "that their posterity might know it, and the generations that are yet unborn."

As we solemnly set apart this stone as a memorial to those men and women of Norwich whose unmarked graves are here about us, we reaffirm our allegiance to the faith which they preserved in the wilderness, which upheld them in their hour of trial and which lightened the darkness of their despair.

Founders of Norwich, we, your sons and daughters, salute you.

Unprecedented Action of Committee Not Hearing Author of Charges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the early part of June, I charged on the floor of the House that Lt. Col. Carl Byoir was guilty of un-American activities and that he should be investigated by the Dies un-American activities committee.

The gentleman from Texas, Chairman DIES, appointed a subcommittee, composed of Mr. DEMPSEY, of New Mexico, chairman; Mr. MASON, of Illinois; and Mr. CASEY, of Massachusetts, to hear the proof to support the charges.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL IN OUR ARMY EMPLOYED TO REPRESENT HITLER

Without giving me any notice whatsoever and without giving me an opportunity to submit the proof to sustain the charges, which I had and was ready and willing to present if notice had been given, a statement was issued by this subcommittee on July 20, 1940, fully exonerating Carl Byoir of being engaged in un-American activities.

Today, August 12, 1940, I wired the gentleman from New Mexico, Congressman DEMPSEY, chairman of that subcommittee, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., as follows:

> Your unwarranted action in exonerating Lt. Col. Carl Byoir on un-American activities places him in line to help administer conscription bill if passed. Since your committee acted without giving me chance to support the charges with proof I now demand this opportunity before your committee. I can convince any fair-minded person, even those who have prejudged the charges, that Lieutenant Colonel Byoir was one of Hitler's first agents, if not the first, in this country in charge of Nazi propaganda; that he diligently pursued such propaganda activities over a period of years while he was lieutenant colonel in our Army and received fabulous sums for such propaganda work from the German consul in New York and from interests in Germany by reason of the contract approved by Hitler's minister of propaganda. Our danger from within is great and this is no time to run a risk. Will you give me the opportunity to present conclusive evidence before your committee of Lieutenant Colonel Byoir's un-American activities?

Until the end of the day, August 13, 1940, no reply had been received to this telegram.

Strategy and Tactics of the Proletarian Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS, 1936

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "Strategy and Tactics of the Proletarian Revolution," by International Publishers, New York, 1936.

Mr. Speaker, the danger which confronts the United States today is communism, and it is that which we must curb before it is too late. This article is inserted in order to call the attention of Congress to this problem. I shall ask those who are interested in the dangers of communism and other subversive movements to read this article.

STRATEGY AND TACTICS OF THE PROLETARIAN REVOLUTION

(By International Publishers, New York, 1936)

This is a book of 96 pages compiled from the works of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin, and others. It explains the moves and organizations approaching the 1917 revolution in Russia, and their application to the proposed revolutions in other countries. It analyzes the nature of Bolshevik strategy and tactics, how, where, and when to apply them, for the completion of the revolution in these United States. Leaders in politics and defense of the Union should read the book carefully.

We only quote a few passages which should show to even a skeptic, beyond a doubt, the progress already made in the United States of America toward their ultimate goal—The United Soviet States of America, described in W. Z. Foster's book Toward a Soviet America, 1932.

In a chapter, Leadership—Strategic and Fundamental, from page 35 we quote: "The decisive battle," says Lenin, may be deemed to be fully matured when "all the class forces hostile to us have become sufficiently confused, are sufficiently at loggerheads with each other, have sufficiently weakened themselves in a struggle beyond their capacities"; when "all the vacillating, wavering, unstable, intermediate elements—the petty bourgeois and the petty bourgeois democrats, as distinct from the bourgeoisie—have sufficiently exposed themselves before the people, and have sufficiently disgraced themselves through their practical bankruptcy"; when "among the proletariat a mass mood in favor of supporting the most determined, unreservedly bold, revolutionary action against the bourgeoisie has arisen and begins to grow powerfully. Then, indeed, revolution is ripe; then, indeed, if we have correctly gaged all the conditions outlined above, and if we have chosen the moment rightly, our victory is assured." (Left-Wing Communism, etc., pp. 93–94.)

It is not difficult to locate the conditions referred to in the above by studying the present situation in the United States of America. The "reds" have taken years to "bring about those conditions."

From page 42, a short quotation: "Secondly, there has never been, and can never be a successful offensive without a regrouping of forces in the course of the offensive itself, without consolidating the occupied positions, without utilizing reserves to develop successes and push the offensive to its conclusion." This not only applies to armed action but to political as well, here the application to the two major political parties; how they have been literally captured by the revolutionary forces and turned into able instruments of advance; and the reserves (Farmer-Labor, American Labor, and many other parties) have been brought up to help the sabotage, the division of both old parties, the confusion of the voters; and then they bring in the so-called progressives and liberals to act as sappers within the party organizations and as candidates; of course accompanied with much soothing sirup and high-sounding rescue phrases and policies."

On page 45, three short paragraphs bring us up to much of the New Deal tactics and its importance in the chain of events that must be forged to lead to the final victory: "Second, to locate at any given moment that single link in the chain of events which, if seized upon, will enable us to keep hold of the whole chain and prepare the ground for the achievement of strategic success.

"The point here is to single out from the tasks confronting the party precisely the one that must be fulfilled next, the fulfillment of which is the central point and which will assure the successful fulfillment of the remaining urgent tasks.

"The importance of this postulate may be illustrated by two examples, one of which may be taken from the remote past" (the period of the formation of the party) "and the other from the immediate present" (the period of the new economic policy).

On page 48 the following gives us more light: "The main task of contemporary communism in Western Europe and America is to acquire the ability to seek, to find, to determine correctly the concrete path or the particular turn of events that will bring the masses right up to the real, decisive, last and great revolutionary struggle." Present events at home and abroad demonstrate far greater progress than the average citizen realizes; for actual war which is to be treated the same as the 1917 war in Russia "turned into a local revolution." How well prepared are we to meet that "event" here?

Page 55 starts a chapter on The Bolshevik Attitude Toward Reforms.

"What is the difference between revolutionary tactics and reformist tactics?

"Some are of the opinion that Leninism is opposed to reforms, opposed to compromises and to agreements in general. That is absolutely untrue. Bolsheviks know as well as anybody else that in a certain sense every little helps, that under certain conditions reforms, in general, and compromise and agreements, in particular, are necessary and useful.

"To carry on a war for the overthrow of the international bourgeoisie (says Lenin) a war which is a hundred times more difficult, prolonged and complicated than the most stubborn of ordinary wars between states, and to refuse beforehand to maneuver, to utilize the conflict of interests (even though temporary) among one's enemies, to refuse to temporize and compromise with possible (even though temporary, unstable, vacillating, and conditional) allies, is not this ridiculous in the extreme? Is it not as though, in the difficult ascent of an unexplored and heretofore inaccessible mountain, we were to renounce beforehand the idea that at times we might have to go in zigzags, sometimes retracing our steps, sometimes giving up the course once selected and trying various others?

"Hence, it is obvious that it is not a question of reforms or compromises and agreements, as such, but of the use that is made of reforms and compromises."

Do not these few lines help you to understand the many, many compromises and so-called reforms entered into during the past 10 years between Republican-Democratic party leaders, public officials, and many patriotic groups, and our common enemy at home and abroad? August 23 witnessed a great historical compromise that startled the world. Watch it.

Chapter 5 cites principal tasks of the strategy and tactics of the Comintern.

1. The fight to win the majority of the working class and gain for it the hegemony over the toiling masses.

Under this heading is quoted from page 63: "To work in reactionary trade unions and skillfully to capture them, to win the confidence of the broad masses of the industrially organized workers, to relieve and remove from their posts the reformist leaders, represent important tasks in the preparatory period." Do you now see the Communist workings in the ranks of organized labor, the destruction of the patriotic unions (they call them reactionary), and the building up of the C. I. O. after the pattern of the older I. W. W. for the purpose of the revolution, and that only? Then the help of the N. L. R. B., the La Follette civil liberties committee, and other agencies to protect and defend the "red" cause.

On pages 73 and 74, just one paragraph gives a very excellent example of the coalition between the New Deal and the "united front" of all manner of "reds": "While revealing to the masses the meaning of the demagogic arguments advanced by the right social democratic leaders against the "united front," while intensifying the struggle against the reactionary section of social democracy, the Communists must establish the closest cooperation with those left social democratic workers, functionaries, and organizations that fight against the reformist policy and advocate a united front with the Communist Party. The more we intensify our fight against the reactionary camp of social democracy, which is participating in a bloc with the bourgeoisie, the more effective will be the assistance we give to that part of social democracy which is becoming revolutionized. And the self-determination of the various elements within the left camp will take place the sooner the more resolutely the Communists fight for a united front with the social democratic parties."

From pages 75 and 76 we quote: "In the circumstances of a political crisis, when the ruling classes are no longer in a position to cope with the powerful sweep of the mass movement, the Communists must advance fundamental revolutionary slogans (such as, for instance, control of production and the banks, disbandments of the police force, and its replacement by an armed workers' militia, etc.), which are directed toward still further shaking the economic and political power of the bourgeoisie and increasing the strength of the working class toward isolating the parties of compromise, and which lead the working masses right up to the point of the revolutionary seizure of power. If with an upsurge of the mass movement it will prove possible, and necessary in the interests of the proletariat, to create a proletarian united-front government, or an anti-Fascist people's front government, which is not yet a government of the proletarian dictatorship, but one which undertakes to put into effect decisive measures against fascism and reaction, the Communist Party must see to it that such a government is formed * * *. Insofar as the united-front government will really undertake decisive measures against counter-revolutionary financial magnates and their Fascist agents, and will in no way restrict the activity of the Communist Party and the struggle of the working class, the Communist Party will support such a government in every way. The participation of the Communists in a united-front government will be decided separately in each particular case as the concrete situation may warrant." If the above is not a true bill for the New Deal, then we cannot read and understand language.

Page 80 gives this little paragraph: "Communists must carry on a struggle to draw the cooperative organizations into the ranks of the united front of the proletariat and of the anti-Fascist people's front." Do you recall the many cooperatives penetrating every line of endeavor to abolish selling for a profit anything needed by the people? Of course, the Bolsheviks will conduct the sale and distribution of all commodities—will they make a profit? You answer that one.

Page 81 throws more light on the things that have just happened to the old political parties, and the old party leaders continue to compromise and deal. Quote: "Steering a course in the direction of this perspective of the revolutionary development, the Seventh Congress of the Communist International calls on the Communist Parties to display the greatest political activity and daring, to carry on a tireless struggle to bring about unity of action by the working class. The establishment of the united front of the working class is the decisive link in the preparation of the toilers for the forthcoming great battles of the second round of proletarian revolutions. Only the welding of the proletarian into a single mass political army will ensure its victory in the struggle against fascism and the power of capital, for the dictatorship of the proletariat and the power of the Soviets. The victory of revolution never comes by itself. It has to be prepared for and won."

Pages 84 and 85 prove interesting, especially in the following brief quote: "(a) The United States of America. Let us take, for example, so important a country in the capitalist world as the United States of America. Three millions of people have been brought into motion by the crisis. The program for the recovery of capitalism has collapsed. Vast masses are beginning to abandon the bourgeois parties, and are at present at the crossroads." (Note this was written in 1936.)

Page 85, quote: "It is perfectly obvious that the interests of the American proletariat demand that all its forces dissociate themselves from the capitalist parties without delay. It must, at the proper time, find ways and suitable forms of preventing fascism from winning over the broad and discontented masses of the toilers. And here it must be said that under American conditions the creation of a mass party of toilers, a farmer-labor party, might serve as such a suitable form. Such a party would be a specific form of the mass people's front in America that should be set up in opposition to the parties of the trusts and the banks, and likewise to growing fascism. Such a party, of course, will be neither Socialist nor Communist. But it must be an anti-Fascist party and must not be an anti-Communist party."

"The program of this party must be directed against the banks, trusts, and monopolies, against the principal enemies of the people who are gambling on its misfortunes. Such a party will be equal to its task only if it defends the urgent demands of the working class, only if it fights for genuine social legislation, for unemployment insurance; only if it fights for land for the white and black sharecroppers and for their liberation from the burden of debt; only if it works for the cancelation of the farmers' indebtedness; only if it fights for the equal status of the Negroes; only if it fights for the demands of the ex-servicemen, and for the interests of the members of the liberal professions, and small-business men, the artisans; and so on." Read the quotation from Adam Wieshaupt in another article herein for the outline of the above program. That was penned in 1775. Marx used it in 1848. Has the New Deal taken it seriously? All these "fundamentals" of communism and socialism directly parallel the New Deal. Why should they not? Both are the same and for the same purpose.

Pages 90 and 91 throw light upon events of yesterday, today, and tomorrow in the following lines: "On the basis of the teaching of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin on war, the Sixth World Congress of the Communist International concretely formulated the tasks of the Communist Parties and the revolutionary proletariat in the struggle against imperialist war. Guided by these principles, the Communist Parties of Japan, and China, both directly affected by war, have waged and are waging a Bolshevik struggle against imperialist war and for the defense of the Chinese people. The Seventh World Congress of the Communist International, confirming the decisions of the Sixth Congress on the Struggle Against Imperialist War, sets the following main tasks before the Communist Parties, the revolutionary workers, toilers, peasants, and oppressed peoples of the whole world:

"1. The struggle for peace and for the defense of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. In face of the war provocations of the German Fascists and Japanese militarists, and the speeding up of armaments by the war parties in the capitalist countries, in face of the immediate danger of a counter-revolutionary war breaking out against the Soviet Union, the central slogan of the Communist Parties must be: Struggle for Peace.

"2. The united people's front in the struggle for peace and against the instigators of war. The struggle for peace opens up before the Communist Parties the greatest opportunities for creating the broadest united front. All those interested in the preservation of peace should be drawn into this united front."

We then turn to pages 94 and 95 to bring out an interesting policy of the Bolsheviks that all Americans should understand in view of the vast propaganda to force the United States of America into a war in "defense of the Soviet Union" against Japan, Germany, Italy, or any line-up that threatens the "reds." Quote: "The Communists, while fighting also against the illusion that war can be eliminated while the capitalist system still exists, are exerting and will exert every effort to prevent war. Should a new imperialist world war break out, despite all efforts of the working class to prevent it, the Communists will strive to lead the opponents of war, organized in the struggle for the transformation of the imperialist war into a civil war against the Fascist instigators of war, against the bourgeoisie, for the overthrow of capitalism."

If these few quotations do not convince the reader of the facts behind the news of the day, he can purchase the book at any "red" book store for 50 cents and read more about it.

You now know from the pens of the Bolsheviks themselves just what to expect should we be drawn into a war that is not "in defense of the Soviet Union." And what good American wants to defend that bunch, even indirectly?

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WALLACE'S FARMER AND IOWA HOMESTEAD

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appears in the current issue of Wallace's Farmer and Iowa Homestead, entitled "Does United States Need To Draft Your Boy?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead of August 10, 1940]

DOES THE UNITED STATES NEED TO DRAFT YOUR BOY?

One of the big, hot issues that nobody likes to touch—platforms of both parties dodged it—is drafting men for the Army and Navy. There's a lot of argument on both sides. Here are some of the high points:

HOW BIG AN ARMY DO WE NEED?

If Great Britain is beaten there is a possibility that we may have to put our Navy in one ocean and rely on the Army, coast defenses and the air force to beat off an attack from the other side. Probably a highly mechanized, mobile army of 200,000 could wipe out any invading force. But we'd need as many more for garrison duty. Suppose we have to take over the French, British, and Dutch islands in the Atlantic or send a force to help a Latin American government put down a Nazi revolution. We'd need more men for that. Various estimates put the desirable size of the Army all the way from 400,000 men—the strength now authorized—to 2,000,000 men.

WHAT KIND OF AN ARMY DO WE NEED?

When President Roosevelt talks of equipment for an army of 2,000,000 men, and when Army people talk of drafting 1,500,000 men in the next year, farmers may wonder whether the President and the Army people have learned anything from the present war. Poland had a big draft army; so did France. But relatively small forces of Nazi mechanized troops went through them like a knife through butter. Fewer than 100,000 Nazis, in tanks and armored cars, supported by air forces, smashed from Sedan to the coast and destroyed France. A mechanized force of 500,000 men, led by young officers who have learned the lessons of the present war, would be worth more to the United States than an old-style Army of 2,000,000 men, led by old generals who are still fighting the war of 1918.

CAN WE GET ENOUGH VOLUNTEERS?

Right now, the recruiting campaign is going fairly well, but it will take 4 or 5 more months to fill up the Regular Army to authorized strength. But the Army never has trouble getting recruits for its aviation service. If the Army is mechanized, and the length of service cut to 1 year (now the present term is 3 years, although the proposed draft army would serve for only 1 year), it is possible that recruiting of volunteers would give us an Army of from 400,000 to 600,000 men.

WHAT KIND OF DRAFT IS BEST?

If it turns out that we cannot get the minimum number of men needed for national safety by volunteering, then what kind of a draft would work best? One plan is to register everybody between 18 and 64 years, but to call out in the first year only about 1,500,000 men between 21 and 30 years, from a group estimated to contain about 11,500,000. Men with families and in necessary occupations would be exempt in the first draft. Another plan would be to call into service practically every able-bodied young man as soon as he was 20 or 21, and make almost no exceptions.

In the long run, it may turn out that a draft is necessary to get an army as large as we need. Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead hopes not. But before any draft is made, the Army should shake off its 1918 ideas, aim at a highly mechanized force instead of the old mass army, and should see what a sensible volunteering campaign will do. Cut Army enlistments to 1 year, and prove to the boys that they're going to run tanks and trucks instead of tramping through the dust. Let's not draft men for the Army if we don't need to.

Wendell Willkie—An Appraisal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following appraisal of Wendell L. Willkie.

In meeting Willkie one gets an impression of great strength, both physical and mental. In shaking hands with Willkie I thought my fingers would be crushed—and I have a real grip myself.

In my opinion, Willkie would be a real fellow on a camping trip into the wilds; a very valuable partner to have in a business venture; and certainly a real tower of strength in a battle of any kind, whether political or otherwise.

Willkie is a man with a powerful physique, abounding vitality, a fund of good humor, a mischievous twinkle in his eyes, a direct way of looking at one, and a bluff, hearty manner of greeting people—a good man to tie to.

I was not for Willkie before the convention in Philadelphia; I did not know enough about him. I now sincerely believe that the Philadelphia convention selected the best man of the lot, the one who will make the strongest appeal to the voters, and the one best qualified to lead us out of the wilderness we have been wandering around in during the past 8 years.

I consider Willkie the man best qualified to straighten out our "unpreparedness mess," and it needs straightening out very badly.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BIG TIMBER PIONEER OF MONTANA

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Big Timber Pioneer of Montana:

[From the Big Timber Pioneer of Montana]

NOT VERY ENCOURAGING

Official canvass of the primary election returns in this State should not be very encouraging to the Republicans, especially to those who have predicted that Willkie and the Republican State ticket will go across in November.

For Senator, Wheeler and Freebourn polled a total of 103,626; Cheadle, Carroll, and Fluent, Republicans, 42,738. A majority of 60,888 for the Democratic candidates is not bad in a total vote of 146,364.

For Governor, Ayers, Lamey, and Kathan polled a total of 105,319; Ford, Hauswirth, Leuthold, Moe, Stockdal, and Wuerthner, Republicans, 49,652. A majority of 55,667 for the Democratic candidates.

In this congressional district O'Connor polled 47,420; Hoiness and Ruffcorn a combined vote of 26,348.

In the western district the Democratic vote totals 48,380; Republican, 19,840.

John W. Bonner, unopposed Democrat for attorney general nomination, had the largest individual vote, 80,176; Fred H. Padbury, unopposed for secretary of state, the largest individual Republican vote, 37,382.

Majorities for all other nominations ran about on an average with those for Senator and Governor on both tickets.

Fifth Anniversary of Inauguration of Social Security Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT PREPARED BY PAUL V. M'NUTT, FEDERAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, today is the fifth anniversary of the inauguration of the social-security law. As chairman of the Finance Committee, it was my privilege to participate in the preparation and enactment of that law. I believe that it is wholesome and beneficial.

I offer and ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement relative to the 5 years of the administration of the social-security law as prepared by the present Administrator, Hon. Paul V. McNutt.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF PAUL V. M'NUTT, FEDERAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR, ON THE FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Five years ago the Social Security Act became a law. If any bold prophet had predicted in 1932 that within 3 years America would lift itself from the nadir of depression to establish a farsighted social-security program for the future, few would have believed it possible.

The fact that social security came in 1935 is a tribute to the unflagging energy and clear-headed policy of the President. In 1927, 1928, 1929, the lush years of our gamblers' boom, we had made no effort to plan for the security of American family income. We had not applied to our national economy the simple conservative principles that Benjamin Franklin recommended to our ancestors. So when the gamblers' bubble burst and hundreds of thousands of men lost their jobs the destruction of family purchasing power accelerated the depression by destroying home markets. Much more significant than the destruction of markets is the fact that the depression broke up families and thus destroyed the basic unit upon which our American democracy rests.

In 1935 with America once more on the highway of economic recovery, the President might have ignored the future. He might have been satisfied to rest on recovery. Certainly thousands were urging him to be content with the economic arrangements of the 1920's. "Why," they cried, "should we mix recovery and reform?" But the President had vision. He saw that the tragedy which comes to individuals and to nations when family income stops must be met by a farsighted plan, financially sound enough and secure enough to withstand the "blitzkrieg" of any depression.

Through the Social Security Act of 1935, and the amendments which strengthened it in 1939, such defenses were built. On this fifth anniversary of the establishment of this great program let us see just how soundly and strategically these defenses were planned. Let us consider the problems they were designed to meet, and the principles and methods and good management by which they were planned and executed to the Nation's satisfaction.

Congress attempted to construct no simple Maginot line. It recognized that the forces which attack the security of families are varied. It saw that the forces of depression were swift and changing. They waged a war of movement. And in a war of movement there must be equal versatility on the side of the defense. So the social-security plan was no simple catch-all. It grew out of experience and study.

To protect the great mass of wage earners and their families Congress created two insurance programs—programs by which workers and employers could plan in the fat years for the lean years which must follow.

The first of these was old-age and survivors' insurance. To every worker comes age, or death. In age the pay check stops for the worker. He and his family must have a regular monthly income. They must know in advance that they will have a regular monthly income if they are to feel secure. Nobody could believe in a country which didn't afford him a means to provide for his own self-respecting future.

Old age can be planned for in the working years of life if there is established in the social machinery of the Nation a dependable way to plan for it.

If the worker dies in the working years of his life his pay check stops, and there must be provision made for the widow and orphans and others who depend upon that worker as their breadwinner. That is a simple problem of insurance, not greatly dissimilar to the group insurance with which American workers and American industry have long developed.

Old-age and survivors' insurance program is financed through the years of a worker's life by contributions which he and his employer make into a social-security trust fund which can be used for no other purpose than the payment of such benefits. It met that challenge.

Fifty million workers now have social-security accounts. Monthly insurance payments are already going to more than 132,000 persons at a rate of more than two and one-half million dollars a month. To the families of workers who die leaving no one eligible for monthly benefits, more than $20,000,000 has been paid out in lump-sum death claims under this insurance program. Hundreds of thousands of old people approaching the age of 65 will find that these monthly payments related to the size of their average monthly wages will enable them to live in security in their own home among their own friends in their own home town. They come to the workers as a matter of right because they join with their employers in helping to pay for them.

Unemployment does not come to every worker but the extent of unemployment within limits can be estimated and planned for. The scope of unemployment varies from industry to industry, from section to section. These are problems best managed by the State which can thereby adapt the details of unemployment compensation to the characteristics of its industries and the needs of its own people. These programs receive Federal aid. They meet standards as to the professional quality of their administration and the professional excellence of their personnel. Every State and Territory now has a system of unemployment compensation financed by industrial contributions.

More than $1,000,000,000 has been paid out in out-of-work benefits to unemployed workers during the relatively short period this program has been in operation. More than 28,000,000 workers have earned credits toward unemployment compensation. Nearly 1,500,000 workers this month are receiving unemployment compensation based on such credits.

Thus contributory programs cushion the shock when family pay checks stop for workers in American commerce and industry. Other workers on the farms, in the homes, in nonprofit institutions, as specified by the act are not protected under either the old-age and survivors-insurance system or the State systems of unemployment compensation. Congress limited the operation of the system so that its extension could be planned step by step as the financial and administrative stability of the program dictated. I think we all look to the day when coverage will be extended to those who are not now protected.

There are others without income who cannot build up rights under these social-insurance programs which apply to wage earners. These others are the needy, who are needy from no fault of their own, who therefore should not have to accept the aid accompanied by any of the stigma of charity. For these groups there are public-assistance programs which stand behind the front line of social insurance.

Every State has today a program of protection for the needy aged; nearly every State has programs for dependent children, for the needy blind. Like the program of unemployment compensation, these are federally aided, State-administered programs. They, too, meet high standards in their management and in their personnel.

Nearly 3,000,000 people monthly are being helped through these Federal-State public-assistance programs. Of these, 1,930,000 are needy old people, more than 800,000 are dependent children, and more than 48,000 are blind. Payments made under these programs total more than $1,500,000,000 for old-age assistance, $47,000,000 for aid to the blind, and $350,000,000 for aid to dependent children. It is estimated that more than $50,000,000 dollars will be paid out through these public-assistance programs in the month of August alone. This brings the total payments made through the benefit-paying programs of the Social Security Board to a total of more than $3,000,000,000.

Other action is being taken for protecting family income—action that strengthens these benefit-paying programs. Through a reorganization order last year, the President transferred to the Social Security Board, the United States Employment Service. It is now well coordinated in a Bureau of Employment Security, which also administers the unemployment-compensation program. When a man is out of a job, the first thing he wants is another job. A job is the first line of defense for family income. If a suitable job can't be found, then his unemployment-compensation check is the alternative. That simple logic dictated the grouping of these two activities. From them there is now beginning to flow a sounder and more comprehensive understanding of the job needs of American industry and the income needs of American families during periods of unemployment.

There is now a Nation-wide network of 1,500 full-time employment offices. There are nearly 3,000 branch offices regularly visited by traveling representatives. Last year more than 3,500,000 workers were placed in jobs. Today to meet the demands of vital defense industries we are extending our program of employment service and channeling needed workers from community to community and State to State as industry requires. In the long run the employment services will reduce the cost of unemployment compensation by putting men more promptly into jobs and thus shortening the period of unemployment.

Behind all the benefit-paying programs, there is farsighted provision for improving the health of American workers and American workers' families. When they are fully developed, these should have the effect of decreasing loss of income through preventable disease and disability. One has only to look at the broad development of public-health services throughout the Nation under the Social Security Act, the new health officers in hundreds of rural counties, the increased clinical facilities and public-health nursing facilities in the cities, the programs for infant and maternal care, to feel the tremendous contribution they have made to the strength of America.

It is indeed fortunate for America that this farsighted policy was established 5 years ago. The employment-service program is today in the front line of the defense effort, finding skilled men for defense jobs. On the part of families of American workers throughout the Nation, there is a new confidence that the American system is creating a more secure future for them and their families. These are programs which have put the management genius of America to work for the ordinary man. In so doing, they have made a major contribution to the internal defense of our democracy. "Fifth columns" don't go very far when people know the Nation is at work for them.

We Don't Want Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from Religious Telescope, the official organ of the United Brethren Church, entitled "We Don't Want Conscription."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE DON'T WANT CONSCRIPTION

And now the country faces the possibility of a general peacetime conscription plan. The proposition is still pending. What form, if any, it may take is yet a matter unknown. The present discussion is more of the nature of a feeler to discover what the country will stand for, and if the people can be sufficiently scared the result may be a compulsory conscription plan that will include all men from 18 to 65 years of age for some form of military service. That, of course, represents the widest extreme, although some advocates would go so far as to include the women as well as the men. It indicates how near the lunacy fringe intelligent people can steer in a time of hysteria.

It is more probable that the requirement of this compulsory conscription plan will be much milder, if indeed it is adopted at all. It is possible that the sober second thought of the country will assert itself in time to forestall this wild move which would wipe out almost the last mark of distinction between America and the military powers of Europe.

Already the United States is committed to an armament program unparalleled in our history. Before the adjournment of the present Congress we will have voted for the building up of our military forces over $14,000,000,000, and almost every message of the President to Congress is an appeal for more money. The national debt limit will of necessity have to be lifted in a very short time, and this proposed conscription plan would increase indefinitely the demands upon the Treasury, committing through increased taxation the entire Nation to one giant military enterprise consuming the country's resources for an indefinite period, if not forever after. Shall we give all our strength to the war enterprise—we who have claimed to be a Nation committed to the ideals of peace and good will?

And all in time of peace, the only occasion being that a continental war is on in Europe, a continent that from time immemorial has been given to war and more war. Why should our testimony for peace be marred by this unnecessary action—this natural step toward a European regime for America? While we are not a war-like or warring Nation, our people can be counted on to arise to any emergency when it presents itself. Volunteers will not be lacking when a call is sounded, but to whip up a war hysteria by shouting "crisis" and "emergency," and even by waving a red flag in the face of other countries, is a matter to be deprecated and opposed. Our people are not ready for conscription on a basis of that sort.

Life is too short to devote any number of its precious and best years to military service unnecessarily. Its energies are intended for nobler purposes. It is time to be elevating our ideals as a people rather than to be lowering them. For, after all, our safety is not entirely in military machinery, defenses, and attitudes. Should we surrender our American ideals, forget the great fundamental principles upon which our national life has been established, and make ourselves like the nations which we are criticizing, nothing will save us. Destruction would come upon us from within. If reports from some of the conquered nations across the sea are to be accepted at face value, we are beginning to see anew that moral weaknesses are the real cause of national calamity. In fact, they constitute a calamity per se. We can't avoid the consequences of our moral weakness by process or program of saber rattling.

We favor a reasonable defense program. In this period of world insanity and revolution reason demands that the country be prepared for any possible uprising from within or sudden danger from without. That should be accepted on general principles, and should not depend on war scares. Certainly the American people would always recognize the wisdom of such a course, leaving no occasion for a sudden hullabaloo, with international ghosts and goblins dancing before our eyes to create a frenzy of fear and excitement.

Nor need safety measures be made political issues or be connected with politics in any sense. We have stated before on these pages that beyond doubt our national defenses need to be increased, and should be increased. More than that, we need to keep abreast with the progress of military equipment. The Army and Navy and air forces should be up to the minute. Every advance in invention and scientific research should be known and available to our military leaders. We have a right to expect that, and would be loath to think that those leaders were asleep while any possible enemy is creating superior military equipment.

But that is something far different from militarizing our country, exhausting its resources for the purpose of putting it on a war basis in peacetime, conscripting our manpower in gigantic military program, and turning the country into an armed camp. We don't want peacetime conscription—and don't need it.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered last Friday evening over the National Broadcasting System on the subject of peacetime conscription.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

However much we detest Hitlerism, however deeply we may love our own country and democracy and want to preserve them a treasure for other generations, however healthily we may hate dictatorship, we here in the United States ought to be able to find the way to successfully combat any possible encroachment upon us by dictatorships without making the United States a dictatorship.

Peacetime conscription and draft of manpower such as is now being advanced in a legislative way would be a most direct contribution to the creation of dictatorship. No dictator has gotten anywhere without the backing of conscripts and enlarged military powers. This charge is not answered by an assertion that any such contention discourages the cause of the Allies and is precisely what Hitler wants us to say at a time like this.

Conscription implies for our country a state of war. The mere implication of such a state carries with it executive and military powers that can be used to circumvent the highest resolve of a great people to stay out of war.

Peacetime conscription involves a deep American principle that ought to be debatable without inviting odious insinuations against those who choose to oppose it. There are times when Americanism must be both adverse and blind to what we might be given to believe to be great and lofty causes abroad.

This certainly is the time to resist the deliberate effort to paint all those who oppose the Roosevelt foreign policy as enemies of national defense. It is one of the oldest and crudest of political tricks, this one of dragging a dead herring across the pathway to destroy or confuse the scent of the real quarry.

National defense is one issue.

The Roosevelt foreign policy is another.

Let that be remembered. It is not only possible to be for one and against the other, but it is a fact that the Congress is united on the issue of national defense. There has not even been debate, except as to details, on any phase of the national-defense appropriation measures.

With others who share my complete distrust and my absolute fear of the Roosevelt foreign policy, I have consistently supported appropriations for a national defense consistent with what seemed to be our need growing out of the worst that the President's policy might invite from abroad.

At the same time, I oppose this foreign policy, which, carried to its logical extreme, can do nothing else but invite a war for us long before we are ready for it.

There is only one point where the two issues may be said to interlock. The foreign policy has made it essential that we make all speed to replace the chip on Uncle Sam's shoulder with sizeable cannons.

Had we been permitted to keep our heads about us, had our Government chosen to play the role of grim silence about affairs in Europe, which it should have played, and gone about the business of preparing for any conceivable emergency in a logical, orderly fashion, without the trumpetings of hysteria, our possible enemies would have been the ones to be confused instead of ourselves. But having strutted along the sidelines of the European war, wearing a chip, and not a thing else, yelling threats at some of the belligerents, we have been forced to show our card in the hole. Unfortunately, that card seems to be admittedly a military deuce.

Our job at hand now, by reason of this strutting and posing, is to shuffle the pack quickly and deal ourselves a new hand at a price in billions.

The defenders of the foreign policy would have it that some singular moral virtue attaches to that policy. If so, I have yet to discover it. Surely, it cannot be said that our foreign policy helped Poland, Belgium, Finland, Denmark, and Norway, or France, unless it helped her to the black doom of Nazi control. I am desperately afraid that it has not only not helped anyone, but that it has seriously impaired our own security. The future of England remains in doubt. The unpleasant possibility that we may have to face is that our foreign policy betrayed Britain even as it did France.

It is a fact largely lost sight of, but it is well to remember that unprepared England and France, who must have thought that we would come to their aid, declared war on Germany. Germany did not declare war on them. Let me acknowledge that sooner or later it might have been the other way around, that the European situation was such that the powder keg was not only tapped, but the fuze was lit. It makes little difference now who declared the war, except that the Allies, betting on our participation, and with an absolute lack of information as to our inability to be of help, plunged into it before they were ready.

Perhaps a Germany conquering all Europe might ultimately have looked in our direction. It is perfectly plain that Germany is out to carve itself an empire, as empires have been carved out of Europe for 2,000 years. But a year of stalling, a year of chess playing by the Allies, while they busily prepared behind the lines might have meant a better fate for France, at least might have meant a quicker end to Hitlerism.

If we are to be left alone and defenseless before the Hitler forces, we have our foreign policy to blame for it, a policy which betrayed those we call our friends. Let these things be remembered constantly, however unpleasant they are.

It is equally unpleasant to consider that with 95 percent of our people determined that we shall not go to war, we are being led down the pathway to war; all the trimmings and trappings and excitement of war are on full display before the enemy is in sight or is even chosen. To this there is objection, for our national security is threatened by it.

It is an old story that when one side in an argument has exhausted its points, and has learned that logic is defeating it, it resorts to calling names. It has reached a stage among some of the hard-pressed advocates of the Roosevelt foreign policy where the only defense they can stitch together against the cold light of reason is to yell: "Fifth columnist; pro-Nazi; pro-German; enemy of national defense; un-American."

Let me say here and now, much as I disapprove of playing a hand in European affairs, that if at any time it had been possible to send such portion of our armaments to Europe as to have effectively stopped the marauding ambitions of the German war lord, then I could see some logic in endorsing it. But even then on one condition, that the nations of Europe would agree to write for themselves a ticket of peace distinctly unlike the ticket of Versailles, from which Hitler emerged as the inevitable hangover. That it was never possible to do so is another cold and perhaps unpleasant fact.

But, the cruelest of all facts is that we must embark on a mad dash to arm because our foreign policy has put us on the spot, taken us back into European power politics from which we were once freed.

Let me say, however, that I do not envision Herr Hitler riding toward the mouth of the Potomac the morning after he succeeds in polishing off Britain, if he ever does. The most violent advocates of the war spirit have pulled in their horns on that proposition. The spectacle of Hitler experiencing at least a passing difficulty in getting across 24 miles of English channel rather causes them to back up on their first declaration that he could come sailing over 3,000 miles of ocean in a light breeze.

But, if we fear no attack from Hitler, then why support the cry for increased armaments?

The answer is threefold:

1. It is up to us to protect the Western Hemisphere against the worst under the Monroe Doctrine.

2. Our prospective enemies are not limited to Germany and Italy in this world of unrest.

3. The conduct of our foreign policy during these months of war and threats of war abroad, has invited new dangers, new emergencies to plan for. We must cut our defense cloth to fit the Roosevelt foreign policy, an invitation for trouble.

But there is not need to hysterically scuttle about like chickens at the sight of a hawk to meet whatever challenge may come. Part of our whipped-up hysteria is the cry for compulsory conscription. It is conceded that the times and conditions give us need for a bigger and a better Army and Navy. But that is no reason to resort to conscription.

When we propose to conscript our manpower we admit that there is something wrong with the way that our Army has been operated or else it wouldn't have to drag boys into it by the scruffs of their necks; or we admit that our modern youth does not want to serve his country, that he is so ungrateful for his own country's way of life that he refuses to give a little of his time to the lessons of national defense. I prefer to believe the former, never the latter.

There isn't a thing wrong with American youth, no reason to insult his patriotism, his courage, or his spirit by threatening him with peacetime conscription. The fact is that we have not half tried to get an Army without conscription.

The present period of enlistment is for 3 years.

The pay of the newly enlisted man is $21 a month.

The 3-year enlistment term comes about apparently from a theory that you can't make a soldier in less than 3 years, when in truth they were made in as many weeks in the last war. If it is true that you can't make a soldier out of a volunteer in 3 years, in heaven's name how are we going to make soldiers out of conscripts in 1 year, which is the time proposed under the pending draft bill?

Let us pass over the discouraging spectacle of a demand for conscription in time of peace, and deal with our actual needs. The Army wants the best men it can get; it wants men of ability, capable of absorbing the principles of a highly complicated, mechanized era, men who can work not only with the tools but with figures. This is a day of machines, of mechanics, of technicians, of men of some education.

What do we offer these men?

The privilege of entering the Army as soldiers, only to find themselves mowing an officer's lawn, running nonmilitary errands for a lieutenant, pulling some officer's car out of the ditch where he has unfortunately landed it, peeling potatoes, and making beds; we offer them the chance of entering a service where they are known as soldiers, just as soldiers, but where an officer is known as an officer and a gentleman. Did you ever hear the phrase, "a soldier and a gentleman?" There are as many gentlemen in the enlisted ranks as there are in the ranks of the officers; the advantage all officers enjoy is that they are gentlemen by act of Congress. Oh, but we are told, this is necessary for discipline. The social distinction of the officer and man must be observed at all times. Very well, if that is the extent of it all, let me suggest there is no more rigid discipline anywhere in the world than in many jobs—the factory, the city room of a large daily newspaper, or in a large corporation. Orders there are neither questioned nor disobeyed. Insubordination in the Army brings a stretch in the guardhouse. Insubordination in civilian life costs a man his job after which he doesn't sit in a guardhouse and still eat, be clothed and covered from the storms; he just doesn't eat; neither does his family.

These essentially stupid traditions which stand like a wall against recruiting the kind of Army we want, aren't going to be corrected overnight. I intrude them only to show why, in large measure, we haven't the Army we want to match our Roosevelt foreign policy.

But there are some things we can correct, so quickly and easily that all this pother of conscription can be forgotten.

1. We can cut the period of enlistment to a year. How can we expect a youth who has in mind a future civilian job to enlist for 3 years. He is just that much older when he gets out. A 1-year stretch is an entirely different matter. It could fit in between high school and college or between high school and a job.

2. We can afford to pay our recruits at least relief wages. We are asking these men to prepare to fight for us, a job surely worthy of a decent wage.

Let us try these things, and we'll get our Army. We don't need to adopt Hitler methods to stop Hitler. If Yankee ingenuity and the Yankee spirit aren't enough to throw the fear of the Lord into Mr. Hitler or any other who might contemplate attacking us, we have changed a lot in recent years.

The Senate majority leader has declared that not more than 24 votes can be recorded against conscription in the Senate. The truth is that this issue finds a completely uncertain mind with the majority of that body. The debate now starting and the degree in which the American people make themselves heard on this subject of peacetime conscription will determine whether passage of the proposal is possible. It seems quite certain that the proposal in its present form cannot prevail, that large compromise will be offered. But there ought never be compromise with the theory of conscription of men in peacetime, certainly not until and unless the emergency is counted sufficiently great to warrant conscription of profits at one and the same time.

Our Navy for Our Own Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me over Columbia Broadcasting System, Tuesday, August 13, 1940, on the subject, Our Navy for Our Own Defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Now, as never before, in making decisions for this Nation our judgment should be reached not by calling names or questioning the motives of all who differ with us but by dispassionate appraisal of realities, without yielding to prejudices nor swayed by sympathy and without the slightest taint of partisanship.

Repeatedly, on the floor of the Senate, before the outbreak of the European war, I asserted that our paramount concern was our national security and the avoidance of war. At that time few questioned the accomplishment of both of these objectives. Today, however, under the urgency of national defense, proposals are made that disregard all considerations of avoidance of war.

We have been moving as rapidly as possible to strengthen and to expand our Navy, our Army, our air force and air bases, and all the rest embraced within the broad term of national defense.

But there is another step, which in my opinion is even more important. In vain do we seek peace unless we establish a strong policy of war avoidance and are determined not to participate in the wars now raging in Europe, Africa, and Asia. Any other course means war, which our people do not want, and for which we are woefully unprepared.

The particular question which I wish to discuss tonight is the proposal now being pressed upon Congress and the country for the disposal of 50 or 60 of the destroyers now in our fleet, and their transfer by one means or another to Great Britain.

This proposal, in my judgment, violates both of the cardinal principles upon which rests our hope of avoidance of war.

First and foremost, the transfer of naval destroyers from our flag to the British flag, no matter by what method or device, makes mockery of our declared policy of neutrality and nonintervention. It is an act of belligerency and of war. Who, desiring to keep out of war, can deny that fact?

Note the steady march that is directing our course along the road to war. Before the war we forbade even our private citizens to trade in war munitions with belligerents. To help the Allies this embargo was lifted by act of Congress, and all private industries, except shipbuilders, have been since October last at the disposal of the Allies. Next Government contracts were canceled in order to deliver to the Allies the airplanes of the Army and Navy we had "on order" for ourselves. This was done under the pretense that the Government could legally modify its contracts and postpone the time of delivery. Next came the attempt to deliver to the Allies our so-called naval "mosquito fleet" then under construction. This failed because of our neutrality law enacted during the World War. Time does not permit me to enumerate all of the powder, arms, and other munitions that have been turned over to the Allies during the past months. And now it is suggested that we repeal long existing laws preventing the sale or disposition of naval vessels in order that we may transfer 50 of our destroyers to the British.

I am opposed to this destroyer proposal, which it is now admitted could not possibly be consummated without an act of Congress setting aside existing prohibitions.

The proposal arises from the plainly desperate need of Britain for naval reinforcements and rests upon the contention as advanced so recently by Gen. John J. Pershing, who declared that "if there is anything we can do to save the British Fleet we shall be failing in our duty to America if we do not do it."

Those were his words. Let us perceive their implications.

If that be our duty and our course of safety, then why should we limit ourselves to 50 or 60 of our least serviceable destroyers? Why should we not send at once our best ships, our fastest planes, and our trained men to handle them? And let me add, in all fairness to this group, that is just what many of them would have us do and some of them even proclaim that this would not be entering the war. Very few, however, had the courage to sign a statement as did Admiral Standley (retired) favoring a declaration that a state of war existed between this country and Germany.

I submit that this proposal presents a basic and all-important question. Either we should enter the war and give our all or we should stay out of the war and retain our fleet intact for the defense of our own country.

There is no middle course. There is no half-way point. We cannot take the leap from the precipice of nonbelligerency into the abyss of war and expect to stop in midair. The placing of a part of our Navy at the disposal of Britain, or any other belligerent, is not a measure "short of war." It is an act of war.

We all hope that Britain will not be defeated. However, conceding the great value to us of English sea power, yet I do not concede that the British Fleet is the last bulwark of American freedom and American institutions.

I say to you, my fellow citizens, with the utmost conviction that America can be and if necessary will be defended by Americans alone. Any other policy necessitates meddling in the quarrels of other nations, making alliances, political and military—which means subjecting future generations of Americans to the sufferings, sacrifices, and horrors of future wars not of our making.

Is any American so naive to think that the British, if they lose the present war, will not proceed as she should, to undo the cruel treaty that will be exacted by the Nazis? Do you think if Germany loses, she would not attempt a "comeback" as she planned to do following the Versailles Treaty? Yet Americans, accepting the propaganda that we are Hitler's next victims, now urge that we try to stop him by delivering a small part of our Navy to his foes. Whether Hitler intends to come over here or not is debatable, but one thing is certain, our involvement in this war means committing America to participation in all future European wars.

Obviously the advocates of reinforcing the British Navy with some of our destroyers can offer no positive assurance that such a step will insure British victory. The most that can be said is that it might have that happy result, that it might prove just enough to turn the scales in Britain's favor. It is said that risking 50 destroyers is a fair gamble that the war can be kept on the other side of the Atlantic.

Let me inquire: If 50 old destroyers do not save the world, will we gamble 150 or 200 destroyers—our total number of destroyers is 201, exclusive of those being converted into seaplane tenders, mine layers, and so forth. And if all our destroyers do not stop Hitler, will we next gamble with our cruisers and our aircraft carriers, then with our battleships and finally then with our manpower?

I inquire, have we a navy ample for our needs if attacked by Germany, or Japan, or both?—or even one sufficient to uphold the Monroe Doctrine?

Since January 1 of this year the Navy has requested, and the Congress has approved the expansion of our naval program three separate times. First, expansion in our combatant ships of 11 percent and our aircraft 50 percent; secondly, expansion of our aviation shore facilities and an increase in our aircraft of over 100 percent; and thirdly, increase of 70 percent in our combatant naval vessels and another 50-percent increase in aircraft. And all of these increases it will be physically impossible to complete before 1946. According to naval authorities, therefore, we have today a navy in strength 50 percent less than our actual requirements in surface vessels and nearly a 90-percent shortage in aircraft.

Yet in the face of these demands for enormous increases, fully justified, and which the Congress has authorized, it is seriously proposed that we diminish the present strength of our Navy by 50 destroyers. Ah, but they assert it is merely obsolete destroyers. Well, on March 1 last, at least 150 of our 301 combatant vessels in commission were overage or obsolete, yet they are all in commission, all being used, and all necessary. If we can spare 50 of our obsolete destroyers why cannot we spare half of our Navy, which on March 1 last was admittedly obsolete?

Incidentally, it takes 2 years to build a destroyer, and the replacement cost of each one of these would be $5,000,000.

My fellow countrymen, why gamble with the United States Fleet? It is the only force in the world today that can keep war from our shores—the only force in the world that can prevent aircraft from beyond the seas from bombing our large cities, our industrial areas, and our civilian populations.

Let me put this proposal to you in another way:

If saving the British Fleet is essential to our security and our freedom, why take half-way measures? The outstanding lesson of the war to date is that half-way measures will not suffice. England and France took half-way measures in supporting Poland, Norway, and Belgium. The French claim that England took half-way measures in supporting her in the Battle of Flanders. Why fritter away the United States Fleet by sending a few ships at a time to be destroyed piecemeal by German and Italian land-based bombers, short-range submarines, and fast motor torpedo boats? Why not send the whole fleet at once?

Let me answer that question by citing to you the conclusions and matured judgment of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee after listening to a wealth of testimony of naval officers and experts last spring in connection with the naval-expansion bill. These conclusions were summarized in a report submitted to the Senate on May 15. I quote: "Our naval and air forces should be preserved for our own defense if and when needed. * * * We are not prepared to participate in the European war, and we do not possess the necessary weapons to make our efforts effective. * * * The assumption that British sea power may be destroyed implies that we should take our stand in the Western Hemisphere where our military power can be applied effectively and efficiently; that our Navy should not be subjected to the hazards of short-range shore-based aircraft and small submarines based on the continent of Europe.

"It implies that our Navy should be retained intact to prevent ship-borne aircraft from directing attacks against our cities and industrial areas and prevent an enemy from establishing naval, air, or submarine bases in this hemisphere which would threaten our security by attacking in any manner our vital sea communications and our homeland."

How is the situation today different from the situation last May, when the foregoing declarations were submitted? France has fallen, and England's situation is more critical. The inadequacy of our own defense is more apparent. Our own fears are greater. But these circumstances are no ground for a different policy or a different judgment. Instead they serve to greatly reinforce the advice to keep out of the war in Europe and keep all of our fleet for our own defense.

Let me set at rest, also, the misleading contention that our Navy possesses a considerable number of so-called surplus destroyers for which the Navy has no immediate need. The truth is that we have no surplus destroyers. Some of these overage and heretofore decommissioned destroyers are being converted into fast mine layers, aircraft tenders, and antiaircraft vessels, types urgently needed in our own Navy. Many of them are operating with the fleet and on neutrality patrol. Is our neutrality patrol so unnecessary that we can remove 50 destroyers from commission?

These destroyers are now being used to train officers and men of the Naval Reserve. Our present urgent need is to train the enlisted men and young officers on every ship we have so that as the new ships are commissioned month by month in the future, the sailors from these 50 destroyers will be ready to man the new ships.

I estimate the transfer of these destroyers will reduce our ability to keep approximately 7,000 enlisted men and 350 officers on training duty. The very same voices which urge the stripping of our Navy of one-seventh of its combat vessels (which is what the 50 destroyers represent) and thus depriving our Navy of the ability to train our enlisted men and officers, are the ones now crying out for conscription.

Let us be honest with ourselves Months ago we declared a policy of neutrality—notwithstanding the sympathies of our people. Since the belligerents with whom we sympathize appeared to be losing, we have abandoned step by step our neutrality and the American people may well cry out in alarm at the prospects of following the advice of those who are leading us down the road to war.

In conclusion, let me state my position, as an elected lawmaker of the United States Government, and as chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs. As God gives me the light to see my duty, I shall resist every proposal that seems to me, when analyzed, to lead to war, and I shall apply to every proposal the sole test as to whether or not it is conducive to the safety and security of America. I shall resist approving chance-taking proposals—like the destroyer transfer—that may held belligerents who we hope will succeed because I consider it my duty to avoid the terrible consequences of dissipating the resources, with which the Almighty has blessed us in abundance, the slaughter of the lives of American youths, and the destruction of our free institutions.

My course today is the same as I proclaimed on the floor of the Senate on April 17, 1939, about 4 months before the outbreak of the present European war, and before we knew what countries would be the belligerents. I said then and I repeat it now:

"If we provide for and scrupulously maintain absolute neutrality and a well-balanced and efficient Navy that potential enemies will fear and respect, we can secure the blessings of peace and freedom for this and generations to follow and we will then be able to turn our attention and energy without diversion from any outside source to the very urgent problems confronting us here at home. Let us resolve to preserve America for Americans, to shun foreign wars, to close our minds resolutely against foreign propaganda, to be officially absolutely neutral, and to seek humbly but insistently the cherished ways of peace.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSH D. HOLT
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, a group of 100 representatives of the Trade Union Women's Committee for Peace came to Washington to present a petition to President Roosevelt. The petition is as follows:

To Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States:

We, who love our country and desire to strengthen and defend democracy at home, believe that involving the United States in this war will not bring peace or freedom, but only death to our loved ones, great suffering through heavy taxes and rising prices, and destruction to our civil liberties.

We hereby express our will and determination:

1. To keep our country out of war.
2. To use our resources to end poverty, unemployment, and insecurity at home.
3. To preserve and strengthen trade unions.
4. To defend civil liberties and gains in social legislation.
5. To make our country a haven for refugee women and children, innocent victims of a murderous war.
6. To defeat any measures for peacetime universal conscription.

American women say: We want to be wives, not widows; mothers, not mourners.

Keep our boys over here.

America wants peace.

This group has as its chairman Dr. Bella C. Dodd, of the Teachers' Union; and as its secretary Miriam Murphy, of the Women's Auxiliary Transport Workers' Union. The committee is endorsed by Norma Aronson, U. O. P. W. A. Office and Clerical Workers, C. I. O.; Winifred Crost, Women's Auxiliary, Photo Engravers, A. F. of L.; Frances Bryant, president, Ladies Auxiliary, National Maritime Union, C. I. O.; Jane Filley, Local 1250, C. I. O., Department Store Union; Esther Hagler, Women's Auxiliary, Teamsters' Union, A. F. of L.; Dora Jones, Domestic Workers' Union, A. F. of L.; Rose Labelle, Local 1, Waiters' Union, A. F. of L.; Esther Letz, vice president, Local 65, United Wholesale and Warehouse Employees, C. I. O.; Ona Luebke, Women's Auxiliary, Federation of Architects, C. I. O.; Mary Luciel McGorkey, president, New York District, State, County, and Municipal Workers, C. I. O.; Bella Lehr, Fur Dyers and Dressers, C. I. O.; Mabel Pollock, president, Women's Auxiliary, Newspaper Guild; Irene Mason, I. L. G. W. U., A. F. of L.; Edith Perrin, Local 16, Waiters' Union, A. F. of L.; Evelyn Marron, United Shoe Workers, C. I. O.; Mildred Gordon, United Beauty Culturists Union, C. I. O.; Gertrude Shostack, Local 1102, United Retail Employees, C. I. O.; Ann Wharton, secretary, United Federal Workers, C. I. O.; Gretel Spiro, educational director, Fur Workers' Joint Council; and Charlotte Stern, U. O. P. W. A.

It was my pleasure to speak to them. The speech was carried over the Mutual Broadcasting network. I ask that my speech be printed in the Appendix of the Congressional Record.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

The "blitzkrieg" to drive through a conscription bill before the people can awaken has bogged down. Every day as the people find the truth about this piece of legislation, the opposition grows at a great pace. We can win this battle to stop peacetime conscription if the people become active in expressing to their Members of the House and the Senate their opposition to this unneeded, unwise and un-American bill.

Why should we defeat this Burke-Wadsworth bill, drafted by a large corporate-lawyer interventionist?

First, it is against traditional American policy.

Second, it has not been proven as necessary.

Time does not permit a more thorough discussion tonight.

The issue is one that challenges the American way of life, it affects every home in our country. It is the height of regimentation and is a step toward establishing militarism.

Millions of fine people of Europe came to this country in the past, came to this country for a haven against military persecution in their land. They had fled from countries that considered a citizen the servant of the State. They came to this country for freedom. Free men always have resented conscription in time of peace. They knew that peactime conscription was a weapon by which rulers destroyed the rights of citizens and made them vassals.

May I read three headlines: "All Germany Rejoices in Conscription Law—Soviet to Boost Army Strength by Conscription—Military Service from 18 to 33 Decreed by Italy." And what were the reasons? I quote from the statements of those in control: "The educational value of compulsory service was given as a reason for introducing it." "The educational value." Doesn't that sound familiar? That is the same reason given in the United States in 1940.

Let me continue to give you the reasons for the establishing of conscription in Europe and I quote: "It takes the training and discipline of the army to teach us the virtue of centuries." Doesn't that sound like the reasons given to the United States in 1940? Another reason given was that it polished the crude peasants. Some of the intelligentsia in the colleges of America are advancing the same reason in America because of the polishing of the American youth, as they say, into a better understanding.

Oh, but they say, look at Switzerland. We all have the highest regard for that great, peaceful little country of Switzerland, a country that has been a factor in peace for the entire world. But, they mislead the people when they try to compare the military service in Switzerland with that proposed in the Burke-Wadsworth bill. They are not alike.

But, they say, conscription gets the boys ready for an emergency. Let me show you the effect in the words of Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, an advocate of conscription, and I quote:

"The first thing that must be done," he said as he discussed the value of trained soldiery, "is to destroy all initiative, and that with the training fits men to be soldiers."

And further:

"The recruit does not know how to carry out orders. His mental state differs from that of the trained soldier who obeys mechanically. We must get our men so that they are machines.

"We have to have our men trained so that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncompromising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer."

I cannot refrain from pausing here to call your attention to that, mothers of boys, because your son must be made to understand that he can have no fear, that the punishment for fear is, and I quote, "an uncompromising military system backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer." Is that American? Is that the training needed by these fine young Americans?

I must hurry on to finish the quotation:

"The recruits have got to put their heads into the military noose. They have got to be jacked up. They have got to be bawled out."

So, in the words of an advocate of conscription, in the words of this major general, your son will have that training. When American boys have to face that type of control, the greatness of our country is gone. Let us not set up Hitler methods here in order to stop Hitler over there. As the advertisements have said on the billboards of this country, "Continue the American way." Many of those pushing conscription have helped pay for ads calling for continuation of the American way but are now working to put upon us this alien doctrine of peacetime conscription.

Now, let us look at the next point. Is this peacetime conscription necessary?

There is no basis to the statement that the volunteer system has failed. In the first place, it has not been given a good chance, even though it has been a success. If those in charge of the program would really call for a recruiting drive in this country, you would note a vast difference in the number of enlistments. Compare in your own mind the drive for volunteers with the drives you have heard over the air, in the newspapers, through personal contact, for many Government and personal objectives. You know and we all know that this drive for recruits has been half-hearted and not put across to the people. As to why this has not been done, those in charge can best answer.

I recall, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, when we had before us representatives of both armed branches of our Government, that they did not say that the recruiting drive had been less than their expectations. To the contrary, it was stated that the recruiting drive was even above expectations.

Furthermore, the 3-year enlistment period could very easily be changed to 1 year. It is a vast difference to ask a young man to agree to be in the Army 1 year and ask him to be in the Army 3 years. If we want trained soldiers, why not open the 1 year enlistment plan for a trial. You'll see a great difference.

I wish I could discuss the so-called danger of invasion that is being spread throughout this country to create hysteria. Much of it is pure, promoted poppycock to get people willing to do anything those in control want to have done. Let us have a strong, national defense but this spreading of fear is too obvious.

These people say we are unprepared. We are financially unprepared also. We have billions of indebtedness. We are far more financially unprepared than we are unprepared in manpower. If the promoters of this legislation are so interested in getting the country ready, why haven't they drafted legislation for financial preparedness? Everyone knows that is vital in time of war. No, they say, we must study those things carefully. It doesn't take study, according to them, to draft young fellows and take them from their work to go in the Army, but it does take study for legislation to touch wealth. Let them come forward with a draft for capital in time of emergency. The same lobbyists will not be at work for that. Many of these are the same individuals who have been howling of the danger of regimentation. Anything that regulates their business is regimentation; but drafting boys, according to them, is not. They have not raised their voices about that because this is a regimentation of life and blood. They oppose regimentation of money and treasure.

I welcome you in your drive to stop this un-American doctrine. You work. You know something about labor. You know of the suffering of labor. You know that war and emergencies such as these cripple social legislation for which you have fought for years.

Your son will go into real military training. He will not be invited to go to Plattsburg, park his car in a garage, and have time to go to the cocktail bars. Your son will be a soldier.

Ask labor in Europe about peacetime conscription and its effect.

Also, I desire to note some parts of the bill.

No place in the bill specifically exempts married men from conscription. To be exact, I quote the language:

"The President is also authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to defer training and service in the land and naval forces, of those men in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their deferment advisable." Now, get that, you are exempt, "under such regulations as he may prescribe." What if no regulations are prescribed? None are specifically required. The important words are: "under such regulations as he may prescribe." Why isn't it definite in the bill?

And while I am asking questions, may I prompt a question: What is going to happen to the property of a young man who is paying installments for a home while he is in the conscript Army at $21 a month? I have not the time to ask many more such pertinent questions which are not solved and which should be solved now, not after the boys have been drafted. This job-return clause is a fake. It is unenforcable and was put in the bill to lessen opposition.

We can win this battle. We must counteract the publicity "blitzkrieg" of the controlled newspapers, of controlled radio commentators. We can win if you get busy, now. Let's beat this un-American conscription law.

And in closing, let me leave this thought with you. Have you ever seen a man who is for war who is not also for conscription? Just think. Those for our getting into this terrible war are for this conscription. Why?

Ambassador Bullitt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY GENEVIEVE CLARK THOMSON

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the New Orleans Item-Tribune of August 11, 1940, entitled "The Strange Career of the Ebullient Ambassador Bullitt."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Orleans (La.) Item-Tribune of August 11, 1940]

THE STRANGE CAREER OF THE EBULLIENT AMBASSADOR BULLITT—FINE HAND OF ENVOY DISCOVERED BEHIND WELLES' CASTIGATION OF RUSSIA

(By Genevieve Clark Thomson)

At Habana, as usual, Secretary Hull did a swell job. The man from east Tennessee again brought home the bacon. But while he was laboring with his apparently inexhaustible patience to bring about effective harmony and cooperation in the Americas it seems that one of our exuberant young ambassadors again dug his fingers into the diplomatic jam pot.

The country was startled about that time by the severity of Under Secretary of State Welles' castigation of Russia concerning its acquisition of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. A sizable section of the press thereupon castigated Mr. Welles. They called his blast "presumptuous meddling" and pointed out that should the United States ever actually lock horns with Japan, since England is fully engaged on the other side of the world, our only possible ally in the Pacific would be the Soviet Republics. These are facts irrespective of whether or not we like the political philosophy in accordance with which Russia now operates.

Said the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

"The administration's foreign policy is beyond comprehension, unless it is simply a course of world-wide meddling. It isn't even consistent. Only a few days ago, Mr. Hull assailed the British for closing the Burma Road, and thus helping Japan in its war on China. Mr. Roosevelt has publicly endorsed a 'Stop Hitler Now' campaign. Well, if there is any likely future challenger to Hitler and to Japan, it is Soviet Russia. Where does Mr. Welles' blast fit into this picture?"

Moreover there are those who feel, whether rightly or wrongly, that our harsh words to Russia certainly did nothing to help, and possibly tended to hinder, a friendly understanding which England was exerting considerable effort to bring about between herself and the Soviet Republics. This is speculation. But it is not speculation that a few days after Mr. Welles' fulmination Russia disappointed England by announcing through Foreign Minister Molotov the continuance of friendly relations with Nazi Germany. In passing Molotov gave Uncle Sam a resounding kick in the slats.

The most mystifying feature of this remarkable pronouncement was that it should have come from Mr. Welles. To those who know him as a man almost glacially calm and self-restrained its superheated phraseology was out of character. It is known that no man speaking for the State Department voices his individual opinion or uses his own words exclusively. Nevertheless no such explosive words have heretofore fallen from the lips of the present Under Secretary. And their utterance profoundly disturbed many who regard Sumner Welles as one of our most capable career diplomats.

EBULLIENT BULLITT BEHIND THE SCENES

Facts have since come to light which somewhat dispel the perplexities surrounding this deplorable diplomatic incident. It is reported that the State Department had prepared a statement couched in proper diplomatic verbiage protesting Russia's seizure of these three small Baltic states. This statement was forwarded for approval to the President at Hyde Park.

When it arrived William C. Bullitt, American Ambassador to France, was Mr. Roosevelt's guest at his country seat. And Mr. Bullitt is burdened with no self-doubt regarding his ability to supply the right answer to any and every question which arises in foreign affairs. More importantly, according to Washington correspondents, he has access to the Presidential ear, second to none. From past experience persons who keep in touch with such matters know that when Mr. Bullitt seizes his pen he is prone to wield it with more facility than discretion.

About 6 weeks ago it was said in the United States Senate that Mr. Bullitt had, in the course of his diplomatic and literary pursuits, written a letter to the then French Premier, Paul Reynaud, assuring him that if France went to war upon the invasion of Poland, she would be followed in a short time by the United States. It was added that Mr. Reynaud still has this letter in his possession, and suggested that in the future he might make use of it.

This is a charge so grave that it can't be waved away as an indiscretion. If this is true then it can be said, not without foundation, that the Third French Republic was misled into war and destruction by the word of an accredited representative of the United States.

Such a thought must sicken every American heart. Nor can it be shrugged off by saying that it was France's tough luck if the French Government didn't know that the power of declaring war for the United States resides in its Congress, and not in its diplomatic representatives.

Unfortunately there is some precedent for this unwarrantable assumption of authority to speak for the people and Government of the United States. There is evidence that the mysterious Colonel House, an unofficial ambassador to President Wilson, a man whose name was never presented to or confirmed by the Senate, roamed around Europe during the last World War making commitments and threats in the name of the American Government which were subsequently made good.

And Walter Hines Page, our Ambassador to St. James's, whose great concern for the government to which he was accredited, rather than the one he represented, led him to do things that were lamentable to say the least.

AMBASSADOR PAGE ALSO MEDDLED

For one thing he misled President Wilson by systematically telling him half the truth, instead of the whole of it and by advising Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Secretary, how to answer diplomatic communications which the American Ambassador had been instructed by the State Department to present to the British Foreign Office. In other words, he was answering his own Government. This is not guess work. These facts are pridefully set forth in the Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page. And they are abundantly substantiated in the hearings of the special Senate committee investigating munitions. In justice to Mr. Wilson it must be said that had he been in possession of all the facts, he might have taken a very different course regarding this country's excursion into the war to end wars.

Today there is a bronze tablet in Westminster Abbey with the inscription "In memory of Walter Hines Page, friend of England in her hour of greatest need." At the time of its erection about two decades ago this tablet was a cause of some wonderment and pride in the United States. But as time has worn on, sober second thought has led many Americans to agree with one of the great Chief Justices of the Supreme Court whose comment was "I hope that when I am dead my life will have been such that there will be some who wish to commemorate it. But if so I hope such a marker will be placed in the United States and for services rendered to the United States."

Indeed it is a hopeful sign that increasing numbers of Americans feel that our representation abroad has not always been conducted in the highest interest of this Government and look forward to the day when all American diplomats will represent the interests of the United States instead of those of the countries to which they are accredited. And there is a growing thought among their less cosmopolitan countrymen that if they don't they should be recalled.

But let us return to our mutton—Mr. Bullitt. It in no way lessens the consternation of informed people to learn that the broadside delivered by Mr. Welles was in fact drafted at Hyde Park, and that Ambassador Bullitt had a heavy hand in its drafting.

THE CAREER OF WILLIAM BULLITT

It is high time that the American people give some attention to this socially charming gentleman, who speaks so freely in their name. Here are some of the facts. He was born in Philadelphia in 1891 of wealthy and socially prominent parents. He was graduated from Yale in 1912. For several years thereafter he dabbled in the newspaper business as a correspondent of sorts, occupying three different jobs in 2 years. He became an assistant in the State Department in 1917. Although 26 years of age when we entered the war, he saw no military service. This is not necessarily a reflection upon him. Not every young man could serve in our armed forces, and some were needed in the State Department. But it may in a measure account for his enthusiasm for war in contrast to the profound aversion to it on the part of a number of leaders both in and out of Congress, who did serve overseas with our fighting forces.

In 1918 and 1919 Mr. Bullitt was an attaché of the American mission to negotiate peace. While in Paris he conceived the notion that he could work his way to Russia, which was then virtually incommunicado with the outside world, and find out how the Lenin government ticked. Accordingly President Wilson sent him on a special mission to that country. Circumstances were such that this mission could only be carried out by a high degree of secrecy and adventure which were doubtless wholly agreeable to a young man of Mr. Bullitt's ebullient temperament.

Once in Russia he became completely enchanted with Lenin and all his works. And this enchantment was reflected in his subsequent report to President Wilson. The merits or demerits of this report were thoroughly aired and debated by Congressional committees during the titanic struggle over America's entry into the League of Nations.

Suffice it to say that Mr. Wilson received his young emissary's findings coldly, and did not see fit to act upon them. Thereupon, Mr. Bullitt became so enraged that he not only threw up his job with the Peace Commission, but wrote a letter to Woodrow Wilson which for impudence in addressing a President of the United States has never been surpassed.

He retired to private life and from its deep shade was not disinterred until Mr. Roosevelt to whose campaign fund he had contributed, became President in 1933. When he reappeared upon the public scene he was, to use the words of Polonius, "still harping on my daughter." Soviet Russia still captivated him. He wanted it recognized, as it had not been up to that time by the United States. And he wished to be our first Ambassador to the promised land. Both things came to pass, it is said, largely by reason of his influence with the President.

But before long his Russian honeymoon struck a snag. Just why is not entirely clear to the American public. Possibly it was because Stalin had a taste for running things in his domain without benefit of Mr. Bullitt's advice. At any rate this scion of Philadelphia came to have an unholy hatred for "Holy Russia." He wished to leave Moscow and go to Paris as our Ambassador. The President acceded to his request.

In France he led a glamorous life. Establishing himself in a great house, he became a great host, and was able to gratify one of his cherished ambitions by having the best cook in Paris. He was a leader in cafe society, in which the Duke and Duchess of Windsor also frolicked. And it was a matter of gratification to the American people that he had a flair for wearing good clothes equal to Anthony Eden's.

This, however, was but one facet of the character of this many-sided man. Other activities—not so innocuous—engaged his attention. Disappointed in Russia, he embraced France with all the ardor of a lover. And he busied himself in France's affairs with a zeal alien to good diplomacy.

EMBASSY PAPERS ARE BURNED

Some provincial Americans were rather shocked to learn that on occasion he actually sat in French cabinet meetings. They were glad, of course, to have our Ambassador on cordial terms with the Government and people of our sister Republic. But they were unable to recollect any precedent for an American Ambassador mixing in the domestic affairs of any foreign state.

Most of our diplomatic representatives have been liked by France. The two greatest, Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson, both loved, and were loved, by Marianne. But they never forgot for a moment that the purpose of their sojourn in that delightful country was solely to look after the interests of the United States.

When the tragic collapse of France came a few weeks ago, Mr. Bullitt, contrary to orders from the State Department, remained in Paris, instead of following the French Government to Bordeaux. And just before the Hitler hordes entered the city, according to press reports, the American Ambassador was devoting his energies to burning the papers of the Embassy, including his code book. So we shall never know in what other mischievious writings he had been engaged.

The New York Times reported that because of this exploit Secretary Hull was greatly "vexed" with Mr. Bullitt. To those familiar with Mr. Hull's talent for swearing this seemed a probable understatement. It was also stated that he had lost favor with the President. Meanwhile it was reported that he was under "protective custody" in his own house in Paris, and was forbidden to use the telephone. This prompted a Washington wag to remark that the only good deed Hitler ever did was to take Bill Bullitt off the telephone. It seems he is a great user of the telephone, and according to columnists Alsop and Kintner is one of two or three persons privileged to call the President at any hour, day or night. In fact, they give a colorful description of at least one of Mr. Bullitt's nocturnal chats with his chief.

Now Mr. Roosevelt's favorite ambassador is back home. And without reporting to his supposed chiefs at the State Department, he went straight to the President. It is reported that the State Department is still as much in the dark as the general public regarding the events leading to and surrounding the death of the French Republic, about which Mr. Bullitt should know and which is important information to men supposed to be directing or carrying out our foreign policy.

Moreover, Mr. Bullitt, who so loved the French Republic, has blossomed out in the press as the great defender of the Petain regime, which most Americans, including officials at the State Department, regard as a mere puppet of Adolf Hitler. He is reported as urging the President to release to the Petain government the $2,500,000,000 deposited here by the French Republic for safekeeping. The Treasury Department had every intention of keeping this money frozen here, since if it is released to Petain it will find its way into Herr Hitler's hands. Consequently, the Treasury is greatly upset by Mr. Bullitt's crusade for its release.

All and all, Mr. Bullitt's visit to the homeland has not brought much peace to his fellow officials, or to his more discerning countrymen. In fact, his activities make them distinctly uneasy.

Mr. Roosevelt is notably allergic to advice. Nevertheless some have ventured to suggest that now that he is in the United States Mr. Bullitt be kept here, at least until we can find out just what he has been up to while he has been away from us, and what grievous indiscretions he may have committed in our name.

America in a New World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY PROF. MAX LERNER AT CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Prof. Max Lerner, of Williams College, under the auspices of the Harvard defense group, at Cambridge, Mass., July 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The thrust of the Nazi columns has left its mark not only on the European consciousness but on the American as well. We are like someone who wakes in the middle of the night in a strange room, enclosed by unfamiliar walls, and wonders whether the spectral shapes around him are creatures of his imagination or terrible realities. Our clinging to the radio, hoping against hope as we listen to the sickening bulletins, are the attempts we make to exorcise our world. But it will not away. These are not ghosts—this brutal power of the Nazi war machine, this dynamic will of a new German governing group, these new barbarians come to sweep away the Roman empires of our minds.

One of the results of the almost fantastic disintegration of one country after another in the face of Hitler's march to power has been a complete bewilderment and an almost complete disillusionment on the part of the American people. All the old landmarks on which we had been accustomed to rely for guiding our path seem to have been washed away. The terms "liberalism," "conservatism," "radicalism" no longer have the meaning they once had, if indeed they have any meaning at all. The reactionaries in the world have become its revolutionists. If we yield to bewilderment, disillusionment, hysteria, we have three-quarters lost the battle. Now, as never before, we must understand what we believe in, what America stands for, what the imperatives are in this world of ours to which we shall have to submit, what we shall have to do within those imperatives in order to translate our beliefs into reality. Our thinking will have to become tough-minded instead of tender-minded. The world in which we live is facing a generation of wars, civil wars and revolutions. Only a new tough-mindedness on our part in the service of a set of fervent convictions can possibly rescue us from what seems to be the common doom.

One of the most important factors that is preventing us from achieving a tough-mindedness is the fact that we are still, for the most part, thinking in terms of the last war. This is inevitable. Those who win a war cling to its protections; those who lose a war profit by their mistakes—if they survive. The great debate that has been going on for some months now has been chiefly a debate as to whether we shall enter or stay out of the last war. We won the last war, but because the victors failed in their attempt to organize the world's peace, we have since then felt cheated and disenchanted by it, and determined that we would not once again be tricked. The result is a little like that of a rural visitor to the World's Fair, who has heard so much of the pickpockets, the sirens, and the enticements of New York that he spends all day escaping their snares and at the end finds that he has failed to see anything. I cannot underscore this too strongly: For America today the important thing has become to gage the dimensions and conditions of our new world, to see it, to understand the nature of total war, the strategy of terror, the limitless character of one man's will operating in the world today, the extent of his megalomania, the depth and pervasiveness of the revolutionary conditions all over the world that allow him thus to operate. And we shall never understand our world if we reject as propaganda every fact in it that may lead to action. The dangerous thing for Americans in the last war may have been propaganda, the dangerous thing for Americans in this war is not so much propaganda as that fear of propaganda that paralyzes our will and leaves us in our indecision a prey to the single-minded intelligence and the ruthless will of Hitlerism.

Nevertheless, I cannot go with those who are so preoccupied with propaganda that they see nothing else. What is leading American opinion toward interventionism today is not the persuasive power of the British and French, and of the American spokesmen sympathetic to them. Actually the biggest factor in American opinion today is not what anyone says but what Hitler does. It is not the propaganda of the word but the propaganda of the deed.

Let me develop this a bit. What has made American opinion turn increasingly toward intervention is the effect of Hitler's marching columns. It is not that England and France were good nations and Germany a bad nation. It is not the talk of Lord Lothian and Duff Cooper and Lord Halifax about western civilization. It is not even the magnificent speeches of Winston Churchill, who is the only figure to have risen to stature in this war and who deserves to be called the Pericles of Britain. It is the knowledge that Hitler is destroying the last enemies that stand between him on the one side, and us and the things we care about on the other; that he will be thoroughly ruthless and completely unappeasable; that he does not mean to stop; that he will wage against us every war of which he is capable—economic, ideological, internal, military. This has been spelled out not by British propaganda, but by the words and deeds of Hitler and the march of events in Europe. That is what I mean by the propaganda of the deed, and that is what American opinion is responding to.

We must recognize that what is happening today is something very close to a world revolution. The first World War left its ravaging effects on the world; but worse than those effects was our failure to organize the peace. We tried to make a political settlement, but it was frustrated because it did not provide for an economic settlement. We left a Europe of fragmentized nations, incapable of joining together economically because of their national hatreds, and incapable of surviving without thus joining together. Thus the way was left open for someone to organize Europe by sheer and ruthless force.

This was the framework within which Hitlerism has operated. It has been a framework of international disorganization, capitalist collapse, liberal helplessness, Tory sabotage. We speak of Hitler's triumph, and we think—and to an extent rightly—of the enormous will of one man, who turned his early misery and frustration into hate, his hate into vengeance, his vengeance into cold steel. There has been no example in history of a man who so ruthlessly willed not only his ends but his means as well, and who took not one country or even one continent but the whole world as his stamping ground. Yet we must not too easily succumb, either to the great man theory or the devil theory of history. Hitler has been able to do what he has done because he has been active in a situation ripe for him.

We have been told time and time again that nazi-ism is a revolution. Of course, it is revolutionary; but it is not in itself the revolution I am referring to. It is a revolution enforced from above by the will of a man and a group of adventurers around him—enforced by terror and accepted through fear. But—and this is important—it is a revolution that has been accepted for want of a better one. The really revolutionary forces are these. First, our incapacity to organize world peace, which I have mentioned. Second, the failure of the nation-state to act as an economic unit. We live in a time of the breaking of nations. Even if Hitler can be stopped, the day of the nation-state is over. The small nations that remain after the war will become satellites of some large and powerful empire. We are entering on a new imperialism, in which whatever may be true of the outworn doctrine of sovereignty, the surviving economies will not be national economies, but continental or hemispheric. Germany and its satellites will constitute one; Russia and its satellites another; Japan will be the center of a far eastern constellation; America, Latin America, and Canada—the center of a far western. Thirdly, within each economic unit there has been, and will continue to be, a movement toward running the economy as a planned whole through state intervention in all the major decisions. Planning has become the new operative. Fourthly, there has been a revolution in war technology and in war administration. Fifth, and finally, there has been a psychic revolution among the ordinary men and women throughout the world.

We have, I hope, grown wiser through this experience. I hope we have learned that unless an economic system can give effective security to the masses of people, they will become the stamping-ground for political adventurers, using ideas as destructive weapons. I hope we have learned that whether in peace or war only the well-organized and well-administered society can survive. I hope that we have learned that the achieving of economic security involves a heroic effort of the collective will, and what will seem to many almost a revolution in the economic structure. To the unemployed, the W. P. A. workers, those living on or just below the margin of elementary decency, to workers who are subjected to industrial tyranny and to farmers who are the slaves of the fluctuations of the market for their commodities, political democracy will be an empty form. Maury Maverick has defined democracy as "liberty plus groceries." Unless we recognize the truth of this, we shall never understand either the roots of Hitlerism in Europe or the dangers of Hitlerism here. The roots of Hitlerism lie less in the German mind than in the fertile soil that German economic collapse in the post-war years offered to the spread of Nazi ideas.

My plea is that we must intervene—if we intervene—for something affirmative. Not just to save British civilization or the Empire, not even to defend our shores, not to defend the great tradition of the past or the social system of the past. This may appeal to a few intellectuals: It will not appeal to the mass of people, and especially to the young people. There has been complaint recently of the cynicism of the young. How should we expect them to be anything but cynical, considering the mess we have made of the world we are handing on to them; considering that we have never given content in terms of their own lives to the concepts of democracy, liberty, the career open to talent? It is these groups—the insecure, the young, the cynical, whom the political adventurers of the coming generation will find the easiest victims.

American opinion at the beginning of this war started as deeply isolationist. The rapid march of events in Europe has swung it over rapidly until now, I believe, a majority of the people are behind President Roosevelt's program for sending England every aid and material resource short of war. I am myself a supporter of that program. Nevertheless, I am not happy about the terms in which it is supported. It should not only be a matter of defense—defense of the Western social system, national defense.

It should be a matter of taking the revolutionary forces in the world and channeling them in the direction of a real democratic reconstruction. It should not be defensive but affirmative—only to affirmations will our young people respond. And it should be affirmative in the sense that our efforts toward aiding England and defending ourselves must be made part of a broader effort to reorganize our economic and administrative system, and make the democratic rhetoric words winged with fire to capture the imagination of the young of all ages. Let us remember that for the common man the great nihilisms in the world today are not Hitler's doctrines, but hunger, poverty, hopelessness.

In short, we need a new leadership of American opinion in the war today. The difficulty is that we are responding to fear. We must respond to a sense not only of our dangers but our opportunities. For one thing we can be grateful: We know now the worst that we face. We have been in danger for a long time. We have never known it until now. That, at least, is something gained. And we know, too, or ought to know, that our opportunity lies in the chance we have now of organizing our economy in the national welfare, lifting our national income, making a huge effort to produce more materials both of war and peace, streamlining our governmental machine, reducing unemployment, giving the young people a sense that they have a world to gain. That will require new technicians, more administrative experts, a collective national effort, a mass awakening to the need and the opportunity for a democratic collectivism. Above all, it will require leadership. Whoever wins in the coming election, America itself cannot defend itself by standing still. We have a war economy and will have it, willy-nilly. We are bound to have a vast increase in the size of our administrative machine. The problem is whether we shall try to do all this while maintaining "business as usual" and our ideas as usual—or whether we will take the affirmative and revolutionary energies of men and turn them into the channels of a new collective democracy.

For the real democratic revolution is not in the past. It is still ahead of us.

Opponents of Conscription Classified as Pro-Nazi "Bundite" Isolationists by Authors of Washington Merry-Go-Round

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of the House an article appearing August 13, 1940, in the Washington Times-Herald by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen in their syndicated Washington Daily Merry-Go-Round, which reads as follows:

Although first behind-the-scenes opposition to conscription came largely from Nazi, anti-British, Communist sources, there is no question that those opposing the bill now have rolled up some very genuine and sincere opinion from all walks of life, particularly the churches.

In fact, opposition to conscription seems to be one thing upon which churches of almost every denomination agree, and this is probably the first time that both Catholics and Methodists have worked together on a vital legislative issue.

Catholic opposition to conscription has been expressed by Msgr. Michael J. Ready, who is circulating a statement from the Catholic bishops; and from Father Barry O'Toole, who expressed the opposition of the National Catholic Welfare Council. Archbishop John T. McNicholas, of Cincinnati, also has circulated a pastoral letter urging opposition to the bill.

Protestant opposition has come from Charles Boss, whose organization is supposed to represent 8,000,000 Methodists; Bishop William A. Lawrence, speaking for a group inside the Episcopal Church; and also from the Federal Council of Churches, the over-all Protestant body.

Outside the church groups the Farmers Union in several States has registered opposition; also the Railroad Brotherhoods. Also, this opposition to conscription is about the only thing John L. Lewis and Bill Green have agreed upon for months.

Note, however, it is an inescapable fact that these very well meaning and sincere groups are being used, at least in part, by a militant backstage group of pro-Nazi, bundite isolationists to serve their own interests.

Mr. Speaker, in one paragraph of this article an admission is made that the opposition to conscription "have rolled up some very genuine and sincere opinion from all walks of life, particularly the churches." However, in the postscript accusation is made that these groups "are being used, at least in part, by a militant backstage group of pro-Nazi, "bundite" isolationists to serve their own interests."

The authors of this article are nationally known swear artists, and it is expected they would join other columnists and editors and publishers of controlled newspapers in attempting to question the sincerity of any American individual or group who dared to oppose the present peacetime compulsory conscription bill now pending in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice in the fact that the Roman Catholic Church is joining with other religious denominations in opposing the present conscription bill. I rejoice that the veterans' organizations, the Farmers Union, the powerful labor organizations represented by William Green and John L. Lewis, and the strong railroad brotherhoods' organizations have all united in opposing the movement to Hitlerize the Republic of the United States.

I do not know Charles Boss, who, as stated by the authors of this article, represents a given number of Methodists. I do not know Bishop William A. Lawrence, who, the authors of this article state, speaks for a group in the Episcopal Church, and the Federal Council of Churches, the over-all Protestant body, but I do have for a number of years a personal acquaintance with the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, who so ably presented a statement of the attitude of the archbishops and bishops of the administration board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives July 30, 1940.

Monsignor Ready is no stranger to the Nation's Capitol. He has a large circle of friends among the Members of the House and Senate. He is an outstanding American citizen, and a militant leader in the great Catholic Church he represents. His appearance before the Military Affairs Committee on July 30, 1940, was at the direction of the archbishops and bishops of the administration board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, pursuant to the resolution adopted at their general meeting, November 16, 1939, in session at the Catholic University, Washington.

I do know that Archbishop John T. McNicholas of Cincinnati is one of the outstanding members of the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in the United States, and a splendid American citizen.

Monsignor Ready was joined in his opposition by the Right Reverend G. Barry O'Toole, professor of philosophy in the Catholic University of America, before the Senate Military Affairs Committee. It is the height of folly and hypocrisy to insinuate that Monsignor Ready and Monsignor O'Toole, or the leaders of other groups who have registered opposition to the compulsory conscription bill, as being used by any pro-Nazi, bundite isolationists to serve their own interests. It is my firm belief that the united efforts of these organizations, who are well qualified and I believe speak for the inarticulate masses of the American people, will play a major part in defeating compulsory peacetime conscription now under consideration.

These groups and countless thousands of other Americans recognize that the bill under consideration does not define or state what are the dangers which gravely threaten the integrity and institutions of our country in a manner that calls for the mobilization of all men of the Nation. They are emphatic in declaring that the possibility of a 1-year voluntary enlistment program be exhausted before resorting to a compulsory one.

The church groups especially emphasize the fact that there is no provision in the bill for the exemption of those training for the ministry nor for those carrying on an actual ministry in religious education and charity. That there should be an exemption for ministers of religion and students of theology and those individuals who are carrying on the work of Christ in their respective churches, no one will seriously deny. However, the present bill seems to pattern after the ethics of the Blum government of France, which has now gone to destruction, by skillfully omitting any exemption of the religious bodies or those who labor in the vineyard of Christ and his ministry. It is rumored that the present bill under consideration will be amended to provide for such an exemption to minimize the opposition of these church groups, in an effort to secure support for the passage of the bill. In the light of the direct opposition of these groups against compulsory training in peacetime, I sincerely hope no Member of the Congress will be swayed by this sort of an attempted compromise.

It is well that the issue of compulsory military training in peacetime be considered on the eve of the Nation's general election. This issue should go before the people by way of a referendum. It certainly will be an issue in every congressional district. The Nation has earmarked billions of dollars for national defense. For the past 10 years $1,000,000,000 a year has been expended for national-defense purposes. We are not, as some of the warmongers state, a helpless Nation from the standpoint of national defense. Our Navy is second to none. The morale and spirit of our people is greater than any nation on God's earth. The experience of the last World War is still fresh in the minds of all of us. And I pray to God there will be a strong determination registered against any involvement in foreign wars or any attempt to Hitlerize the country by regimentation of our youth in forced military activity. The manpower is available, if a voluntary enlistment system is effected and decent wages are paid to men in the military and naval forces of the country.

In June 1939, I took occasion to protest to the Congress against the official visit of the British King and Queen to the United States. I stated at that time they were advance agents for a new world war, and that only imperialistic Britain would drag us once more into the blood business of Europe. The visit of the British King and Queen was step No. 1. Step No. 2 was the lifting of the arms embargo. Step No. 3 is already under way in the proposal to send 50 of our warships to Europe to engage in what appears to be a hopeless enterprise.

The proposal for compulsory military conscription in peacetime has the earmarks of a plot to bring about a participation in the European war at an early date. Condemning as we do the methods employed by Hitler and the other dictators of Europe we must also condemn the imperialism of Great Britain, which assumes in fact that the United States is a mere colony of the British Empire, and we are compelled to everlastingly pull her chestnuts out of the fire when she meets a formidable foe.

In view of the hysteria and propaganda now sweeping the United States unless one is constantly shouting for the success of the British Empire one is cataloged as a pro-Nazi, a Communist, or a Fascist. The American way of living can be preserved, and our free institutions maintained if we show the courage to adhere to the warning of the first President of the United States, George Washington, in steering clear of foreign entanglements, be they openly or secretly arrived at.

The opposition to the present compulsory peacetime conscription bill is an indication that the people of the United States are determined to decide the issue of national defense, keeping with the sentiment of the vast majority of the inhabitants of this country, and not succumbing to the pressure of a Wall Street international banking group, who met a few months ago in the Harvard Club of New York City and carefully laid the plans for the present regimentation of the youth of America under compulsory conscription in peacetime.

Pan-American Airways Begins Important Task in National Defense Preparations

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in cooperation with the War Department Pan-American Airways, one of the most marvelous creations of our modern air-minded age, has assumed an important function in our national defense—the training of Army men for long-range air navigation.

Year after year our Government has paid Pan-American Airways millions of dollars under the title of air-mail subsidy to carry on, extend, and strengthen its operations in foreign lands, and all along we members of the Appropriations Committee have had in the back of our heads not only the immediate benefits in the extension of trade and commerce and friendly relations among nations, but also the potential service that Pan-American Airways might perform in the cause of national defense.

Pan-American Airways is making good that promise and assurance. After 2 months of conferences between representatives of Pan-American Airways and officials of the War Department the company has established at Miami, Fla., a school where it will give cadets the training that is so much needed in the navigation of long-range combat planes, such as the "flying fortress." In its operations around the globe the company has developed its own technique of navigation and it is expected that in 14 months the Miami school will be able to turn out 850 superbly qualified long-range navigators. Each one of these will be so well trained that the captain of the flying ship to which he may be assigned will know that he can depend on his navigator.

The Miami school will not bring one dime of profit to Pan-American Airways. It was founded and will be conducted as a strictly nonprofit operation. It is deeply rooted in patriotism, harking back to the World War. Juan T. Trippe, president, and C. V. Whitney, chairman of the board of Pan-American Airways, were World War pilots and most of the other Pan-American key men are veterans who had active service in the aviation branch in 1917 and 1918.

If in times past it may have seemed that we were a little extra liberal in our appropriations for foreign air mail, I think that now, when the war clouds are lowering and the lightning is flashing, we may be comforted by the assurance of the great service which Pan-American Airways is capable and willing to render as a national-defense factor.

By consent of the House I submit for publication in the RECORD a news release on this subject issued by the Public Relations Branch of the War Department last Saturday:

ARMY PLANS TO HAVE 850 LONG-RANGE NAVIGATORS TRAINED IN 14 MONTHS

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PUBLIC RELATIONS BRANCH,
August 10, 1940.

The War Department announced today that it has entered into an agreement with Pan-American Airways System which will permit the training of 850 flight-navigation cadets in long-range navigation technique during the next 14 months. The first class of approximately 50 cadets will start training in Miami, Fla., today (Saturday) and will be graduated November 2, 1940. The course is one of 12 weeks. The second class of 50 cadets will be enrolled on November 2, 1940. A third class of 50 will be enrolled 6 weeks later; thereafter plans provide for classes of 100 to be enrolled at intervals of 6 weeks, the last class to start on October 4, 1941. Army Air Corps officers who will supervise the cadets will be housed with the cadets in quarters made available by the University of Miami. Classrooms are also provided by the University of Miami.

Pan-American Airways will provide the instruction and all necessary flight-training facilities on a nonprofit contract basis. It is using some of its most experienced personnel, taken from transoceanic and other operating divisions, to act as instructors. Miami was selected because of weather conditions that permit 12 months of flying during the year and also because it is the location of the Pan-American Airways System base school, which has been that company's primary training ground for the development of transoceanic captains and other flight captains who are in the crews of the transoceanic clippers. In addition, the direction-finding stations covering Florida waters in conjunction with Pan-American's trans-Caribbean and inter-American services provide ideal facilities for the training of flight personnel in instrument and advanced long-range navigation.

Students for the flight-navigation course will be selected in much the same manner as those chosen for flying cadets. Candidates between 20 and 27 years of age will be considered for the course according to their educational qualifications. First priority will be given to graduates of accredited colleges and universities who have received a degree in engineering. Second priority will be given graduates of accredited colleges and universities who have had mathematics to include plane geometry, algebra, and trigonometry. Third priority will be given those who have satisfactorily completed at least 2 years of college work in accredited colleges or universities and who have had the mathematics outlined for the second priority group.

Flight-navigation cadets completing the training will be available for assignment to combat squadrons as members of crews in the flying fortress and other types of long- and medium-range bombers.

At the present all applications for appointment as flight-navigation cadets are being handled directly by the Chief of the Air Corps, Munitions Building, Washington, D. C.

The Air Corps training detachment stationed at Miami for the supervision and administration of the cadets undergoing training will consist of Capt. F. H. Goodrich and First Lt. B. T. Carnahan and two noncommissioned officers from the Southeast Training Center at Maxwell Field, Montgomery, Ala.

A list of the students chosen for the first class follows:

Frederick T. Albanese, 9044 East Prairie Road, Evanston, Ill.

A Peacetime Hero

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

LETTER FROM MRS. CHARLOTTE MANGUM, SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT OF GRAHAM COUNTY, ARIZ.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, in these days of carnage and the horrors of war when life among civilized nations is held so cheaply, it is inspiring to hear such a story as is related below. In addition to due honor which may be accorded this lad by appreciative organizations taking note of his heroism, I want to place the story here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the inspiration of other boys throughout the country wherever this RECORD may come. The act of this unselfish spirit is contained in a letter which I have just received from Mrs. Charlotte Mangum, county school superintendent of Graham County, Ariz. The account is as follows:

I wish to call your attention to a real case of heroism.

July 5, returning from a short vacation, William Mortensen and family, of Thatcher, met with a very tragic accident. Turning the curve at Florence Junction, they were sideswiped by a car. Their car overturned, throwing Mr. Mortensen out of the window and pinning the other occupants under the upturned car which immediately caught on fire. Mrs. Mortensen and Billy, 15, began fighting; pushed Lena, 11, and Bobby, 13, out of the car. Then Billy got out and helped pull his old grandmother out, then saw his father lying unconscious with his clothes burning on him. Billy ran to him, could not pull him by his shoulders; so in spite of flames, he jumped astride his father and with flames lapping up his legs, arms, and across his chest, he dragged his father, inch by inch, away from the burning car to soft sand where he first put out the fire on his father, then thought of himself and pulled off his burning clothes.

Billy was burned terribly on arms, legs, chest, and stomach. He is still suffering untold agony. His burns are healing slowly but looks as if most of the flesh is off the right shin. The doctor says he is out of danger, but may need grafting where deepest burns are.

Mrs. Mortensen was the last to get out of the car and in trying to save the others was most seriously burned. Her mother died shortly after reaching the hospital. Billy showed his heroism and unselfishness by insisting that all others be treated before him. Nurses and everyone were too busy to heed minor calls, and Billy in spite of seriousness of burns was found administering a drink to his dying grandmother. The nurse said, "Why did you do that? You shouldn't move from your bed." Billy replied, "Grandma was pleading for a drink. I couldn't stand to have her suffer when I could help her."

Factories for National Defense Should Be Decentralized; Aircraft and Allied Industries Should Be Located Inland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in the last few days I have been pleased to read that officials of the War Department were looking into the possibility of establishing ammunition factories, not in a few certain localities, but throughout many sections of the United States.

SHOULD MOVE INLAND

In this connection I quote the following from an editorial which appeared yesterday morning in the Baltimore (Md.) Sun:

In Europe decentralization of defense factories has been the rule since before the beginning of the war. It is apparent that in spite of intercepting planes, balloon barrages, and antiaircraft fire, no one spot can be made safe from attack. Therefore, the best defense is to reduce the size of individual targets by spreading the services vital to defense over as wide an area as is possible. If one is knocked out, there are still others that remain in operation.

It is inconceivable that the United States would ignore the lessons taught in Europe and confine the war industries to the coast. It would be equally foolish to locate them all in the Middle West, for no one can know in advance from what direction an attack might come. Should it come by way of South America and the Caribbean, the Middle West would be as vulnerable as, if not more vulnerable than, the East. Proximity to raw products, railway communications, and labor supply must, of course, play a part in the selection of sites for defense factories. But, even at that, there should be enough choice to meet all reasonable demands. The problem, if it can be called a problem, is one that ought to be capable of settlement in conference to the satisfaction of all concerned.

For many years I have been firmly convinced that our aircraft and allied industries are located so as to be vulnerable to possible aerial attack. During debate on the House floor, March 13, 1936, I sought to impress my colleagues with the need, as I saw it, to decentralize our armament manufacturing plants. At that time I said:

In this Nation practically every concern manufacturing aircraft is located on the coasts of the United States, and due to the danger from attack we should give serious consideration to the need for aircraft development inland.

ADVOCATED IN 1936

Less than a month later, April 3, I placed in the RECORD, page 4923, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, copy of a letter which I sent to the President. Similar communications were directed to the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, to the chairmen of the House Committees on Military and Naval Affairs, and also the then Director of Air Commerce. In that letter I gave the names and locations of factories which were engaged in the manufacture of planes and allied industries. Almost without exception these were located near the coasts of our country.

In the final paragraph I said:

I feel justified at this time, therefore, in calling your attention to the need for careful study with the thought in mind of establishing in the interior and more inaccessible sections of the United States our plants for the manufacture of aircraft, engines, firearms, explosives, and chemicals because the picture today is decidedly different than it was even 5 years ago.

EXPANSION IS UNDER WAY

Mr. Speaker, with each passing month since that letter was written, more than 4 years ago, the need for decentralized defense factories has become more apparent. I trust protective action in the expansion program will bring the establishment of defense units in many parts of America which are removed from our borders. It is not too late, but now is the time as actual production begins.

The Basic Issue Is Not the Third Term But the Retention of Popular Government in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

EDITORIALS AND ARTICLE FROM THE OREGON DAILY JOURNAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to include in the extension of my remarks two editorials appearing in the Oregon Daily Journal in its issue of August 9, 1940, on the third-term issue and the withdrawal of James A. Farley from President Roosevelt's Cabinet; also to include an article appearing in the same issue of the Journal, written by Mr. R. Gittings. They follow:

[From the Oregon Daily Journal, Portland, Oreg., of August 9, 1940]

THE "BASIC ISSUE" IS NOT THE THIRD TERM BUT THE RETENTION OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

One of the best things about America is what amounts not only to the right but the authority to talk right out in meetin'.

And for the other fellow to do the same.

After which, the problem is to be clearly understood, especially by the person who is so preoccupied by what he is going to say next that he gets only part of what you say.

The example selected for today of speaking frankly but not accurately is the letter (elsewhere printed) from E. Bruce Knowlton, of Portland.

"As I understand it," writes Mr. Knowlton, "the Journal is now a Republican paper, promoting Wendell Willkie. Now just come out and tell us which ones of the Roosevelt laws you would repeal."

The Journal, from the beginning, has been, is now, and will continue to be, an independent newspaper. It cannot accept the third-term proposal for President Roosevelt, believing that violation of the anti-third-term tradition strikes at popular government and creates a trend toward dictatorship. Two quotations from President Roosevelt graphically support this view.

From an address on January 8, 1936, and repeated on April 21, 1940, to the Young Democrats of America:

"Whatever may be the platform, whoever may be the nominee of the Democratic Party * * * the basic issue will be the retention of popular government."

From the message to Congress March 4, 1939:

"The safety of the system of representative democracy is, in the last analysis, based on two essentials: First, that at frequent periods the voters must choose a new Congress and a new President; and, second, that this choice must be made freely; that is to say, without any undue force against or influence over the voter in the exercise of his personal and sincere opinion."

A position against the third term is without reference to Mr. Roosevelt's successor. The Journal is not "promoting Mr. Willkie." Mr. Willkie has yet to establish his claim upon the Presidency.

Nor does it imply a desire to repeal the "Roosevelt laws." The Journal, in 1932, was the first metropolitan daily on the Pacific Coast to support Mr. Roosevelt. It supported him again in 1936. It supported, and does now support, most of the social, banking, and labor-relations legislation. Likewise, the national-defense policy, the trade-agreement plan, and much of the public-works program. The protection of natural resources from monopoly, and the advancement of education, are basic in national welfare. That the aged should have pensions, that childhood should be liberated from commercial toil, that workers should have compensation and income during involuntary idleness, that the needy should have relief, that farmers should have prices commensurate with what they have to pay for the products of industry, are as sound from the humanitarian as from the economic viewpoint.

But, supporting these, the Journal, nevertheless, went against the properly defeated court-packing plan, deplored the feud against business, advocated labor-relations amendment, opposed the tendency to regiment free enterprise through overcentralized government, and warned against excessive national debt.

Whoever may be elected President, social reform will not stop, abuses will not be again permitted. It is not necessary to elect Mr. Roosevelt to a third term to defend America or assure progress.

The basic issue is the retention of popular government.

FARLEY'S DEPARTURE LOSS TO ROOSEVELT

Jim Farley's withdrawal from President Roosevelt's cabinet closes a New Deal chapter.

His geniality, method, optimism, courage, and honesty belong to 1932, when everyone of these qualities was needed in the leadership of America back toward the way of life that we call normal, prosperous, and free.

He was indispensable in 1936, when the issue was the continuance of the recovery program.

But Jim Farley doesn't belong to 1940, and none realizes it more than he. He could not be a party to the third-term ambition. He could not concur in the unnecessary machine tactics of the Chicago convention. He was not in the picture which showed two political bosses—Mayor Kelly and Mayor Hague—seated at meat with members of the Roosevelt cabinet, one of them, Mr. Wallace, now the Democratic Vice Presidential nominee.

Jim Farley goes back to private life without a smirch upon honor, judgment, or reputation. He is a bigger man than when he entered the national political arena, bigger in conscience as well as in ability. May he command for himself and his family the success that he won for the New Deal.

THE THIRD-TERM HISTORY SPEAKS

(By R. Gittings)

In its essentials the anti-third-term tradition began with the Federal Government—even before. The spirit of it sprang forth when Washington put aside the offered kingly crown, and in such terms that the monarchial idea—at least under that name—died of its stern rejection. After his 8 years, he settled the matter of Presidential succession as decisively.

The philosophy underlying the anti-third-term tradition is older than recorded history—as old as human nature itself; for it, from hoariest eld, represents the revulsion of the free spirit against the grasp for power. The most ancient recorded expression of this revulsion came into literature more than 2,000 years ago. Let the shade of Plato be invoked to say, paraphrastically of a Scripture he never knew in life, "Before Washington was, I am." And then:

"The people have always some champion whom they set over them and nurse into greatness. * * * This and no other is the root from which a tyrant springs; when he first appears he is a protector."

This language is harsh, but it assails a principle whose workings remain the same in kind wherever it is sought to materialize it in no matter what mild degree. Hitler and Mussolini are examples, none so illustrious, of the "protector" turned tyrant.

"PERPETUAL REELIGIBILITY"

Jefferson, who was not a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, left, in his correspondence from Paris, where he was serving as American Minister to France, abundant evidence of his deep concern over the provision of the Constitution, section 1, article 2, which left open the way to what he called "perpetual reeligibility." To Washington and others, he wrote that he "disliked strongly the perpetual reeligibility of the President," fearing it would "make that an office for life, first, and then hereditary," only hoping that "before there is danger of this change taking place in the office of President, the good sense and free spirit of our countrymen will make the changes (in the Constitution) necessary to prevent it." He observed that the natural progress of things "is for liberty to yield and Government to gain ground," but that "as yet our spirits are free." But he warned: "Our jealousy is only put to sleep by the unlimited confidence we all repose in the person (Washington) to whom we all look as our President. After him inferior characters may perhaps succeed and awaken us to the danger which his merit has led us into—a merit that has blinded our countrymen to the danger of making so important an officer reeligible."

THE PERIL OF LONG TERMS

Jackson, in two of his annual messages, advised so amending the Constitution as to limit the Presidential term to 4 or 6 years. In one of these, he discussed the public disadvantage, possibly public peril, in lengthened terms of office, though, it is only fair to say, he was speaking only of appointive offices; but, with his "4 to 6 years" in mind, and in a paragraph just preceding, these reflections should seem equally to apply to the office of President. There are, he said, "perhaps, few men who can for any great length of time enjoy office and power without being more or less under the influence of feelings unfavorable to the faithful discharge of their public duties," one danger being that the office "is considered as a species of property, and Government rather as a means of promoting individual interests than as an instrument created solely for the service of the people." He disposed of the plea of "indispensability" by affirming that the duties of all public officers "are, or at least admit of being made, so plain and simple that men of intelligence may readily qualify themselves for their performance," and, further, his belief that "more is lost by the long continuance of men in office than is generally to be gained by their experience."

FROM BENTON TO BRYAN

By way of interlude, an incident in La Fayette's memorable tour of the United States, revisited in 1825. Congress, in typical American enthusiasm, proposed a $200,000 cash gift and a 24,000-acre land grant in Florida, in recognition of his services in the Revolutionary War. Benton—no better Democrat lived—quietly remarks in the course of his record of objections raised in Congress—objections to the principle, not to the amount of the grants:

"The ingratitude of republics is the theme of any declaimer; it required a Tacitus to say that gratitude was "the death of republics and the birth of monarchies"; and it belongs to the people of the United States to exhibit an exception to that profound remark—as they do to so many other lessons of history—and show a young republic that knows how to be grateful without being unwise, and is able to pay the debt of gratitude without giving its liberties in the discharge of the obligation."

The platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention of 1896 contained this plank:

"We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of 100 years, and sanctioned by the examples of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and have maintained our Government, that no man shall be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office."

So much for democratic, and Democratic Party, attitude from Jefferson to W. J. Bryan.

A Code for Nationality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent given me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including herein an editorial from the Washington Evening Star of August 13, 1940, entitled "A Code for Nationality." This editorial, I think, is worthy of perusal. I hope you will read it. It refers to H. R. 9980, that has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization without objection and is now on the House Calendar awaiting consideration.

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 13, 1940]

A CODE FOR NATIONALITY

Approved by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a bill to revise and codify the nationality laws of the United States into a comprehensive nationality code is now before the House. Because of the many conflicts and ambiguities in existing laws, and because of the danger that through the laxness of these statutes "fifth columnists" will gain citizenship, and the right to enter the United States whenever they please, Congress should promptly approve this measure, thus protecting the United States, in the words of the committee report, "against adding to its body of citizens persons who would be a potential liability rather than an asset."

The proposed code carries out the recommendations of a committee consisting of the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of Labor, in pursuance of an Executive order issued by the President on April 25, 1933. The House committee held extended hearings, and on June 5 reported the measure to the House, adding a provision strongly recommended by the War Department for greater safeguards against subversive activities by persons born in incorporated territories of the United States.

One fault in the existing statutes is that while aliens may be denied entry into the United States on any one of several grounds, a person who enjoys the legal status of a citizen of the United States cannot be barred from this country, no matter how long he has resided abroad. Therefore, a naturalized citizen, for example, may return to his native land and establish his residence there, and still enjoy the right to enter the United States at will. Because of "fifth column" activities this is one of several loopholes that should be plugged now.

In addition to defining who shall enjoy American nationality, both at home and abroad, the proposed revisions of law contain a provision under which, with certain specified exceptions, naturalized citizens will hereafter lose their citizenship if they reside continuously for 3 years in the foreign countries from which they came. In the cases of those who reacquire the nationality of their states of origin because of residence therein, the expatriation period is reduced to 2 years. These provisions will do much to bar from the high privileges of United States citizenship those who are not Americans in character and sympathy.

Apart from the desirability of a tightening of the nationality laws, it will be a great advantage to have the statutes governing nationality brought into a single and logically arranged code. In recent years Federal courts and Government departments have faced unusual difficulties in construing nationality law.

By providing uniform rules of naturalization, and by repealing obsolete and conflicting provisions of existing statutes, the proposed code will make possible a better and a more efficient enforcement of the law. This codification of nationality laws is a part of the defense program that should receive early attention.

Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested to find out in the morning press that the program for compulsory military training would be delayed, because with a proper bill for voluntary enlistments passed by Congress we would get all the men necessary by enlistment, and it would not be necessary to upset the whole economic system of the country by drafting people for military training and service.

From a study of the population of the different States and the enlistments from January 1, 1940, to June 30, 1940, it shows that we are getting the quotas that we are asking for, and with proper adjustment in the payment of reasonable wages or salaries to those that might enlist, we will have no trouble in getting men for military training, and for service if need be by voluntary enlistments.

The following table shows the population of the different States together with the enlistments from January 1, 1940, to June 30, 1940, inclusive, and also the percent of enlistments per 10,000 of population. The population is based upon the census estimated for 1937 from the Census Bureau.

States	Population, 1937	Enlistments	Enlistments per 10,000 population
Alabama	2,895,000	2,168	7+
Arizona	412,000	314	7+
Arkansas	2,048,000	1,071	5+
California	6,154,000	2,847	4.1+
Colorado	1,071,000	1,035	9+
Connecticut	1,741,000	636	3.5+
Delaware	261,000	108	4+
